

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

VOLUME 98

(124 Va. 333)

RICHMOND COLLEGE v. SCOTT-NUCKOLS CO., Inc.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 13, 1919.)

1. CONTRACTS ⇨289—BUILDING CONTRACTS—ARCHITECT'S CERTIFICATE.

Actual fraud is not the only excuse which may be shown by a contractor for failure to produce architect's certificates, and such a certificate, though called for by contract as a condition precedent to payment, is not necessary if it is capriciously or arbitrarily withheld.

2. PLEADING ⇨205(2)—GENERAL DEMURRER—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY.

In view of Code 1904, §§ 3271, 3272, requiring demurrers to set out the grounds, held that a declaration on the common counts in assumpsit by a contractor for materials and labor under a written contract was sufficient, as against general demurrer, though showing that the architect's certificate was not procured; the averments as against general demurrer sufficiently excusing nonproduction.

3. PLEADING ⇨235 — AMENDMENTS—ALLOWANCE.

While under Act March 27, 1914 (Laws 1914, c. 331), the trial court should permit amendments in furtherance of justice, and a refusal may be reviewed, such amendments are not a matter of right, and should not be permitted to delay, impeach, or embarrass the administration of justice.

4. PLEADING ⇨236(3)—AMENDMENT—ALLOWANCE.

Where defendant had already filed a special plea of set-off, which alleged defects in work done under contracts, held that the denial of leave to file trial amendments, setting up breach of a contract unconnected therewith, as well as plaintiff's insolvency and negligent performance of the contracts sued on, was a proper exercise of the trial court's discretion.

5. SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM ⇨34(1) — SUBJECT-MATTER OF SET-OFF.

In action on two written contracts, held that under Code 1904, § 3299, defendant could not counterclaim for damages suffered because of plaintiff's breach of a third separate written contract, not connected with the ones sued on.

6. CONTRACTS ⇨288—BUILDING CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION.

A contract for the construction of water and sewer lines held not to require the engineers named to personally inspect all of the work, but to allow them to appoint expert agents for that purpose, and to issue certificates on the agent's report.

7. CONTRACTS ⇨290—BUILDING CONTRACTS—WAIVER.

Where a contract under which plaintiff was to lay sewer and pipe lines for defendant provided for inspection of the work by defendant's engineers, and defendant acquiesced in inspection by an agent of the engineers specified, such acquiescence was a waiver of defendant's right to require the inspection to be personally made by the engineers themselves.

Error to Hustings Court of Richmond.

Action by the Scott-Nuckols Company, Incorporated, against Richmond College. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

A. W. Patterson, of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

PRENTIS, J. Richmond College, hereinafter called the defendant, complains of a verdict and judgment in favor of Scott-Nuckols Company, Incorporated, hereinafter called the contractor, for the balance claimed to be due for material and labor done in the construction of water and sewer lines laid under certain written contracts.

There were three separate contracts. Contract No. 1 was dated March 6, 1914, and contract No. 3, September 15, 1914. There was another contract, generally referred to in the record as contract No. 2, which was dated July 13, 1914. One point of controversy arises out of the fact that, although the action was based upon balances claimed to be due on contracts Nos. 1 and 3, the defendant filed a special plea of set-off and recoupment, and claimed that the three contracts were dependent each upon the other, and that it had the right to set off and recover damages arising out of alleged defects in the construction done under contract No. 2, as well as for such alleged defective work done under the other two contracts. The construction under contract No. 2 had been completed, inspected, approved, and the whole of the work done thereunder paid for in full by the defendant before this suit was instituted, and the action, as above stated, is based upon balances claimed to be due under the other two contracts.

While all of the work was done in the construction of a sewer and water system upon the property of the defendant at Westhampton, the contracts were let at separate times, under different specifications, and upon competitive bidding. They might just as well have been entered into with three separate contractors as with one, and no reference is made in either one of the contracts to either of the others. They were therefore clearly independent and not interdependent agreements. All that is hereafter said must be read in view of this conclusion, which was contested by the defendant in several different methods before the trial court as well as here.

The specifications which constitute a part of contract No. 1 provide, among other things, that:

"The premises shall at all times be under charge and jurisdiction of the engineer, and he or his properly accredited agents or representatives shall have free and unobstructed access to the premises at all times, and the contractor shall provide adequate and safe means for the inspection of his work at any and all times."

They further provide that:

"The term 'engineers' shall mean a properly appointed member of the firm of Carneal & Johnston, or his successor duly appointed by the owners, or the assistants and duly authorized agents of the engineer."

As to payments, this is said:

"Payments will be made as the work progresses, upon the certificate of the engineer that the work has been satisfactorily performed. Basis of payments to be eighty-five per cent. of the work satisfactorily performed, the remaining fifteen per cent. to be included in the final payment for the entire work which shall be due and made within thirty days after the acceptance and approval of the work as a whole by the engineer and superintendent and the owners."

There was, as is usual in such controversies, a sharp conflict in the evidence, which we shall not review, because by the mandate of the statute, under the demurrer to the evidence rule, the defendant is here admitting the truth of all of the contractor's evidence and all proper inferences therefrom which conflict with its own evidence.

[1, 2] 1. The first assignment of error is that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the declaration. The original declaration contains the common counts in assumpsit. The particulars of the claim and the amended declaration show that the contractor was claiming a balance of $238.20 for work done under contract No. 1 ($8,050.61 having been paid thereon), $1,139.46 under contract No. 3 ($1,000 having been paid thereon), and $10 for sand and stone furnished. The demurrer was a general demurrer to the declaration and to each count thereof, and for specification states:

"That the several matters and things set out in the contracts made a part of said amended declaration and shown to be conditions precedent to a right of action and recovery are not alleged or averred in such manner as to give plaintiff the right to sue, nor are such other matters alleged as legally excuse the failure to allege and aver such conditions precedent."

It is only necessary to say as to this specification what was said as to the sixth and seventh grounds of demurrer in the case of Newton v. White, 115 Va. 849, 80 S. E. 561, and that is that it is no more than an assertion that the declaration is insufficient in law. The rule which would apply under section 3271 in cases where the plaintiff moves the court to require the defendant to state the grounds of demurrer requires that they shall be stated specifically, and that no ground shall be considered other than those so stated. Va. & S. W. Ry. Co. v. Hollingsworth, 107 Va. 364, 58 S. E. 572. The demurrer was submitted without argument, and the defendant did not present to the lower court, either in its demurrer or in argument, the specific ground here relied upon. It was properly overruled, because under section 3272 of the Code no "defect or imperfection in the declaration, * * * whether it has been heretofore deemed misleading or insufficient pleading or not," shall be regarded, "unless there shall be omitted something so essential to the action or defense, that judgment, according to law and the very right of the cause cannot be given."

This declaration and the statement of the particulars of the claim clearly and sufficiently advised the defendant of the nature of the contractor's claim; and, although it does not in specific terms charge fraud or bad faith on the part of the architects who were required by the contracts and specifications to approve the work, it does so in substance, for in both of the special counts it is alleged that "the plaintiff repeatedly called upon the said architects to issue to it a certificate for said work, which they had approved, but the said architects, without any just cause or right or excuse for so doing, wrongfully refused and failed to issue a certificate for said work" in accordance with the contracts; and, further, although the defendant took and accepted said work and has had the use and benefit thereof, "that the said architects have wrongfully and in gross disregard of the rights of the plaintiff re-refused to issue a certificate therefor." Actual fraud is not the only excuse which may be shown for failure to produce the architect's certificate, and it is well recognized that such a certificate is not necessary if it is capriciously or arbitrarily withheld. 6 R. C. L. 980; Bush v. Jones, 144 Fed. 942, 75 C. C. A. 582, note, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 774; Crouch v. Gutmann, 134 N. Y. 45, 31 N. E. 271, 30 Am. St. Rep. 608, note; Edwards v. Hartshorn, 72 Kan. 19, 82 Pac. 520, note, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1051. If the refusal of the certificate is based upon false or fraudulent information, failure to produce it does not bar a recovery. Richmond v. Burton, 115 Va. 211, 78 S. E. 560. A general demurrer to such a declaration, under these conditions, should be overruled, and there is no merit in this assignment. B. & O. R. Co. v. Lafferty, 14 Grat. (55 Va.) 478; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Mills & Fairfax, 91 Va. 641, 22 S. E. 556; Cornell v. Steele, 109 Va. 591, 64 S. E. 1033, 132 Am. St. Rep. 931; Johnson v. Bunn, 114 Va. 222, 76 S. E. 310; Kistler v. Ind. & St. L. R. Co., 88 Ind. 460; Maddux v. Buchanan, 121 Va. 111, 92 S. E. 830.

[3, 4] 2. The second assignment of error arises thus: After all the evidence in chief had been introduced on both sides, and during the examination of the witnesses put on by the plaintiff in rebuttal, the defendant moved for leave to amend its special plea of set-off by inserting an averment of the plaintiff's insolvency, and stated to the court that such amendment was desired for the purpose of introducing testimony to that effect, and recovering unliquidated damages as claimed in the plea; and then again, after all of the testimony had been concluded, the defendant moved for leave to amend its special plea of set-off by alleging that in the execution of contracts 1, 2, and 3, the plaintiff violated the contracts by doing its work under them in an unworkmanlike manner, and in disregard of the specifications accompanying such contracts and made a part thereof, which defective and faulty work the plaintiff covered up and concealed from view, whereby the defendant and its agents were misled, deceived, and defrauded in making payments to the plaintiff company under said contracts, which payments the said company had not earned and should not have received. The court refused to allow either of these amendments, and this is alleged as error.

It is claimed that the act of March 27, 1914 (Acts 1914, p. 641), providing that:

"In any suit or action hereafter instituted, the court may at any time, in furtherance of justice, upon such terms as may be just, permit any proceeding or pleading to be amended, or material supplemental matter to be set forth in an amended or supplemental pleading. The court, at every stage of the proceeding, must disregard any error or defect in the proceeding which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties"

—is clearly not permissive, but mandatory, as to such amendments, and that the word "may", as first used in that statute, should be construed as an imperative.

We cannot agree with this suggestion. It is true that the trial courts must always permit amendments in furtherance of justice, and upon refusal to do so such action may be reviewed by this court; but such amendments are not matters of right, and should not be permitted to delay, impede, or embarrass the administration of justice. So far as the amendment to the special plea of set-off refers to contract No. 2 it was clearly improper to admit it, because contract No. 2 was an independent contract, which had been fully and completely performed. It is also observed in this connection that the special plea of set-off which had been filed in this case already alleged the defective and negligent construction of the work, as well as damages which could have been prevented by proper care, and claimed recoupment on account of the losses thereby caused. These allegations were sufficient to permit the plaintiff to prove all the damages alleged arising under the two contracts sued on. No evidence was excluded, and the defendant was permitted fully to present the evidence to support its entire claim for damage and recoupment. No reason is suggested or excuse given for not offering these amendments at an earlier stage of the trial, and there was no danger of loss under contract No. 2 (not here involved) because of the alleged insolvency of the contractor, for it appears that it had given bond in the penalty of $4,500 for the faithful performance of that contract. The court correctly exercised its discretion in refusing to allow the pleas to be amended at that time. The refusal to do so did not prejudice any substantial right of the defendant.

[5] 3. The third and fourth assignments of error may be considered together. They are that the court erred in refusing to give the instructions offered by the petitioner, and in giving the instructions that were given.

These assignments raise substantially the same questions which were presented in various forms during the trial. The defendant claimed that it had the right to set off and recover unliquidated damages under Code, § 3290, growing out of contract No. 2. This contract had been fully performed and paid for before contract No. 3 had been let or commenced, and after the work done under contract No. 1 had been substantially performed. This contract No. 2 (as has been previously stated) was in no way dependent upon either of the other contracts, and had not been sued upon by the contractor, and this action was brought to recover balances alleged to be due under contracts No. 1 and

[6, 7] Then the defendant, all through the trial, claimed that, because the contracts provided that Carneal & Johnston, engineers, were to be the sole arbitrators to decide all questions and disputes touching the proper construction and completion of the work, and contemplated and agreed that the decision of said engineers on all such points was to be final and conclusive, they must abide by the decision of these engineers, etc., unless their decision was fraudulently made, or such a gross mistake had been made as necessarily to imply bad faith on their part, or plain failure to exercise an honest judgment; that therefore the contractor could not rely upon the evidence that Carneal & Johnston appointed an engineer, one Moore, as their assistant to superintend the work under the contracts; and that they did the work of construction under his direction and control. The specifications under contract No. 1 expressly provided that Carneal & Johnston, in the performance of their duties under the contract, were to employ assistants, though this provision does not appear in the specifications forming a part of contract No. 3. They had a very large amount of work on hand, and the language should be construed in a reasonable and practical way for the accomplishment of the manifest ends in view. Sewer pipes are laid from day to day; and, if such work is to be properly inspected, it must be done daily, or certainly before the ditches in which they are laid are covered. The contracts provide for partial payments to be made during the progress of the work for that already completed and tested. The specifications with contract No. 1 provided that such payments should be made for work "satisfactorily performed," and those with contract No. 3, when the piping had been "laid and tested." After such pipes are laid and covered, there is no practical way to inspect the work; so that there is the practical necessity that the architects or chief engineers employ assistants to inspect such work as it progresses, and, as stated, such partial payments could not be properly made except for construction properly executed. Such payments on these contracts were made, and the witness Moore, the assistant engineer employed by the architects for the purpose, testifies that he did his duty as he understood it. The defendant sought to have the court instruct the jury, in effect, that every part and parcel of the work of supervision committed to Carneal & Johnston should have been done by them personally. While it is true that upon the final arbitration they could only act in person, it cannot be true that under such contracts as these the architects or engineers cannot employ expert assistants to superintend and direct the construction in accordance with the contracts. Such work requires constant supervision and inspection during its progress, for it is soon concealed so as to make proper inspection thereafter impossible. There is no other practical method. This method was pursued under these contracts, and the payments here made were upon certificates issued by Carneal & Johnston, based upon the reports of satisfactory work made to them by their assistant and superintendent, Moore, and the contractor and the defendant both acquiesced in this method of execution and settlement, and this practical construction of the contracts by the engineers. If it be true that this was not authorized by the contracts, rightly construed, and that no such certificates should have been issued or payments made unless based upon the personal knowledge and inspection of Carneal & Johnston from day to day, or during construction, then this requirement has been waived, for it must have been known during the many months in which these pipes were being laid that these inspections and this supervision were not the personal work of the engineers, but of their assistant and representative, Moore.

We do not, of course, mean that any improper inspection, either by Carneal & Johnston or by their assistant, could relieve the contractor of the obligation of the contract, but only that, Moore having acted as the representative of the architects, by their direction, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of the defendant, the contractor was justified in accepting Moore as the duly authorized representative of the architects during construction. Moore, it must be remembered, never issued any certificates upon which the payments were based, nor did he ever undertake to approve the completed work.

The vital questions involved are questions of fact. The defendant claimed that the contractor had failed to perform its contract, and that the engineers refused, and were justified in refusing, to approve and accept the work; and the evidence in the record to sustain these views is most impressive. These claims of the defendant were fairly and sufficiently presented to the jury in the instructions, and they were told that if the work had not been done according to the required specifications and had not been accepted, they should allow the defendant (by way of damage and recoupment) such sum as had been expended by it in repairing and relaying the sewer lines. If the jury had found in favor of the defendant, we would not have disturbed their verdict. The verdict, however, shows that they believed that the weight of the testimony was against these contentions of the defendant. While the grammatical construction of some of the instructions which were given is worthy of criticism, and there is some confusion, still as a whole they fairly presented the law of the case to the jury, and there is no reason to doubt that they were fully understood.

What we have said is sufficient to indicate our view as to the motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial upon the ground that it is contrary to the law and the evidence. It may be that this court has grave and reasonable doubts as to whether the jury have correctly interpreted conflicting parol evidence, but in a civil case this is insufficient; for, in order to justify a reversal on that ground, the verdict must be plainly against the evidence, or without evidence to support it. This vexed controversy has been tried in the method provided by our system for the determination of such disputes, and we find no reversible error in the proceedings.

Affirmed.

SIMS, J., absent.

(124 Va. 445)

TAYLOR v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Jan. 16, 1919.)

1. TAXATION §98—INTANGIBLE PERSONALTY OF MINORS—NONRESIDENT GUARDIAN.

Intangible personal property owned by minors domiciled in Virginia is subject to taxation therein under its Constitution, § 168, and Code 1904, § 491, and Acts 1897-98, c. 707, as amended by Acts 1916, c. 492, unless no situs is fixed by the statute law for the taxation of such property, where minor has guardian who is nonresident.

2. TAXATION §98 — INTANGIBLE PERSONALTY OF WARD—SITUS FOR TAXATION.

Code 1904, § 492, providing by whom property is to be listed and to whom taxed, does not make domicile of guardian situs of intangible personal property of his ward for taxation, though it requires property to be listed by and taxed to guardian instead of ward.

3. TAXATION §254—INTANGIBLE PERSONALTY—SITUS.

General rule is that in absence of some statute fixing different rule, situs for taxation of intangible property of one domiciled in state is at residence of owner.

4. TAXATION §98 — INTANGIBLE PERSONALTY OF WARD—SITUS.

Where ward is domiciled in Virginia, his domicile fixes situs of his intangible personal property for taxation, though he has a nonresident guardian.

Error to Corporation Court of Norfolk.

Application by Robertson Taylor, guardian, etc., against the Commonwealth, for relief from an alleged erroneous assessment. To review judgment dismissing the application, applicant brings error. Affirmed.

This is an application by the plaintiff in error for relief from an alleged erroneous assessment made by a commissioner of revenue of the city of Norfolk in October, 1916, per a report to him of the examiner of records of that city, of certain promissory notes owned by a minor, the ward of the plaintiff in error, for taxation for the year 1914, as omitted property for the latter year, which notes were on February 1, 1914, under the control of said guardian, being in the hands of his attorney in the said city, but were not listed for taxation nor taxed for the year 1914.

As of February 1, 1914, the said guardian was a nonresident of Virginia, but the said ward was then a resident of and domiciled in the said city.

The court below declined to grant the relief sought, dismissed the application, and the guardian brings error.

Loyall, Taylor & White, of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It is undisputed that intangible personal property, owned by minors who are domiciled in Virginia, is subject to taxation therein under section 168 of the state Constitution and the statutes contained in section 491 of the Code, as amended (4 Pollard's Code 1916, § 491), and Acts 1897-98, p. 756, as amended by Acts 1916, p. 828, enacted in pursuance of the Constitution; just as such property of other persons domiciled in the state is subject to taxation, unless it be true that the statute law of the state is such that no situs therein is fixed by law for the taxation of such property of a minor in a case where the minor has a guardian who is a nonresident of the state.

As stated in the petition:

"The sole question presented for decision is whether intangible personal estate of a ward residing in Norfolk in the hands or control of his guardian, residing outside of Norfolk, is taxable in Norfolk under the provisions of the statute."

The positions of the appellants are as follows:

(a) That the effect of section 492 of the Code when correctly construed, is to make the domicile of the guardian the situs for taxation of the intangible personal property of the ward which is in the possession or under the control of the guardian. But if this be not so,

(b) That there is no statute in Virginia which fixes a situs for taxation of such property where the guardian is a nonresident of the state—that this is a casus omissus of the statute which is fatal to the taxing power of the state in the instant case.

We will consider these positions in their order as stated.

[2] 1. Section 492 of the Code, so far as material, contains the following provisions:

"Sec. 492. By whom property is to be listed; to whom taxed. If property be owned by a person sui juris, it shall be listed by and taxed to him. If property be owned by a minor, it shall be listed by and taxed to his guardian or trustee, if any he has; if he has no guardian or trustee, it shall be listed by and taxed to his father, if any he has; if he has no father, then it shall be listed by and taxed to his mother, if any he has; and if he has neither guardian, or trustee, father nor mother, it shall be listed by and taxed to the person in possession. * * * If the property be owned by an idiot or lunatic, it shall be listed by and taxed to his committee, if any; if none has been appointed, then such property shall be listed by and taxed to the person in possession. * * *

It is obvious from the reading of the statute that it is silent on the subject of the situs of property of minors, idiots, and lunatics for the purpose of taxation. Whatever effect, on that subject, is to be given to the statute must arise from deductive reasoning. And such reasoning must be based upon the effect given to domicile by the rule which is embodied in the maxim, "Mobilia sequuntur personam." Accordingly, the contention of the appellant is that this statute makes the domicile of the guardian the situs of the intangible personal property of the ward for taxation, in that it requires property to be listed by and taxed to the guardian instead of the ward.

The provisions of the statute above quoted, both in the caption and body of it, concern merely by whom the property is to be listed and to whom taxed. That this statute does not fix the domicile of the person by whom it requires property to be listed, and to whom it requires it to be taxed, as the situs of such property for taxation, is apparent, we think, from a reading of it, in the light of the following considerations: The statute embraces both tangible and intangible personal property. The situs of tangible personal property for taxation is the locus of the property itself and not the domicile of the person by whom the statute aforesaid requires it to be listed and to whom it requires the property to be taxed. This single consideration refutes the reasoning on which the position of appellant under consideration is based. Further: Where the owner is a minor, idiot, or lunatic he is, of course incompetent to list for taxation property owned by him, and alike incompetent to act as a payer of taxes. Hence the statute in all such cases provides for some one else than the owner of the property to list it for taxation and to whom it shall be taxed. To provide a competent person to list the property for taxation and also to act as payer of the taxes thereon, who will be likewise a person competent to give a correct list and one who, if not the owner, will be charged with responsibility to the property owner in the premises, were, we think, the objects and purposes of the statute in designating by whom property of such persons is to be listed and to whom taxed, and not the making of the domicile of the former person the situs of the property for taxation. What taxing jurisdiction should be such situs is wholly apart from such objects and purposes.

Further: As stated in the opinion of this court delivered by Judge Burks in the case of Wise v. Commonwealth, 122 Va. 693, 95 S. E. 632, " * * * It is the policy of this commonwealth to impose taxes on all intangible property of its citizens in the county or corporation of their residence. * * * " The construction which appellant seeks to have placed upon the statute under consideration would make it change such settled policy of the state in such cases as that under consideration. Such a purpose would need to be plainly apparent from the language of the statute before such a construction could be given to it. There being an entire lack of such a purpose apparent from the provisions of the statute, as we construe them as aforesaid, we cannot give it the construction sought by appellant.

There are provisions of the statute under consideration, which are not quoted above, which concern certain property, namely, certain separate property, property held in trust, and other property in certain cases therein mentioned, for taxation, of which such statute does plainly fix the situs; but these provisions do not concern such property as is involved in the case before us.

We conclude, therefore, that the statute relied on does not have the effect contended for by appellant, in his position (a) above noted.

[3,4] We come now to consider the alternate position of appellant, (b) noted above.

In the outset of this consideration it should be stated that if there were no situs fixed by law for the taxation in this state of the property in question, it is well established that it could not be assessed for taxation or taxed in this state. But from this the conclusion does not follow that the statute law of the state can be alone looked to upon the inquiry whether such situs is fixed by law.

The general rule of law is well settled that, in the absence of some statute fixing a different rule, the situs for taxation of intangible personal property of one domiciled in this state is at the residence of the owner of it. State Bank of Virginia v. City of Richmond, 79 Va. 115; Cooley on Taxation, 63.

On principle, this rule applies to such property owned by minors no less than to that owned by persons sui juris; and no authority to the contrary has been cited or called to our attention.

As we have seen above, the statute law of Virginia, relied on by appellant to have that effect, has not changed the general rule of law aforesaid by making the domicile of the guardian the situs for taxation of the intangible personal property of his ward, when the ward is domiciled in this state. Nor does the statute divest the ward of his beneficial ownership of such property. Where a ward is domiciled in this state, therefore, his domicile fixes the situs of his intangible personal property for taxation therein.

In such case, no statutory designation of the situs for taxation of such property is needed, unless it be the purpose of the Legislature to alter the settled policy of the state aforesaid. Such a purpose will not be assumed, but, as aforesaid, must be made to plainly appear by the language of the statute. In the absence of such a statute, the maxim, "Mobilia sequuntur personam," is operative, and fixes such situs.

The case of Hurt v. Bristol, 104 Va. 213, 51 S. E. 223, 7 Ann. Cas. 679, however, is cited and strongly relied upon by the plaintiff in error. That case, it is true, held that the situs of intangible personal property owned by a lunatic, who had a committee having possession or control of the property, was at the domicile of the committee. But that was a case of a committee who, under section 1702 of the Code, had a certain custody and control of the person of the lunatic, and the same principle did not apply which is applicable in the case of a guardian and ward with respect to the situs for taxation of the intangible personal property of the ward.

For the foregoing reasons, we find no error in the action of the court below, and the judgment under review will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

SLATER et al. v. SLATER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Jan. 16, 1919.)

1. DOWER §95—ASSIGNMENT—AWARD OF GROSS SUM.

Under anomalous circumstances, a court of equity may direct a gross sum to be paid a widow as dower in lieu of an annuity, without the consent of all the parties interested.

2. DOWER §95—AWARD OF GROSS SUM—STATUTES.

Code 1904, § 2281, providing for award of a gross sum as dower, merely provides a rule for determining the gross value of an annuity, and does not change the pre-existing general rule, which, in the absence of anomalous circumstances, requires both the willingness of the widow and the consent of heirs at law to the payment of a sum in lieu of dower.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS §221(1)—CLAIMS AGAINST ESTATE—PRESUMPTIONS.

In proceedings by a widow to establish a claim against her husband's estate as the legal owner of two bonds, drawn by him and payable to her, long overdue, found in decedent's possession, allowance of the bonds as debts against the estate was erroneous; it being presumed that the bonds had not been delivered or that they had been paid.

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS §59—PROPERTY OF DECEDENT—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where bonds and certificates of deposit were assigned to the widow by decedent, and found in her personal possession at the time of his death, it will be presumed that they are her property, and not that of the estate.

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS §59—HUSBAND AND WIFE §25(6)—ESTATE OF DECEDENT—OWNERSHIP OF BONDS.

In proceedings to settle a decedent's estate, the widow being a creditor, on a bond indorsed by him to her and reassigned to himself by signing his wife's name, held, under evidence, that decedent was acting as wife's agent, and bond belonged to widow, and not to estate.

6. EVIDENCE §265(5)—ADMISSIONS OF DECEDENT—EFFECT AS TO HEIRS.

Admissions by a decedent that certain property belongs to his widow is binding upon his heirs at law and distributees, if such admissions would have been binding upon decedent, if living.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Williamsburg and County of James City.

Proceeding by Mary Lou Slater against O. H. Slater and others to settle the estate of R. B. Slater, deceased. From a decree of settlement, both parties assign error. Reversed and remanded.

Frank Armistead, of Williamsburg, for petitioners.

Henley, Hall, Hall & Peachy and T. H. Geddy, Jr., all of Williamsburg, for claimant.

PRENTIS, J. The petitioners, C. H. Slater, R. H. Slater, and Bettie M. Harvey, brothers and sister and the heirs at law of R. B. Slater, who died suddenly intestate, complain of a decree entered in the chancery cause involving the settlement of the decedent's estate, so far as it sustains the claims of Mary Lou Slater, as his widow and as creditor of the estate, and she assigns cross-error in so far as the decree fails to do so.

1. The lands of the intestate, consisting of a large number of small parcels lying in different counties and cities, were sold by consent of the parties, and at her request and against the protest of the heirs at law, the court commuted the dower of the widow, allowing her a gross sum to be computed in accordance with section 2281 of the Code.

As the law was before that statute, which was adopted at the 1877 session, it is perfectly clear that in this state a widow could not have her dower commuted by the payment of a gross sum in lieu thereof without the consent of the heirs at law. Wilson v. Davisson, 2 Rob. (41 Va.) 384; Simmons v. Lyles, 27 Grat. (68 Va.) 922; Harrison v. Payne, 32 Grat. (73 Va.) 387.

The material part of the statute, which is relied upon for the view that the law has been changed in Virginia, reads thus:

Section 2281: "When a party, as tenant for life, or by the curtesy, or in dower, is entitled to the annual interest on a sum of money, or is entitled to the use of any estate, or a part thereof, and is willing to accept a gross sum in lieu thereof, or the party liable for such interest, or affected by such claim, has the right to pay a gross sum in lieu thereof, or if the court in any legal proceeding decree a gross sum to be paid in lieu thereof, the sum shall be estimated according to the then value of an annuity of six per cent. on the principal sum during the probable life of such person, according to the following table," etc.

The table follows at the end of the section.

Before the enactment of that statute there was no definite and certain method of ascertaining the present value of annuities, and several different methods had been used in different cases. Wilson v. Davisson, supra.

It is argued with convincing force that this statute was merely intended to remove these difficulties, and to provide a table or rule by which in proper cases the amount of the commuted value of the dower or of the annuity is to be ascertained. The original title of the act goes very far to sustain this view, for that title was:

"An act to establish a rule and table for computing the value of a life estate or annuity."

While this restrictive title cannot now limit the construction to be put upon the section, if its language shows that it was intended both to provide a table and to change the pre-existing law, because since the act was adopted there have been two general revisions of the Code, and in both it has been embodied without any reference to the original title, still, if the language is obscure in its meaning, this title is helpful. We must then, in this case, determine whether this statute should be construed as changing the pre-existing law in Virginia, requiring the assent of the heirs at law to the commutation of dower by the payment of a gross sum in lieu thereof when such settlement is desired by the widow.

Taylor et al., 112 Va. 1, 70 S. E. 534, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 40, decided long since the enactment of the statute, this court, citing the cases decided before its enactment, said:

"As a general rule, a party who has a life estate in a fund arising from the proceeds of the sale of land is not entitled to have the value of his life estate commuted and paid to him in gross, instead of the annual interest on the fund, unless the parties in interest agree to it."

[1] It is true that in that case it was adjudged that, by reason of the anomalous state of facts there existing, the general rule could not be followed because the fund available for investment was less than the principal amount on which the annuitant was entitled to interest, and that, therefore, some other mode must be adopted which, quoting from Simmons v. Lyle, supra, "will produce the greatest equality with the least inconvenience." It thus appears that under anomalous circumstances, and because of the impossibility of following the general rule, a court of equity can direct a gross sum to be paid in lieu of an annuity without the consent of all the parties interested.

Bragg v. Tinkling Land Co., 115 Va. 1, 78 S. E. 541, is referred to as sustaining the opposing view, because there the bill of the widow expressly claimed that under section 2281 she was entitled to have her dower commuted and a gross sum paid to her, and this court said that the bill was not demurrable. This, however, is only a dictum. The question considered and decided in that case was that the heirs at law were necessary parties to the suit, inasmuch as it sought to have the dower assigned out of the unaliened lands in the hands of the heirs to the exoneration of those aliened by the husband in his lifetime. The question here involved was not contested, considered or determined.

The statute presents three alternatives, in either of which the table or rule provided thereby must be applied. The first clause requires its application when the widow or other annuitant is willing to accept a gross sum in lieu of the annuity. It is apparent that such willingness to accept a gross sum clearly implies that the person liable therefor, or whose interest is affected by the claim, has either tendered it, expressed a willingness to do so, or is under obligation to do so. Acceptance necessarily implies an offer of that which is accepted. So that for this clause of the statute to operate there must be an offer to the annuitant thus to commute, or its equivalent. Then the second alternative applies the table when the party liable for the annuity, or who is affected by such claim, has the right (unconditionally) to pay a gross sum in lieu thereof; and this certainly does not change the pre-existing law or confer any new right. Such a right to pay must depend upon something outside of this statute. Then the third alternative is that, if the court in any legal proceeding shall decree a gross sum to be paid, the table or rule shall apply. Here we think it equally apparent that no new jurisdiction is by the statute conferred upon the court, but that it is intended to require the application of the rule under any circumstances in which the court by virtue of some jurisdiction otherwise existing, is authorized to enter such decree.

[2] We think, then, that the only effect of the statute is to provide a rule for determining the gross value of an annuity, and that it does not change the pre-existing general rule, which requires both the willingness of the widow and the consent of the heirs at law to the payment of a gross sum in lieu of dower. This record discloses no anomalous circumstances which justify the court in ignoring this general rule, and it follows, therefore, that the trial court erroneously determined that the widow was entitled to have her dower thus commuted over the objection of the heirs at law. One-third of the net proceeds of the land of which the widow was endowed should have been invested, and the court should have decreed that the interest thereon should be paid to her during her natural life.

2. Another question raised arises out of a claim asserted by the widow against the estate, that she is the owner of two bonds drawn by the decedent, payable to her, of $900 each, one dated May 25, 1908, payable 60 days after date, and one dated June 14, 1910, payable 90 days after date. The decedent was killed by a stroke of lightning on Saturday evening, July 15, 1915, and on July 18, 1915, when the brother-in-law of the widow was examining his papers, trying to locate his will, he found these bonds in his store, in a drawer in his safe. There is nothing upon the papers or upon the decedent's books to indicate that either of them has been paid. In the answer of the widow, Mary Lou Slater, to the cross-bill filed by the defendants, among other things, she says, in another connection, that the decedent kept his valuable papers in the storehouse used and occupied by him at the time of his death, while this respondent kept her valuable papers in the dwelling house used and occupied by her said husband and herself.

[3] The commissioner reported against this claim, but upon exception to the report, the court adjudged Mary Lou Slater to be the legal owner of these two bonds, and established them as debts against the decedent's estate. We think that this was erroneous. The evidence fails to show that she kept any of her private papers at the store, which was a separate building, though within a few feet of the dwelling. The legal inference to be drawn from the fact that these bonds, long overdue, were found as they were, is either that they had never been delivered, or that, if delivered, being at his death in the decedent's possession, that they have been paid. The claimant has failed to overcome these presumptions of law, which are adverse to her claim.

3. The commissioner reported against the claim of Mary Lou Slater that she is the owner of the following bonds: One of George A. Jones for $237.90, one of C. H. Slater for $1,000, one of George Allen and Lucinda Allen for $408.40; and of a certificate of deposit in the Peninsula Bank for $1,000. The facts as to this claim are that these evidences of debt were all payable to the decedent, but had been indorsed by him, each substantially in the same language:

"Pay to M. L. Slater.

"[Signed] R. B. Slater."

Upon the night of the death of the decedent, and at her residence, Mary Lou Slater gave these bonds and certificate of deposit, which were in an envelope, to her brother for safe-keeping. There is no contradiction of the facts stated, though there is some effort made to question the genuineness of R. B. Slater's signature.

[4] They had no children, and it is shown that the deceased husband used his wife's funds freely, and signed her name to checks and other papers at will. It also appears that several years ago he used some of her money, and that in recent years he collected rents from property belonging to her. The legal inferences to be drawn from these facts are that these bonds and this certificate of deposit found in her possession, duly assigned to her, had been delivered and were the property of Mary Lou Slater, and that they do not belong to the estate of R. B. Slater as the commissioner reported. Being assigned to her by the original owner, her husband, and being found in her personal possession at the time of his death, in the absence of evidence to overcome such inferences, they are her property. The court erred, therefore, in overruling her exceptions to the commissioner's report and holding otherwise.

[5, 6] 4. On the 1st of September, 1914, R. H. Slater, one of appellees, executed and delivered to his brother, R. B. Slater, a bond for the sum of $1,950.39, payable six months after date, and on the 1st day of October, 1914, that bond was indorsed:

"Pay to M. L. Slater, October 1, 1914.

"R. B. Slater."

This bond was taken by the decedent for collection to the city of Newport News, and one of the witnesses, T. H. Geddy, testifies that the decedent told him that it was his wife's money. Slater, the decedent, when he went to the bank, drew a draft upon the debtor for the amount of the bond and interest, and deposited it in the Colonial State Bank for collection, reassigning the bond to himself by signing his wife's name. We think the evidence shows that at the time of this transaction R. B. Slater was acting as agent for the benefit of his wife, and that this bond is the property of M. L. Slater. The admission of the decedent that it was her property would bind him if he were living, and his heirs at law and distributees are equally bound by this admission.

It does not appear to be necessary to cite authority for these latter propositions of law, which are well settled. The facts as shown by the evidence being clear, the legal inferences to be drawn therefrom are equally free from doubt. The court erred in overruling the exceptions of Mary Lou Slater to the commissioner's report as to this bond also, and she must be held to be the legal owner of the debt of which it is the evidence.

The case will be remanded for such further proceedings as may be necessary to effectuate the views here expressed.

Reversed and remanded.

Ex parte SMITH.

1. INFANTS ↔12—DELINQUENT CHILDREN—STATUTE.

In view of the definition of "delinquent child" in Acts 1914, c. 350, § 1, and section 8, providing that whenever a child under 18 years of age shall be charged before any police justice with an offense embraced in section 1, a hearing shall be had on the evidence bearing upon the guilt or innocence of the child, and if sufficient to justify conviction or send the child on to a grand jury, the court may proceed under the provisions of the act, is valid, and a police justice has jurisdiction to enter an order committing, as a delinquent child, the defendant in a criminal prosecution, without other initial proceedings.

2. HABEAS CORPUS ↔4—DELINQUENT CHILDREN—JURISDICTION OF POLICE JUSTICE.

Where a police judge had jurisdiction under Acts 1914, c. 350, of a prosecution in which petitioner was committed as a delinquent child, the question whether there was a warrant containing the charge, or whether the charge descended sufficiently into detail to afford due process of law, were matters within the jurisdiction of the justice subject to proceedings on appeal.

3. HABEAS CORPUS ↔85(1) — DELINQUENT CHILDREN—EVIDENCE.

On habeas corpus to obtain release from commitment as a delinquent child, parol evidence that petitioner was tried before a police justice on the charge of fornication is immaterial, since such charge was embraced in the charge that petitioner was a delinquent child.

4. INFANTS ↔16—DELINQUENT CHILDREN—JURISDICTION OF POLICE JUSTICE.

That an order committing petitioner as a delinquent child erroneously stated that the charge was that of being a delinquent child, when it in fact was that of fornication, held immaterial under Act 1914, as the police justice had jurisdiction upon trial of such offense to have entered the order of commitment.

5. HABEAS CORPUS ↔85(1) — COMMITMENT OF DELINQUENT CHILD.

An order, committing petitioner as a delinquent child under Acts 1914, c. 350, is conclusive, on habeas corpus to obtain release, of the fact that the charge upon which petitioner was tried and committed was as stated in the order of commitment.

6. INFANTS ↔16—DELINQUENT CHILDREN—COMMITMENT.

After expiration of the day on which petitioner was ordered committed as a delinquent child, the police justice no longer had jurisdiction of the case for any purpose except the entry of an allowance of an appeal at any time within 10 days, as allowed by Acts 1914, c. 350, § 8, and Code 1904, § 4107, and a subsequently entered order, purporting to discharge petitioner from custody, is ultra vires and void.

Ex parte petition by Hazel Smith for a writ of habeas corpus. Petition denied.

R. W. Ivey, of Richmond, for petitioner.

Assistant Attorney General J. D. Hank, Jr., and F. B. Richardson, of Richmond, for respondent Virginia Home & Industrial School for Girls.

PER CURIAM. [1] The Virginia Home & Industrial School for Girls relies upon an order of the police justice of the city of Petersburg, entered on May 22, 1918, committing to it the custody and control of the petitioner, Hazel Smith, to legalize such custody. It appears from the original order of commitment aforesaid that it was entered when the petitioner was personally in custody, and on her being brought before said police justice for trial upon the charge, upon the oath of one John T. Byers, of being a "delinquent child not suitable to be placed on probation," and that upon such trial such justice was of opinion that petitioner had not attained the age of 17 years and was guilty of such charge, whereupon the said order of commitment was entered by such justice.

By reason of the definition of the words "delinquent child" contained in the statute (Acts 1914, p. 696, § 1 at page 697), such charge embraced either that of a criminal offense, or of such an offense as concerned the public welfare in such a way that the said statute is constitutional in its provisions in section 8 thereof (Acts 1914, p. 700), which authorized the trial which was had as aforesaid, and the entry of the order aforesaid, without other initial proceedings. The said police justice, therefore, had jurisdiction of the case under the statute. Mallory v. Va. Colony for the Feeble-Minded, 123 Va. —, 96 S. E. 172.

[2] The police justice having jurisdiction of the case whether there was or was not a warrant containing the charge against the petitioner, or whether the charge descended sufficiently into detail, to afford the latter due process of law, were all matters within the jurisdiction of the justice to determine, subject to proceedings on appeal as provided by statute, which are intended, among other things, to afford such due process when demanded by the accused.

[3-5] Furthermore, we cannot enter into a consideration of the parol evidence in the case to the effect that the petitioner was in fact tried before the police justice on the charge of fornication. If that was a fact, it is immaterial to the habeas corpus proceeding before us, since such charge was embraced in the charge that petitioner was a "delinquent child." Moreover, if the order of commitment erroneously stated that the charge aforesaid was that of being "a delinquent child," and was in fact that of fornication, a criminal offense, the justice had jurisdiction under the statute upon the trial of petitioner for such offense to have entered the order of commitment on finding the petitioner guilty of such charge. However, the order of commitment is conclusive in this proceeding of the fact that the charge on which petitioner was tried and committed to the custody drawn in question before us was as aforesaid, and as is stated in the order of commitment. Such order, being entered in a case of which the justice had jurisdiction, cannot be collaterally assailed. Hence the sole remedy of petitioner in the premises is by appeal, as provided for in said statute.

[6] The petitioner relies on an order of said police justice purporting to discharge her from custody, which was entered on June 2, 1918, according to the certificate of the justice and the certificate of the clerk of his court in evidence before us. If it were conceded that the parol evidence in the case is admissible to show, and that it does show, that such date is erroneous, and that such order was in fact entered on June 1, 1918, still it was entered on a day subsequent to that on which the order of commitment was entered. The latter was a final order, and the subsequent order of June 2d, or of June 1st, purporting to reopen the case and to discharge the petitioner from custody, was ultra vires and void, for the reason that after the expiration of the day on which the order of conviction and commitment was entered, the justice no longer had jurisdiction of the case for any purpose, except that of the entry of an allowance of an appeal at any time within ten days from the date of the last-named order. Acts 1914, § 8, p. 700; Code of Va. § 4107.

It is alleged in the petition that an appeal was taken by petitioner, by counsel, by application to the said justice within the said ten-day period to note the allowance of the appeal as required by law. If this be the fact, the answer of the respondent in this case concedes that the appeal may still be prosecuted by the petitioner if she be so advised. At any rate, the petitioner has no remedy by habeas corpus proceedings before this court, and her petition must be dismissed.

Dismissed.

STEPHEN PUTNEY SHOE CO. v. RICHMOND, F. & P. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 16, 1918.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1097(1) — FORMER APPEAL—LAW OF CASE.

A matter fixed by a decree which has been affirmed upon a former hearing has become the law of the case, and cannot be reopened, upon subsequent appeal.

2. RAILROADS ⇨72(1) — DEEDS — CONSTRUCTION.

In a suit between a shoe company and a railroad company regarding tracks to former's factory, a deed from their common grantor held to contemplate use of locomotives, and to entitle shoe company to tracks over which cars could be operated for a customary distance from plaintiff's factory, but not for the entire length of track, by pinch bars.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1194(2) — FORMER APPEAL—LAW OF CASE—DECREE—CONSIDERATION.

A decree granting to defendant the right to permit vehicles to pass over a strip upon which plaintiff had an easement construed as in violation of an appellate judgment reversing a former decree permitting defendant to open said strip for public driveway.

4. EASEMENTS ⇨58(1)—DOMINANT ESTATE—INTERFERENCE WITH USE.

The proposed opening for driveway purposes of a strip over which plaintiff had an easement held to conflict with the dominant right of use.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Henrico County.

Suit by the Stephen Putney Shoe Company against the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company. From a decree therein the former appealed, and the case was affirmed in part and reversed and rendered in part, and subsequently the railroad company filed its petition to reinstate in the circuit court, and the Putney Company filed NOTE.—The width of the right of way for the railroad tracks mentioned above is not shown by the above diagram, and the two tracks in question are shown only a part of the way from the northern line of the lot of the shoe company to the main line of the railroad company; but the position of the shoe company in the cause prior to and upon the former appeal was that such tracks, so far as laid from said northern line, as shown on such plan, fixed the proper location of said right of way, and that, when called for by it, that that one of the two tracks shown which extends only a part of said way should be extended alongside the other to said main line, so that such right of way should provide for ultimately carrying two tracks, so located.

1. The positions taken by the parties, respectively, and the material facts bearing on the subject of the proper location of the right of way for the tracks aforesaid before the court on the former appeal, were as follows:

The railroad tracks shown on the above diagram, which were located on the lot of the shoe company, and those extending from the northern line of such lot toward and to the main line of the railroad company, were located and constructed under a certain agreement entered into between said parties in 1906. This agreement, however, contained a provision under which it might be terminated, and accordingly it was terminated in 1908. The agreement, however, contained also the following, among other provisions, namely:

"Said railroad company reserves the right at its option to change the location of that part of said tracks which are outside of the property of the Putney company at any time and to use the same for any purpose it may deem proper, provided that such change of location, or such use, does not interfere with the shipping to or from the property of said Putney company.

"The acceptance of the tracks herein provided for shall be in lieu of the rights of Putney Company under said deed from the fair grounds company and others [the 1906 deed] to have two tracks as therein provided during the existence of this contract, but on the termination of this contract the Putney Company shall be remitted to all its rights under said deed as if this contract had not been made."

In said 1903 deed the fair grounds company and a trustee, who was a mere formal party, were designated as "the parties of the first and second parts," and the shoe company as the "party of the third part." The provisions in such deed with respect to the right of way for railroad tracks aforesaid were as follows:

"The said parties of the first and second parts covenant and agree that they will permit the party of the third part and its assigns to use a strip of land forever for the purpose of constructing thereon one or two railroad tracks running from the main line of Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company to the said property hereby conveyed to the said party of the third part. Said strip of land to be selected and designated by the parties of the first and second parts across its land. Said party of the second part covenants and agrees to construct, or cause to be constructed and completed, one or two tracks when called for by said party of the third part, from the said main line of Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad across said strip of land to the north line of the property hereinbefore conveyed to said party of the third part, for the use of the said party of the third part and its assigns, and then to connect with the tracks placed by said party of the third part upon their lot so purchased."

The shoe company was the plaintiff in the cause as originally instituted. By its pleadings in the cause, its position prior to and upon the former appeal was, in substance, that while the railroad company, as grantee of the fair grounds company, had originally the right to select and designate the location of the strip of land for the railroad tracks mentioned in the clause of the 1903 deed above quoted, extending from the northern line of the lot of the shoe company to the main line of the railroad company, the railroad company by its location and construction of the tracks, shown on the diagram above, from its main line to the northern line of the shoe company lot at the point of juncture of such tracks with the tracks located on such lot, had elected and selected once for all the location of such right of way as a permanent location (subject to the right of the shoe company at any time to require two tracks), and after the termination of the 1906 agreement the railroad company could not change such location without the consent of the shoe company, that the shoe company had built its warehouse on the lot and located its tracks thereon, from B to C, as shown on said diagram, through the center of its said building, to conform to the location of said right of way for said railroad tracks made by the railroad company as aforesaid, and that neither at the point of junction of such right of way with the northern line of the shoe company's lot, to wit, at the point of entrance of the tracks thereon into the shoe company's building, nor elsewhere, could the location aforesaid of such right of way be changed, but must remain as if it had been located under the 1906 deed without regard to the 1906 agreement.

The railroad company, by its pleadings in the cause, took the position, prior to and upon the former appeal, in substance, that its action, in the selection and location of said right of way from the northern line of the shoe company's lot to the main line of railroad aforesaid, and its construction of said tracks from such northern line of such lot to such main line of railroad, was not under the 1903 deed, but only under the 1906 agreement; that upon the termination of the latter agreement, by the express terms thereof, the railroad company was remitted to its right under the 1903 deed to make such selection and location; and that accordingly it announced that for reasons set forth in its pleading, which it is alleged it would be inequitable, unjust, and unreasonable to disregard, it did then select a certain location mentioned and described in its pleading, to wit, a strip of land 23 feet in width, running from the northern boundary line of the said shoe company's lot to the said main line of railroad, the exact location of which was shown on a certain plat filed in the cause.

Such location of such strip of land for said railroad tracks was from a part of the northern line of the said lot of the shoe company which was near the northeastern corner of such lot, and lay thence parallel, or approximately parallel, with the location of said tracks constructed under the said 1906 agreement, until, nearing the main line of the railroad company, the former approached the single track located under such agreement by a gradual curve, until it formed a junction with such main line of railroad almost at the same point as did such single track.

The shoe company declined to accept the proposed new location of said tracks as "announced" by the railroad company as aforesaid, and in this connection the shoe company by its further pleadings in the cause made the following, among other allegations:

"This plaintiff avers that said defendant has no right to remove any tracks upon its land which will disconnect the rails on the property of this plaintiff, and avers that such action would greatly injure and would practically destroy the business of this plaintiff and would be against the rights of this plaintiff, and against the covenants of said fair grounds company and their assignee, and against the covenant of the defendant."

Referring to the location aforesaid "announced" as aforesaid by the railroad company, the shoe company alleged:

"* * * That said location does not conform to the terms of the covenant which provides that the tracks on said right of way shall connect at the northern line of plaintiff's lot with the tracks placed by said plaintiff upon the lot so purchased by it. * * *

"This plaintiff further alleges that to permit the defendant to locate said tracks according to said now proposed location will defeat the very covenant itself, since the covenant calls for two tracks for the business interests of this plaintiff, while the proposed location will only permit the plaintiff to use one track at a time. If the tracks are placed side by side in the eastern portion of the building of the plaintiff, as claimed by defendant, it will be seen that the track near the eastern wall can only be loaded from one side, the west side, and the other track being just west thereof, the person loading will always be in danger, and if there is a car on the western track that it will prevent the loading of the car on the eastern track. This is an effort to defeat the spirit of the contract and to hamper and inconvenience the plaintiff in its business."

Upon issues presenting the aforesaid antagonistic positions of the parties on the subject of the proper location of said right of way for said railroad tracks under the said 1903 deed and upon certain evidence, in addition to such deed and said 1906 agreement, which is not material to be set forth here, the court below, on July 30, 1902, entered the decree which was under review on the said former appeal. The material provisions of such decree concerning the location of such right of way were as follows:

"As to the right of way, for track purposes, to which said Stephen Putney Shoe Company is entitled, the court is of opinion and doth decide as follows, viz.:

"(1) The land conveyed to said railroad company by [the 1903 deed] was and is subject to the burden that a strip of said land may be used by said shoe company and its assigns for the purpose of constructing on said strip one or two railroad tracks.

"(2) Said railroad company had, and still has, the primary right to select and designate the location and course of said strip. The exercise of that right was deferred by contract between said shoe company and said railroad company, dated March 27, 1906 [the 1906 agreement]. Said railroad company must, however, be considered as having acquiesced in the present point of entrance into said shoe company's building as the point at which must be connected the tracks above referred to.

"(3) Said railroad company is now and hereby authorized and required to select and locate the strip aforesaid, along a route to be designated by said railroad company, provided such route is reasonably safe and convenient, and that said strip shall be of sufficient width for two tracks, and that said strip shall be so located as to permit the proper operating connection of tracks thereon with the present tracks at the aforesaid point of entrance into said shoe company's building, and that said railroad company shall notify said shoe company of the route selected. * * *

"(5) Before proceedings to incur any expense hereunder, said railroad company is directed to inquire of said shoe company: (1) Whether the latter desires two tracks, or only one track to be constructed; and (2) whether said shoe company prefers to construct, or cause to be constructed, the roadbed and track or tracks, rather than have such construction done by said railroad company. Within 30 days after such inquiry is communicated to said shoe company, the latter is required to deliver to said railroad company a complete and definite reply to each of the questions aforesaid, and, in the event of its failure to do so, said railroad company shall proceed to construct two tracks. If, however, such reply is made, as above required, and said shoe company indicated its preference that the construction aforesaid be done by said railroad company, the latter shall proceed to construct either one track, or two tracks, whichever may be stated in said reply.

"(6) The cost and expense of grading and constructing a roadbed, and placing thereon the proper equipment, shall, in any event, be paid by said shoe company, which shall fully reimburse said railroad company for actual cost incurred by the latter in connection with such matters. * * *

"(7) If said shoe company, in reply to the inquiry aforesaid, indicates its preference to do, or cause to be done, the construction referred to in said inquiry, then and in that event it is required to proceed promptly therewith, and to complete the same within a reasonable time. But all construction must be upon the strip which said railroad company shall designate, as hereinbefore required, and must be done under the supervision of said railroad company's engineers, and along lines and grades to be prescribed by said railroad company."

The decree of this court (the Supreme Court of Appeals) on the former appeal, in so far as it concerned said right of way for said railroad tracks provided for in said 1903 deed, was as follows:

"* * * The court * * * is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that there is no error in the decree appealed from, in so far as it determines the rights and obligations of the parties as to the location of the right of way for a railway leading to the shoe company's property over the railroad company's land and the tracks, etc., laid thereon, and the said decree is in this respect affirmed."

Subsequent to the last-named decree the railroad company selected a location of the right of way aforesaid, which provided for two tracks of railroad. The point of departure of such right of way from the northern line of the lot of the shoe company aforesaid is from the center of the said building thereon and is so located that the two tracks to be constructed on such right of way will connect with the present tracks on the lot of the shoe company, located, as aforesaid, through the center of its said building, at the aforesaid point of entrance into such building. Such right of way then extends, by a slight curve, to the east for a little distance, and then, by a slight reverse curve, extends still farther to the east, until it reaches a distance of approximately 50 feet to the east of the right of way as located under the 1906 agreement as aforesaid, then extends parallel with the latter for some distance until, as it approaches the main line of the said railroad, it curves to the north and gradually approaches the location of the right of way under the 1906 agreement, and forms a junction with the said main line at practically the same point as did the aforesaid 1906 location.

In May, 1914, the railroad company notified the shoe company of its selection of the location last named and submitted to the shoe company the inquiries directed by the decree of July 30, 1912, contained in paragraph 5 thereof above quoted.

The shoe company promptly replied to the effect that it did not accept, but rejected, the proposed location; and, answering said inquiries, made the following statements:

"(1) We desire to have two tracks connecting our lot, and then to converge into one track at a convenient point after leaving our lot.

"(2) We desire you to construct the tracks, and we will pay you for actual cost incurred by you, if constructed as herein designated.

"We desire to place two tracks on our open lot or space between the western line of our lot in such manner as to furnish the best railway facilities for our premises. The two tracks on our lot will run to our northern line adjoining your lot, and the center of each track is designated by a stake on the northern line of our lot.

"You will therefore construct two tracks to connect at those points, with our designated tracks to be constructed, and extend the two tracks from those points to a convenient point to converge into one track, and thence the one track to run on the east side of this right of way to the main line of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company's right of way, in a reasonably safe and convenient route over a selected strip of land as provided in said decree. We reserve our right to place an additional track on the right of way at a future time. * * *"

The shoe company submitted with its said reply a diagram on which the location it demanded of said right of way is shown. Its point of departure from the northern line of the said lot of the shoe company, and of entrance of the tracks thereon upon such lot, is outside of said building and immediately to the west of the northern corner thereof. Such location of such right of way then extends in a straight line in a northeasterly direction, on the same course as that of the outside line of the western side of said building, until it approached nearly to the main line of railroad aforesaid, and there curves slightly to the north, to a point of junction with such main line immediately to the northwest of the point of junction therewith of the right of way as located under the 1906 agreement as aforesaid.

The location of the right of way last mentioned, as made by the shoe company, is designated A as shown on the following diagram, that made by the railroad company as next above mentioned is designated C on such diagram, and that made under the 1906 agreement as aforesaid is designated B on such diagram:

low now under review was entered. The provisions of such decree which concern the proper location of the right of way in question and the tracks thereon are as follows:

"As to the right of way for track purposes, to which said shoe company is entitled, the court is of opinion, and doth hereby decide, as follows, viz.:

"(1) That by the notice dated May 27, 1914, and the plat thereto attached, which notice and plat were duly served upon the shoe company and are filed as a part of the railroad company's petition in this cause, the railroad company definitely selected and located the strip for such right of way; that the strip, so selected and designated, complies in all respects with the requirements of the decree heretofore entered in this cause, as affirmed by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia; that the demand of the shoe company for a different location, and all of its objections to the right of way selected by the railroad company, should be, and are hereby, rejected and overruled; that the prayer of the railroad company's said petition upon this point should be, and is hereby, granted; and that the only right of way for such track purposes, to which said shoe company is entitled, should be, and is hereby, definitely and finally located and established upon the strip and along the route so selected and designated by the railroad company.

"(2) That the shoe company is in default in having failed and refused to state whether two tracks, or only one track, shall be constructed on said right of way, and whether it prefers to do the necessary construction, rather than have the same done by the railroad company; that, therefore, the shoe company itself should be, and is hereby, required to do, or cause to be done, all and necessary and proper work and construction upon said right of way, including either one or two tracks, as it may prefer; that all such construction shall be done under the supervision of the railroad company's engineer or engineers, and along lines and grades to be prescribed by the railroad company within a reasonable time after definite written demand of the shoe company, stating whether one or two tracks are desired, and, if two, the point at which each track shall commence and terminate; that such written demand shall constitute a final election by the shoe company as to the number of tracks which shall ever be placed upon said strip for said shoe company or its assigns; that the shoe company shall make such written demand within 30 days after this decree becomes effective; that thereafter, upon being furnished with such lines and grades, it shall proceed promptly with the work of construction, and shall complete the same in a reasonable time; but that it shall give written notice to the railroad company of the time when such construction will be commenced, in order that the said engineer or engineers may properly supervise the same, as herein required."

2. The positions taken in their pleadings by the parties, respectively, and the material facts bearing on the subject of their rights, respectively, in, to, and over the said 27-foot strip of land, were as follows:

The following is the clause in the said

1903 deed which prescribed the rights of the parties touching the 27-foot strip of land, viz.:

"As a part consideration of the deed said fair grounds company covenants that the said strip of land just east of and adjoining the lot hereby conveyed and fronting twenty-seven (27) feet on the north line of Broad street and running back two hundred and twenty-nine feet four inches (299 ft. 4 in.) shall be kept open as an open space and said party of the third part shall at all times have free use of said twenty-seven (27) foot lot, with free ingress and egress on to and through said lot and all parts thereof."

In the executory contract evidencing the purchase by the shoe company of the lot conveyed to it in fee by the 1903 deed, which antedated such deed, there was a different provision as to said 27-foot strip of land, namely:

"It is further agreed that the said party of the first part will keep open as a street the twenty-seven (27) feet running along the eastern line of this property. * * *

One position of the shoe company in the cause prior to and upon the former appeal was that it was the beneficial owner of such strip of land, had the exclusive right of use of it, and that the railroad company had merely a bare legal title thereto. Another position of the shoe company at that time was that the only right the railroad company had as to such 27-foot strip of land was to have it kept open as—"an open space,' yet it [the railroad company] has demanded that it be thrown open to be used as a street or driveway, and it has threatened to use the same as a driveway, not alone for its employes, but also for use by any and all patrons of said railroad company."

"The shoe company, prior to the former appeal, also alleged that its wagon is 26½ feet long, and, when it is at the entrance of your orator's warehouse on the east opening [of] said 27-foot strip, it blocks the said strip of land, as it has a right to do, and if the same were permitted to be used as a driveway it would greatly reduce the free use thereof by your orator, and prevent it from using it as contracted for in said deed."

The position of the railroad company before and upon the former appeal as to said 27-foot strip of land was that it was the owner of it in fee, subject merely to the "free use" of such strip—

"for the purpose of 'free ingress and egress in, to, and through' the same and all parts thereof; and that this respondent [the railroad company] is entitled to make or permit other persons to make any use of said strip which does not prevent complainant [the shoe company] from a reasonable use of the same for the purpose aforesaid, and also to insist that the said strip 'shall be kept open as an open space.' And this respondent denies that the complainant is entitled to the exclusive use of said strip for any purpose. * * *

The railroad company also alleged that the shoe company had such strip inclosed by certain fences and was continually blocking said strip—

"by placing across the same a wagon whose length is only 6 inches less than the width of said strip."

Evidence was introduced which, so far as material to be mentioned here, was to the effect that the fences aforesaid were erected by the shoe company temporarily, subject to the request of the railroad company for their removal, and would be removed on such request, but that the use by the shoe company of its wagons, which were 26½ feet long, did at times block the said 27-foot strip from the passage of it by other vehicles.

Thereupon the decree of July 30, 1912, aforesaid was entered, which as to said 27-foot strip of land provided, so far as material to be noted here, as follows:

"As to the 27-foot strip of land, mentioned and described in the pleadings, being a strip of land fronting 27 feet on Broad street, and adjoining the land of Stephen Putney Shoe Company on the east, and running back two hundred and ninety-nine (299) feet and four (4) inches, the court is of opinion, and doth decide, as follows, viz.:

"The defendant railroad company is the owner of said strip in fee simple, subject, however, to the easement therein of said shoe company. The said shoe company has a right of ingress and egress in, to, and through said strip, and all parts thereof, and also has a right to enter the said strip, at any point thereof, from its own land adjoining the same, and to use said strip in the receipt and delivery of its goods from and to its vehicles into and from any building upon its own land, such use to be exercised in a reasonable manner; but, in so doing, said shoe company must not block said strip unreasonably, so as to prevent other wagons passing through the same in single file. The said railroad company has the right to make any use of said strip not interfering with, or inconsistent with, the reasonable exercise by said shoe company of its aforesaid rights, which rights are primary."

"And the said Stephen Putney Shoe Company, its officers, agents, servants, and employes, are hereby perpetually restrained and enjoined from making use of said strip of land, other than such as hereinbefore set forth, and in the manner above described, and from obstructing, or continuing to obstruct, the said strip, or any part thereof, in any manner or to any extent not hereinbefore permitted, and from inclosing, or continuing to keep inclosed, the said strip, or any part, or either end, thereof, and from erecting, or maintaining, any fence upon any part, or at either end, of said strip, and from interfering in any way, or at any time, with other persons in any use of said strip not inconsistent with the reasonable exercise by said shoe company of its rights hereinbefore set forth, and from doing any act or thing which will prevent the said strip, and all parts thereof, from being and continuing, at all times, an open space."

The decree of this court (the Supreme Court of Appeals) on said former appeal, upon review of so much of the said July 30, 1912, decree as referred to said 27-foot strip of land, provided as follows:

"* * * The court is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, [that] in so far as it determined the rights of the parties in the 27-foot strip of land in the bill and proceedings mentioned, it must be reversed. And this court proceeding to enter such decree as the said circuit court ought to have entered as to the said strip of land fronting on Broad street, and adjoining the land of the said Stephen Putney Shoe Company on the east, and running back 299 feet and 4 inches, the court doth adjudge order and decree that the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company is the owner in fee of the said 27-foot strip of land, subject, however, to the appellant shoe company's easement therein; that the said shoe company and the said railroad company are entitled to have the said 27-foot strip of land kept open as an open space, without the right on the part of either to erect or maintain a fence upon any part or at either end thereof; that the said shoe company has the right at all times to have the free use of the said strip of land for ingress and egress in, to, and through said strip of land, and all parts thereof, to and from all buildings upon its said land, from and to its vehicles standing upon or across said strip of land, and to every other accommodation and advantage which said strip, kept open as an open space or court, may furnish to the said property of the said shoe company, and that the said railroad company, its agents, employes, or patrons, are not entitled to make use of said strip of land in any manner that will interfere with or obstruct the said shoe company in the full enjoyment of its said easement."

In its petition subsequently filed in the cause the railroad company alleged that the shoe company had not removed but still maintained—

"gates and fences upon and inclosing said strip," also that the shoe company "claims the right to use a portion of said strip as a flower garden, and to prevent employes and patrons of your petitioner from passing through such portion, and also claims the right to use said strip for storing boxes, etc., and also claims the right to keep its vehicles standing across said strip, even when they are not being loaded or unloaded—in fact, claims the right arbitrarily to block said strip, and to the exclusive use and occupation thereof, for any purpose and period of time, whether temporarily or permanently.

"All such claims your petition most emphatically denies; and, as your petitioner has thus far been prevented by the shoe company from making any use whatever, in any manner, or at any time, of said strip, your petitioner's only recourse is to invoke the court's decision, defining precisely all rights and duties of the parties."

In answer to such petition the shoe company takes the following positions as to said 27-foot strip of land, namely:

"* * * This respondent is ready and willing to remove the fences at the north end of said 27-foot strip of land, but that the fence running along the eastern side thereof is a fence dividing the said 27-foot strip from the adjoining lot to the east thereof, owned by other parties.

"This respondent says that the flower garden referred to by petitioner railroad company is largely located on the private property of this respondent, which lies to the west of the said 27-foot strip of land, and on the Broad street front there is only a partial hedge.

"Respondent would have long since removed the fence at the north end of said strip, but for a conference between Mr. T. P. Giles, of respondent company, and Mr. W. D. Duke, of railroad company, in which the fence was not required to be removed.

"This respondent denies any allegation contained in said petition to the effect that this respondent claims any rights in said 27-foot strip of land, beyond the rights granted to it under the various deeds and contracts and under the decisions of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia."

Certain evidence was introduced by both parties bearing upon the issue as to the use being made of said 27-foot strip by the shoe company, which is referred to below in the opinion of the court.

Thereupon the decree of the court below now under review was entered, containing the following provisions concerning the rights of the parties in, to, and over said 27-foot strip of land, namely:

"As to the 27-foot strip of land, fronting on Broad street, and adjoining the land of the shoe company on the east, and running back 290 feet and 4 inches, the decree entered by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia has adjudged that the railroad company is the owner in fee of the said 27-foot strip of land, subject, however, to the shoe company's easement therein; that the said shoe company and the said railroad company are entitled to have the said 27-foot strip of land kept open as an open space without the right on the part of either to erect or maintain a fence upon any part or at either end thereof; that the said shoe company has the right at all times to have the free use of said strip of land for ingress and egress in, to, and through said strip of land.

"(2) The railroad company has the right to permit persons and vehicles to pass through any and all parts of the said 27-foot strip, at any time and for any purpose: Provided, always, that the shoe company is not thereby obstructed or interfered with in the exercise and enjoyment of its superior rights aforesaid. Such use of the said strip by other persons and vehicles is not inconsistent with the existence of the aforesaid rights of the shoe company; it is only the exercise by the shoe company of its said superior right, which is not to be obstructed or interfered with by such passage of other persons and vehicles.

"(3) The shoe company has no right to maintain upon the said strip, or any part thereof, or at either end thereof, any fence, hedge, gate, or other inclosure, nor the sign or posts thereto attached, described in the testimony of E. M.

Hastings, nor the pile of fence posts described in said testimony. And the said shoe company, its officers, agents, servants, and employes, are hereby perpetually restrained and enjoined from obstructing, or continuing to obstruct, the said strip, or any part or either end thereof, by any fence, hedge, gate, or other inclosure, or by any such sign or posts, and from hereafter maintaining, upon said strip, or any part, or at either end thereof, any fence, hedge, gate, or other inclosure, or any such obstruction as aforesaid, and from doing any act or thing in violation of the aforesaid right of the railroad company to have the said strip kept open as an open space."

S. A. Anderson and A. G. Collins, both of Richmond, for appellant.

John S. Eggleston, of Richmond, for appellee.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above). As appears from the above statement, this is the same cause which was before us on a former appeal therein (Stephen Putney Shoe Co. v. R., F. & P. R. Co., 116 Va. 211, 81 S. E. 93); the parties, the issues, and the material facts, consisting of writings to be construed and the actions of the parties thereunder, are all the same as shown by the record on the present as on the former appeal, in so far as some of the matters in issue now before us are concerned. And there is no controversy in the cause over the well-settled rule that, such being the case, the decision and decree of this court on the former appeal is the law of the case, in so far as such decree passed upon and adjudicated the questions which are presented for our decision upon the present appeal. The points of difference between the parties on that subject are merely as to how far the decree of this court on the former appeal did pass upon and adjudicate such questions. There are also further points of difference between the parties as to what should be the decision of certain questions in issue which they claim, respectively, were left open for future consideration and determination by the decree aforesaid on the former appeal. We will consider and pass upon the questions raised by such points of difference in their order as stated below.

[1] 1. We will consider first the controversy in the cause upon the subject of what is the proper location of the right of way for certain railroad tracks as provided for in the deed of 1903 mentioned in the above statement.

1a. We are of opinion that the decree of this court on the former appeal, in its affirmance of the decree of the court below of July 30, 1912, in so far as it concerned the subject now under consideration (such provisions of such decrees being quoted in the above statement), passed upon and adjudicated the question of the proper location of the right of way under consideration at its point or place of departure from the northern line of the lot of the shoe company, and fixed the location of such place of departure of such right of way as the railroad company has now located it, as shown by the above statement and the diagram last above exhibited therein, being where the right of way indicated by the lines marked C on such diagram form a junction with what is designated in the record as the northern line of the boundary of the lot of the shoe company, such junction being somewhat to the east or southeast of the center of such northern line, and is "so located as to permit the proper operating connection of tracks thereon with the present tracks [on the shoe company's lot] at the point of entrance into said shoe company's building [the latter point being in the center of such building]," as was required by paragraph 3 of said decree of July 30, 1912, which was affirmed on the former appeal.

The question whether such junction point or place of departure of the right of way from the northern line of the lot of the shoe company had been permanently fixed and located under said 1903 deed, or whether it could be changed, was put directly and expressly in issue by the pleadings and proof of both the shoe company and railroad company in the proceedings in the cause prior to and upon the former appeal, and the material facts bearing on such issue were also the same as shown by the record in the former as on the present appeal, as is set forth in detail in the above statement. It necessarily resulted from the position taken by the shoe company prior to and upon the former appeal as to what its action had been with respect to its exercise of its rights under the 1903 deed to locate the railroad tracks upon its own lot, that the conclusion was unescapable that it, at least, had elected and selected such location once for all under such deed; it could, of course, make but one election and location under such deed, and that carried with it the further conclusion that the railroad company, since it had acquiesced in that location, was bound under the 1903 deed to so locate the right of way in question on its land as to connect with the tracks so located on the shoe company's lot, which settled the question of whether the point of juncture of such right of way with such tracks could be afterwards changed. Accordingly, the decree of the court below of July 30, 1912, and its affirmance on appeal as aforesaid expressly passed upon and adjudicated such question, and expressly fixed the location of such point or place of departure of such right of way as aforesaid; that thereby and thereupon it became the law of the case, and hence the proper place of location of such point or place of departure of the right of way was no longer a subject of inquiry or of consideration or determination by the court below, nor can it be reopened by us on the present appeal.

[2] 1b. The decree of this court on the former appeal did leave open for future consideration and determination the location of the said right of way from its said point or place of departure thence on to its junction with the main line of railroad on the railroad company; the adjudication on the subject upon the former appeal, affirming the decree of the court below then under review, being merely, in the language of the latter decree, so far as material, that—

"Said railroad company is now and hereby authorized and required to select and locate the strip aforesaid along a route to be designated by said railroad company, provided such route is reasonably safe and convenient. * * *

We come now, therefore, to the consideration of the only points of difference between the shoe company and railroad company on the subject of the proper location of said right of way which are open for our consideration upon the present appeal.

The positions of the shoe company on these points are, in substance, as noted in the above statement, that the location of the right of way which has been now made by the railroad company from the said point or place of departure of it to the main line of the railroad company is not "reasonably safe and convenient," as required by the decree of July 30, 1912, for the following reasons:

(a) Because "it contains reverse curves, * * * is filled with curves, and the natural lay of the land is irregular, requiring great danger in operating the cars upon a track built to conform thereto."

(b) Because it "is the most incompetent and least safe route it could locate over its lot." And

(c) Because it is "expensive to build and operate, * * * It [the railroad company] selected the most expensive location and will call on respondent [the shoe company] to pay the cost thereof."

These positions assail the location of the right of way in question, on three grounds, namely:

First. Because the operation of the cars on the tracks thereon will be dangerous, by reasons of the curves therein and the grade thereof, if the tracks are built to conform to the natural lay of the land.

Secondly. Because the operation of the cars will be expensive, and,

Thirdly. Because it is the most expensive to build and operate.

We will consider these positions in their order as stated.

First. As to the danger of operation of the cars, if the tracks are built to conform to the natural lay of the land:

This is as yet a moot question. The decree aforesaid involved in the former appeal in the cause did not require the railroad company to disclose in its notice to the shoe company the grade proposed. It did require, however, all construction to be "done under the supervision of said railroad company's engineers and along lines and grades to be prescribed by said railroad company." It appears from the evidence in the cause that no grades have as yet been prescribed by the railroad company for the proposed tracks. Its position taken in its reply brief in the cause is that it has never been its "intention to establish any 'but a reasonable grade, which could be successfully and conveniently operated throughout the entire length to the Putney building,'" and that it has never intended to prescribe the building of the tracks "to conform to the natural lay of the land."

Secondly. As to the expense of operating the cars on the tracks as now proposed by the railroad company:

There is testimony in the cause for the shoe company and railroad company on the question of whether the cars on the tracks as proposed by the railroad company can be operated without steam or equivalent motive power—i. e., by hand, by the use of pinchbars—as easily as on tracks if located without the reverse curve, or without as great curves as there will be in the tracks, if located as proposed. The preponderance of the evidence is to the effect that, if the pinchbar method of operating the cars were adopted, they could be more easily operated on a track with lesser curves in them. But we find nothing in the deed of 1903, when construed in the light of the situation and circumstances surrounding the parties, which warrants the construction of it to the effect that the shoe company is entitled to have the right of way for said tracks so located that the latter can be or that they should be so constructed that cars thereon can be operated the entire length of the tracks by hand, by the use of pinchbars, without other motive power. On the contrary, we think that the motive power in use by the railroad company in 1903 for the placing of cars on spur and switch tracks, namely, that of locomotives, or some equivalent motive power, was in contemplation of the parties for the movement of cars to and from said main line of railroad upon and from said tracks at the time of the covenant in the deed of 1903, which fixed the rights of the parties as to such right of way and tracks and that the shoe company is not entitled to have the "convenient" character of the proposed tracks required by the decree of July 30, 1912, measured and determined by their fitness for use for the movement of cars thereon to and from the main line of railroad by any other motive power than steam locomotive power or its equivalent. The tracks should be so constructed that it would be practical for the shoe company to move single cars empty or loaded, for short distances to and from its building by handpower by the use of pinchbars, since there is testimony in the case tending to show that such use of handpower in moving cars to such extent was usual and customary among mercantile concerns under similar conditions, and hence must be taken to have been in contemplation of the parties at the time of the execution of said deed of 1903, and the preponderance of the evidence in the cause shows that, if the grade of the tracks is on a level at the curves on their ends nearest the lot of the shoe company, that will be practical.

Thirdly. As to the route now proposed by the railroad company for the railroad tracks aforesaid being the most expensive to build and operate:

The evidence in the cause is to the effect that the expense of building the railroad will be less on the route mentioned than on that proposed by the shoe company.

The preponderance of the evidence is that if the roadbed is constructed upon a reasonably proper grade, so that it can be reasonably "conveniently operated throughout the entire length to the Putney building," the cars to and from the main line of railroad can be operated by steam locomotive power, or its equivalent, without any excessive expense, and that single cars, loaded or empty, can be moved with reasonable care for short distances to and from its building by the shoe company by hand power by the use of pinchbars, which will eliminate any excessive expense in such operation of the cars.

Our conclusion, therefore, on the branch of the cause considered next above, is that the location of the right of way aforesaid, which has been selected by the railroad company as aforesaid, complies with the requirements of the former decrees in the cause, and that there is no error in the decree of the court below now under review in so deciding.

[3, 4] 2. We have now to consider the controversy in the cause upon the subject of what are the rights of the parties, respectively, over and upon the 27-foot strip of land mentioned in the statement of the case preceding this opinion.

As set forth in such statement, the question of what were the rights of the parties aforesaid, respectively, in, to, over, and upon such strip of land under the provisions of the deed of 1903, and of the preceding contract of "sale" in such statement of the case, was involved on the former appeal. The proper construction of such provisions on such subject in such deed and contract was in issue between these same parties to this cause on the former appeal; the material facts bearing on such issue were also the same as shown by the record on the former as on the present appeal; and, under the well-settled rule above adverted to, in so far as such rights have been passed upon and adjudicated by the opinion and decree of this court on the former appeal, such adjudication then became and is now the law of the case. The question which first confronts us on this branch of the case, therefore, is how far the decree of the court below now under review is in accord with the decree of this court on the former appeal touching the same matters in controversy then and now in issue.

The chief matter of controversy now before us, with respect to said 27-foot strip of land, is, as appears from the statement of the case preceding this opinion, whether, in addition to the use of such strip by the railroad company as a passageway to and from Broad street to the property of the railroad company as a walkway for its officers and employes, when using it in such a way as not to interfere with the rights of the shoe company as fixed by the decree aforesaid on the former appeal, the railroad company has the right to use such strip of land—

"as a driveway not alone for its [officers and] employes, but also for the use by any and all patrons of said railroad."

The language last quoted is from a pleading in the cause prior to the former appeal, and the precise question of whether the railroad company had the right to use such strip of land as a driveway as aforesaid, "not alone for its employes, but also for use of any and all patrons of said railroad," was before this court for decision on the former appeal. The position of the shoe company then was, and is now, that to make of the said strip a driveway for all of the patrons of the railroad company would make it a public street for all practical purposes touching the rights of the shoe company over and upon such strip of land.

As will appear from the opinion of this court on the former appeal, it was then held that since the executory contract of sale preceding the deed of 1903 contained the provision that the vendor "will keep open as a street" the said strip of land, and such provision was changed when the deed of 1903 came to be made, the provision contained in the deed on the subject being substituted for said provision in the executory contract of sale, the former must be construed in the light of the consideration that it was a substitute for the latter provision, and the opinion of this court was, in substance, that the railroad company was not entitled to make such use of said strip of land as would be made of it, if it were a street, and it reversed the preceding decree of the court below in its provisions which allowed the use of such strip as a driveway, which will be hereinafter more specifically adverted to.

The decree of the court below now under review, in its dealing with the subject now under consideration, follows very closely the decree of this court aforesaid on the former appeal, as appears from the quotation from it given in the statement preceding this opinion; but it does decree that the railroad company "has the right to permit * * * vehicles to pass through any and all parts of the said 27-foot strip at any time and for any purpose, * * *" and it is of this provision in such decree, in so far as the 27-foot strip of land is concerned, that the shoe company now complains. Such use as so allowed is not confined to the officers or employes and patrons of the railroad company, but permits a general use by any and all persons with the assent of the railroad company, which means such use by the public generally, if permitted by the railroad company. This is in substance, the very provision of the decree of the court below of July 30, 1912, on the subject now under consideration, which was reversed by the decree of this court on the former appeal, only the decree now under review goes farther and is less restricted in its express allowance of a use of the strip as a driveway. It is true that such provision is coupled with the limitation, "provided always that the shoe company is not thereby obstructed or interfered with in the exercise and enjoyment of its superior rights aforesaid"; but the same proviso was, in substance, contained in the decree of July 30, 1912, on this subject, yet such decree was reversed as aforesaid. The provision in the decree of July 30, 1912, touching the rights of the railroad company with respect to the use of said strip as a driveway was as follows, as appears from the terms thereof quoted in the above statement:

"Said shoe company must [not] block said strip unreasonably, so as to prevent other wagons passing through the same in single file. The said railroad company has the right to make any use of said strip not interfering with, or inconsistent with, the reasonable exercise by said shoe company of its aforesaid rights, which rights are primary."

Such were the provisions of such decree under consideration by this court upon which its former opinion, decision, and decree on this subject were rendered. The result thereof, therefore, was the holding that a use of said strip as a passageway for wagons "in single file," subject to be interrupted by the reasonable exercise by the shoe company of its rights of easement, was not permissible on the part of the railroad company. Such holding was thereby made the law of the case.

The decree now under review does not confine the use in question to wagons "in single file." Otherwise its provisions on this subject are substantially the same as those of the decree of the court below which was reversed as aforesaid.

In truth, any substantial use of said strip as a driveway by all of the patrons of the railroad company would be inconsistent with the "superior rights aforesaid" of the shoe company.

It is true that the evidence in the cause is meager as to the frequency of the use which the shoe company has heretofore made of said strip as a driveway, or as to how often it is blocked by its 26½-foot wagons standing across the strip to be loaded or unloaded, and it seems from the record that for the greater part of the time the whole of the strip is not occupied by the use the shoe company makes of it for the purposes for which it is entitled to use it; but the evidence shows that such strip is so used by the shoe company as it has need therefor, and that it is the only possible way for ingress and egress of the vehicles of the shoe company to and from its stables, and is the only open space upon which it can load and unload these vehicles, and that such strip is at times entirely obstructed by such use, and it is manifest that the use of such strip as a driveway by the patrons of the railroad company and others, or even by such patrons alone, would, in practice, inevitably produce innumerable collisions and endless conflict between the agents and employes of the shoe company in its rightful use of said strip and those using it as a driveway under the permission of the railroad company. In view of this situation, which inheres in the very nature and character of the use of the strip as a driveway by the public generally, or even by the patrons of the railroad company, which serves the public generally, such use is impracticable. It would be in conflict with the dominant right of the shoe company, adjudicated by the decree of this court aforesaid, entered on the former appeal, which provided for the shoe company—

"at all times to have the free use of said strip of land for ingress and egress in, to, and through said strip of land and all parts thereof to and from its own land adjoining the same, to the use of the said strip of land in receipt and delivery of its goods into and from all buildings upon its said land, from and to its vehicles standing upon or across said strip of land, * * * and that said railroad company, its agents, employes, or patrons, are not entitled to make use of said strip in any manner that will interfere with or obstruct the said shoe company in the full enjoyment of its said easement."

Indeed, we are of opinion that any use of said strip as a driveway, even by the officers and employes of the railroad company, if it were so frequent as to amount to such a substantial use as to be of any worth to the railroad company, would inevitably at times "interfere with or obstruct the shoe company in the full enjoyment of its said easement," and hence would be impracticable, in view of the dominant rights of easement of the shoe company aforesaid. Theoretically this may not be so, in view of the proviso contained in the decree now under review, above quoted; but practically it is so, as we think. It is a law of physics that two objects cannot occupy the same space at the same time; and two or more moving objects, of the like character, seeking to use the same space at the same time, where the right of such use of one is dominant, will inevitably produce conflict of rights. The situation is wholly different from what it would be if these rights were equal, as is true of vehicles on a public highway, in which case mutual concession or a law of the road would serve to avoid conflict of rights.

We are therefore of opinion that the effect of the decree aforesaid entered on the former appeal was to adjudicate that the railroad company has not the right to itself use, or to authorize any one else to use, said strip of land as a driveway; and hence we are of opinion that the decree of the court below under review in this particular is not in accord with the former decree of this court.

As to the right of the railroad company "to permit persons * * * to pass through any and all parts of the said 27-foot strip, at any time and for any purpose, provided always that the shoe company is not thereby obstructed or interfered with in the exercise and enjoyment of its superior rights" fixed by the decree aforesaid on the former appeal, which right is allowed the railroad company by the decree of the court below now under review. As the property of the railroad company is now used, and as the said strip of land has at present no walkway for persons, its use as a passageway by persons would likely be small, and would be practical without causing interference with the full enjoyment of its easement by the shoe company; but if it were used as a walkway by the public generally, in passing from Broad to Marshall street, or if the railway were to locate a passenger depot on its property, and said strip were used as a passageway for its passengers to and from Broad street, it is very probable that thereby interference with and obstruction of the full enjoyment of said easement by the shoe company would be caused. Such a situation, however, as we understand the record, has not yet arisen. Hence we are of opinion that the record does not disclose that the decree under review is not in accord, on the subject under consideration, with the decree aforesaid entered on the former appeal.

As to the right to have or maintain on said strip the "gates and fences" which are located thereon, and the alleged claim of the shoe company of the right to use a portion of the strip as a flower garden, and to use the strip for storing boxes, etc., and the right to keep its vehicles standing across said strip, even when they are not being loaded and unloaded, drawn in question before us on the present appeal, as noted in the statement above, the shoe company does not claim in its pleadings in the cause to have any of such rights, and it is apparent that such rights have been denied to it by the decree of this court on the former appeal. So that, in so far as such subjects are mentioned, among others, in the decree now under review, we are of opinion that such decree is in accord with the decree aforesaid on the former appeal, and in so far as not so mentioned the denial of such rights is, in effect, adjudicated by the last-named decree.

Our conclusion, therefore, on the subject of the rights of the parties with respect to the said 27-foot strip of land, is that, as such strip of land and the adjacent property of the railroad company is now situated and used, the decree under review correctly adjudicates such rights and is in accord with the decree of this court on the former appeal, except in the single matter of the right of the railroad company to use or permit the use of said strip as a driveway, but that as to this matter there is error in the decree under review.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of opinion to affirm the decree complained of in all respects, except in so far as it concerns the rights of the railroad company to use or permit the use of the 27-foot strip of land in the bill and proceedings mentioned as a driveway. The decree will be amended, so as to deny such right to the railroad company. We are of opinion to provide in the decree of this court, however, that it is entered without prejudice to the right of the shoe company, or its successors or assigns, to seek relief in future by any suit or action which it might lawfully institute, but for the said decrees, and the present decree of this court in this cause, in the event that it should be found impracticable to construct the roadbed for the tracks aforesaid to such grades and lay the tracks thereon in such manner, along the right of way therefor aforesaid, that cars may be operated thereon by steam locomotive power, or an equivalent motive power, to and from the main line of railroad of the railroad company with reasonable safety and convenience, and so that single cars, loaded or empty, can be moved with reasonable ease on the two curves in the tracks nearest the shoe company's lot, by the use of pinchbars, or in the event that the use of said 27-foot strip of land as a passageway of persons, without interference with and obstruction of the full enjoyment of said easement by the shoe company, should be found in future to be impracticable from any cause not due to the fault of the shoe company or its successors or assigns, as the case may be. And we are of opinion to award the costs of this appeal to the railroad company as the party substantially prevailing.

Amended and affirmed.

A. S. WHITE & CO., Inc., v. JORDAN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 16, 1919.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §309(2)—CORPORATIONS §500—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—SERVICE ON DOMESTIC CORPORATION BY PUBLICATION.

Code 1904, § 8225, authorizing service by publication on domestic corporation having no person in the county or corporation wherein action is commenced on whom process can be served, is not violative of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, and Const. 1902, § 11, prohibiting taking of property "without due process of law."

2. CORPORATIONS §507(12)—PROCESS—PUBLICATION—DESIGNATION OF NEWSPAPER.

Code 1904, § 8225, authorizing service by publication on domestic corporations having no person in the county or corporation in which action is brought upon whom service can be had, upon an order by court or clerk of court directing publication, requires, by implication, that court or clerk designate the particular newspaper to publish the process.

3. EVIDENCE §83(1) — PUBLICATION — PRESUMPTION—ACTS OF OFFICER—DESIGNATION OF NEWSPAPER.

Court or clerk designating newspaper to publish process on domestic corporation having no person in county or corporation wherein action is brought upon whom service can be had, under Code 1904, § 8225, will be presumed to require publication in such newspaper as is most likely to give defendant notice.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §48—CONSTRUCTION FAVORING VALIDITY.

If language of statute is fairly susceptible of two constructions, under one of which it is valid and under the other invalid, the construction sustaining validity will be adopted.

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §48—VALIDITY OF STATUTE—PRESUMPTION.

Intention of Legislature to respect constitutional inhibitions and pass a valid statute will be presumed.

6. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT §144—ACTIONS—SUIT IN AGENT'S NAME.

Action on contract in name of agent and in which agent has an interest can be brought in agent's name.

Burks, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Nelson County.

Action by J. W. Jordan against A. S. White & Co., Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Caskie & Caskie, of Lynchburg, for plaintiff in error. S. B. Whitehead, of Lovings-ton, for defendant in error.

PRENTIS, J. The main question here presented is identical with that determined by this court in the case of Ward Lumber Co. v. Henderson-White Mfg. Co., 107 Va. 626, 59 S. E. 477, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 324; that question being: Is section 3225 of the Code, so far as it authorizes the service of process on a domestic corporation which has no person in the county or corporation wherein the case is commenced on whom process can be served, by the publication of a copy of the process in a newspaper, violative of the fourteenth amendment of the United States Constitution and of section 11 of the Virginia Constitution, which prohibit the taking of property "without due process of law"?

In that case this court decided that the section does afford due process of law and is constitutional.

[1] The learned counsel for the petitioner reopens the question and presents the contrary view with consummate ability and force. However much we are impressed thereby, we are not disposed to disapprove the former ruling, though its soundness is doubted by very high Virginia authority. Burks' Pl. & Pr. 312.

One difference between this, and the question to which most of the cases relied on to support this contrary view, is that here we are dealing with a domestic corporation, which received its charter from this state and is within its jurisdiction; whereas, Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565, and the multitude of cases following it, nearly all refer to foreign corporations or natural persons who are not within the jurisdiction of the state in which the action is brought. The underlying principal of these cases is that a statute can have no extraterritorial effect, and it is nowhere now questioned that no personal judgment can be rendered against a foreign corporation or nonresident, proceeded against by order of publication, and that a court, in such cases, can only subject the property within the jurisdiction of the state to the claim.

As Judge Cardwell points out in Ward Lumber Co. v. Henderson-White Co., supra, this statute, section 3225, has been in force for a great many years. It had at that time never come under review in this court, but in the case of Wytheville Ins. Co. v. Stultz, 87 Va. 629, 13 S. E. 77, although the case was hotly contested, no doubt whatever was suggested and no question raised as to the validity of the statute; its constitutionality being assumed both by the court and counsel.

Dr. Lile, in his Notes on Corporations (page 342), refers to and analyzes the statute, but does not question its constitutionality; and in a note said to have been written by that great jurist, Judge Burks, the elder, in 2 Va. Law Reg. at page 545, the history of the statute is given. It is shown that in its present form it originated with the learned revisors of the Code of 1887 (of whom one was Judge Burks); and here again no question as to the constitutionality of the statute is intimated.

Judge Cardwell called attention to certain expressions of that great master of the law, Judge Cooley (Cooley's Const. Lim. [7th Ed.] p. 236), one of which is:

"The courts cannot run a race of opinions of right reason and expediency with the lawmaking power."

It is agreed that the courts cannot condemn any method of service which the Legislature prescribes, if it appears reasonably probable that the method prescribed will give the defendant notice of the proceeding and afford him an opportunity to defend.

In the case of Bicknell v. Herbert, 20 Hawaii, 132, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1186, it is said:

"Notice by publication is, perhaps, a method more often used as a substitute for personal service, but there is no distinction in principle between the one method and the other. Neither is based on the theory that it will necessarily give actual notice to the defendant, but merely that it will give such notice to himself or to his agents, if he cares to take reasonable precautions for the protection of his property."

In a note to that case, Ann. Cas. 1913A, at page 1189, this is quoted from Chatham v. Mansfield, 1 Cal. App. 298, 82 Pac. 343:

"Due notice to the defendant is essential to the jurisdiction of all courts, but such notice may be either actual or constructive in certain cases, as prescribed by the law pertaining to the forum in which such notice is given. If the Legislature has prescribed a kind of notice by which it is reasonably probable that the party proceeded against will be apprised of what is going on against him, and an opportunity is given him to defend, and the notice is given as the law requires, this will be held sufficient and due process of law."

In Freeman on Judgments (4th Ed.) § 127, p. 219, this is said:

"Therefore citizens and residents of a state may, if its laws so provide, be served with process by the publication thereof, or leaving it at their usual place of abode, or in such other mode as the Legislature deems proper under the circumstances of the case, if it appears probable that it will advise them of the proceedings against them, and afford them an opportunity to defend."

[2-5] In the case in judgment the plaintiff in the trial court could only sue the defendant either in the county of Nelson, in which the cause of action arose, in the city of Lynchburg, in which the principal office of the corporation was located, or in the county or city in which its chief officer resided. It exercised its option to institute the action in the county of Nelson, but the original process of the circuit court of Nelson county could not be sent to the city of Lynchburg (Code, § 3220), so that, although the circuit court of Nelson county had jurisdiction of the case, there was no other method provided by which the defendant could be brought into court except the method pursued. It should be noted that section 3225, in such cases, requires first an affidavit of the fact that there is no agent in the county or corporation wherein the case is commenced, and that there is no other person in that county or corporation on whom there can be service; and then, before there can be any lawful publication, the statute requires that there shall be an order entered in the case, either by the court or by the clerk of the court, directing the publication of process. The jurisdiction to enter an order, thus conferred upon the court in which the case is pending, to direct the publication, by necessary implication imposes upon the judge or clerk the duty to enter such order as is appropriate in that particular case, which order should therefore properly designate the newspaper in which it is directed to be published. If this be not the proper construction of the statute, the requirement of a specific order is superfluous. Upon the filing of such an affidavit, the statute authorizes a publication; but the requirement of an order in the case as an additional prerequisite clearly confers upon the court or clerk the jurisdiction, and therefore the corresponding duty, to select the newspaper in which it shall be published. Thus construed, the statute does not authorize publication to be made at the option of the plaintiff "in any newspaper in the state," as is claimed, but only in such newspaper as may be directed by the judge or clerk in the order. There is a presumption that the impartial officials charged with this duty will require the publication to be made in such newspaper as is most likely to give notice to the defendant. Under a statute so safeguarded, the courts should not run a race of opinion with the Legislature and say that it is not probable that such a publication will give sufficient notice. If the language of the statute is fairly susceptible of two constructions, under one of which it is valid and under the other invalid, the courts should adopt the construction which sustains its validity, rather than the other, for there is always the presumption that the Legislature intended to respect constitutional inhibitions and to pass a valid statute.

In the case of Wytheville Ins. Co. v. Stultz, supra, it does not appear that the defendant claimed that it did not have notice, and in the case in judgment the defendant in fact had ample notice, because it appeared at the very first rules to which the process was returnable and filed its plea to the jurisdiction of the court; so that, according to experience in these two cases, it appears that the defendants did receive the notice in due time and appeared and defended, and such notice and opportunity constitute the essential characteristics and only requisites of due process of law as used in this connection.

In Nelson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 225 Ill. 197, 80 N. E. 100, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1186, 116 Am. St. Rep. 133, it is held that publication of process and mailing a copy thereof is due process of law, following the former decision of Bickerdike v. Allen, 157 Ill. 95, 41 N. E. 740, 29 L. R. A. 732; and the case of Clearwater Mercantile Co. v. Roberts, etc., Shoe Co., 51 Fla. 176, 40 South. 436, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 117, 120 Am. St. Rep. 153, holds a statute giving notice to domestic corporations by publication in a newspaper in the county in which the action is instituted to be due process of law under the Florida statute. Hinckley v. Kettle River, etc., 70 Minn. 105, 72 N. W. 835, holds that a statute authorizing service of process on a state official, if there be no officer of a domestic corporation in the state, and by mailing a copy to the corporation, affords due process and is valid. Note, 50 L. R. A. 585.

While the question is a close one, and there is room for a fair difference of opinion, we decline to overrule Ward L. Co. v. Henderson-White Mfg. Co., supra. The question will soon be removed from the forum of debate by a wise provision of the new Code, which becomes effective January 13, 1920, because section 6063 (Report of Revisors, p. 2013) omits the clauses of section 3225 here involved and provides that whether there be an agent in the city or county in which the suit, action, or proceeding is commenced or not, process may be sent to the county or city in which is located the principal office of a domestic corporation, and there be served on any officer or agent of such company found at such office.

[8] The defendant demurred to the evidence in the trial court, and its demurrer was overruled. We think that the demurrer raises no new question and none that requires any discussion. The action was brought in the name of the agent with whom and in whose name the contract in writing was made, and who had an interest therein. While there can, of course, be only one satisfaction of the debt, it is clear that such an agent has the right to sue upon the contract in his own name. Hartshorne v. Whittles, 3 Munf. (17 Va.) 357; 31 Cyc. 1564, 1619, and 1621, and cases cited; Leterman v. Charlottesville, L. Co., 110 Va. 772, 67 S. E. 281; Deitz v. Prov. Wash. Ins., 31 W. Va. 851, 8 S. E. 616, 13 Am. St. Rep. 909.

CORE v. WILHELM.

1. TRIAL \S 156(3)—DEMURRER TO THE EVIDENCE.

On demurrer to plaintiff's evidence, the truth of the evidence and all just inference which a jury might draw therefrom must be admitted.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 706(6)—AUTOMOBILE COLLISION—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

In action by pedestrian for personal injuries due to collision with automobile in charge of defendant at a street intersection, question of defendant's negligence held for the jury.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 705(2)—USE OF STREETS—RECIPROCAL RIGHTS.

The rights of a pedestrian and one operating automobile at a street crossing are equal and reciprocal.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 705(10)—AUTOMOBILE COLLISION—DUTY OF PEDESTRIAN.

The rule of look and listen applicable to grade crossings of steam railroads is not applicable to a pedestrian about to cross a street.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 705(10)—AUTOMOBILE COLLISION—DUTY OF PEDESTRIAN.

The nature of duty imposed upon a pedestrian about to cross a city street, where motor vehicles of all kinds are frequently passing, is to use such care as a person of ordinary prudence would use under like circumstances.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 706(7)—COLLISION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a pedestrian, injured while crossing a street where motor vehicles of all kinds are frequently passing, used the proper degree of care, is ordinarily a question for the jury.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 706(7)—INJURY TO PEDESTRIAN—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In action by pedestrian for personal injuries due to collision with automobile in charge of defendant at a street intersection, question of contributory negligence held for the jury.

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 706(3)—INJURY TO PEDESTRIAN—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In action by plaintiff pedestrian for personal injuries due to collision with automobile in charge of defendant at a street intersection, defendant had the burden of proving contributory negligence.

9. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 706(7)—AUTOMOBILE COLLISION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

In the absence of evidence as to want of care by a pedestrian injured by an automobile, the jury would have been warranted in inferring that plaintiff was not negligent, and hence on demurrer to the evidence by the defendant the court must so find.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by N. J. Wilhelm against Mrs. W. A. Core and another. Judgment against defendant named, and she brings error. Affirmed.

Baird & Swink, of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

Levy & Mitchell, of Norfolk, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. This is an action to recover damages for a personal injury inflicted on the plaintiff by the defendant by striking him with an automobile at a street crossing in the city of Norfolk. The collision and the consequent injury to the plaintiff is not denied, but the defense is that the defendant was not negligent, or, if she was, that the plaintiff was also guilty of negligence proximately contributing to his injury. The defendant offered no evidence, but demurred to the evidence offered by the plaintiff. The jury assessed the plaintiff's damage at $2,000, and the court overruled the defendant's demurrer and entered up judgment on the verdict for the plaintiff. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The collision occurred at a regular crossing of Granby street in the city of Norfolk, but the details of it are very meager. Only two witnesses testify as to what occurred at the time—the plaintiff and a policeman. The plaintiff was a Russian, who could neither understand nor speak the English language, and gave his testimony through the medium of an interpreter. He arrived in the city by boat from Newport News only a few hours before the accident, and, after walking up Granby street for some distance, was attempting to cross in quest of Church street, to which he had been directed. His account of what occurred is that he went to the corner and attempted to cross Granby street, and proceeded as far as the first track of the street car line, when he was struck by the automobile which ran over his ankle and also badly injured one of his wrists. He says he looked just when he left the sidewalk, and that there was no automobile in that block, but that "there was an automobile in the other block"; that the latter was a long distance from him, and was far enough away for him to cross the track; that no gong was sounded or bell rung; and that he did not hear the machine approaching. On cross-examination, he states that he came from a city in Russia-Poland, where they have automobiles and street cars, that the whole street was empty, and that the automobile which struck him was the only one in the block at the time. When asked what part of the machine struck him, he replied, "If he could see it, he would run away from it." This is practically all of his testimony relating to the accident. His wounds were of quite a serious nature. The policeman's statement is that he could not tell how many machines were in the block at the time, but that he saw the defendant coming down Granby street at 5 minutes to 7 on November 2d; that she ran into the plaintiff and knocked him out into the street; that he "saw the man fall from the automobile"; that she never made any attempt to stop after striking him until he stopped her; that she did not go back with the machine to pick him up; and that he did not hear her blow a horn, or ring a gong. He estimated the distance of the scene of the accident from him at 150 feet. He also stated that the street lights were burning at the time. The defendant, who was called as witness for the plaintiff, admitted that she was operating an electric automobile which came in contact with the plaintiff on Granby street, Norfolk, Va., on November 2, 1916. The foregoing is the substance of the evidence demurred to, and is given largely in the language of the witnesses themselves.

[1, 2] Admitting the truth of this evidence and all just inferences which a jury might have drawn from it, as must be done on a demurrer to the evidence, the question is: Would a jury have been warranted in finding a verdict for the plaintiff? The rights of the parties at the crossing were equal and reciprocal, and it was the duty of each to look out for the other. The defendant saw, or ought to have seen, the plaintiff attempting to make the crossing, and it was her duty to have had her car under such control that she could have stopped it if necessary in order to have avoided the accident. The injury occurred at a corner where the defendant might reasonably have expected to encounter foot passengers crossing the street, and it was her duty to keep a lookout for them. Her view was unobstructed—"there was no other automobile on the block"—and she had no right to endanger the lives or limbs of other people on the street whose rights in the street were equal to her own. She was operating an electric automobile, approaching a crossing which the plaintiff was upon and attempting to cross, and she saw or ought to have seen him, and yet gave no signal of her approach. There is no evidence of the speed at which she was driving, or that the speed was lessened. The jury would have been warranted, under these circumstances, in inferring that she did not have her car under such control as would have enabled her to have avoided the injury, and that she was negligent in its operation.

[3-6] The rights of the plaintiff and of the defendant at the crossing were equal and reciprocal. Neither had the right of way over the other, and each had the right to assume that the other would discharge the duty imposed upon him. The rule of "look and listen" applicable to grade crossings of steam railroads is not applicable to cases of this kind. The measure of duty imposed upon a pedestrian about to cross a city street, where motor vehicles of all kinds are frequently passing, is that he shall use such care as a person of ordinary prudence would use under like circumstances, and whether or not he did use such care is ordinarily a question for the jury. Va. Ry. & Power Co. v. Boltz, 122 Va. 649, 95 S. E. 467. Of course, he cannot blindly or negligently expose himself to danger; but he is not required to be continuously looking and listening to ascertain if automobiles are approaching, under penalty that upon failure to do so, if he is injured, his negligence must be conclusively presumed. Hennessey v. Taylor, 189 Mass. 583, 76 N. E. 224, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 845, 4 Ann. Cas. 396; Shea v. Reems, 36 La. Ann. 966.

In Baker v. Close, 204 N. Y. 92, 97 N. E. 501, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 487, the negligence of the defendant was admitted, but there was conflict in the testimony as to the plaintiff's contributory negligence. In that case it was said:

"The footman is not required, as a matter of law, to look both ways and listen, but only to exercise such reasonable care as the case requires, for he has the right to assume that a driver will also exercise due care and approach the crossing with his vehicle under proper control. Buhrens v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co., 53 Hun, 571 [6 N. Y. Supp. 224], affirmed 125 N. Y. 702 [26 N. E. 752]. At such street crossings both pedestrians and drivers are required to exercise that degree of prudence and care which the conditions demand. Brooks v. Schwerin, 54 N. Y. 343. It is impossible to formulate any more precise definition of these relative rights and duties."

In Minor v. Mapes, 102 Ark. 351, 144 S. W. 219, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 214, the facts were that the plaintiff alighted from a street car, at the front end of it, which was customary, and started across the track in front of the car to go to the opposite side of the street. He hesitated at first, but the motorman told him to go ahead, and he proceeded to cross. As he stepped beyond the end of the car, the automobile, which was running at 10 or 12 miles an hour, struck him and knocked him down. He was just stepping on the other track, about 4 feet from the end of the car, when the automobile struck him. It was a rainy day, and he had his umbrella raised and was walking rapidly. He testified that the street car obstructed the view down the street, and that as he passed the car he looked down the street, but did not see the automobile approaching, and failed to see it until too late to get out of the way. There was ample space between the street car and the other side of the street for the automobile to pass. It was there said:

"It cannot be held that the failure of a pedestrian upon a public street to look up and down the street before crossing constitutes, under all circumstances, negligence as a matter of law. There is no statute or rule of law which raises a presumption of negligence from the failure of a pedestrian, on a public street, not at a railroad crossing, to look. The rule is that a pedestrian, having equal rights with others to the use of the streets, must exercise ordinary care for his own safety, and this is generally a question for the jury to say whether such care has been exercised."

While the pedestrian must bear in mind the dangers he may encounter in the street, he is only bound to use such precautions for his own safety as the danger to be apprehended would reasonably suggest to a person of ordinary prudence.

[7, 8] In the case at bar it affirmatively appears that the plaintiff looked just as he started to cross the street, and the way appeared clear, as there was no automobile in the block. What, if any, further precautions he took for his safety, does not affirmatively appear from the evidence. The failure to take such precautions was a matter of defense, as to which the burden of proof was upon the defendant, unless it was disclosed by the plaintiff's evidence, or was fairly to be inferred from all the circumstances, for it is as much the duty of the defendant to show the negligence of the plaintiff as it is the duty of the plaintiff to show the negligence of the defendant. Southern R. Co. v. Bryant's Adm'r, 95 Va. 212, 28 S. E. 183, and cases cited.

[8] The instinct of self-preservation generally forbids the imputation of recklessness, and, in the absence of evidence as to the want of due care on the part of the plaintiff, the jury would have been warranted in inferring that the plaintiff was not negligent, and hence, on a demurrer to the evidence by the defendant, we must so find. In Southern R. Co. v. Bryant's Adm'r, 95 Va. 212, 220, 28 S. E. 183, 185, this court, discussing the law applicable to an injury to a traveler at a grade crossing of a steam railroad, uses this language:

cisions elsewhere, that the burden was on the company to prove it, unless such negligence was disclosed by the evidence of the plaintiff, or might be fairly inferred from all the circumstances; and, in the absence of such proof, the person injured must be presumed to have been without fault. B. & O. R. Co. v. Whittington, 30 Grat. [71 Va.] 805; Balto. & O. R. Co. v. McKenzie, 81 Va. 71; Improvement Co. v. Andrew, 86 Va. 273 [9 S. E. 1015]; N. & W. R. Co. v. Gilman, 88 Va. 239 [13 S. E. 475]; Kimball & Fink v. Friend, 95 Va. 125 [27 S. E. 901]. See, also, R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 298 [23 L. Ed. 898]; R. Co. v. Gladmon, 15 Wall. 401 [21 L. Ed. 114]; and 2 Wood on Railroads, 1455.

"It cannot be inferred as a matter of law, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, that, because Bryant drove upon the track without stopping, he did not listen. The instinct of self-preservation forbids the imputation of recklessness to any one. Where a traveler is killed at a railroad crossing, and the negligence of the railroad company is established, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption is, though perhaps slight, that the traveler did his duty in approaching the crossing. Kimball & Fink v. Friend, supra. As has been aptly said by a learned author in discussing this question: 'One cannot fail to call to mind that contributory negligence is as distinctly a wrong in the plaintiff as negligence is in the defendant, and that it is as much against the principles of the law to presume it on the one side as on the other; resulting, therefore, in the conclusion that the defendant can no more avail himself of the one than can the plaintiff of the other.' Bishop on Noncontract Law, § 470."

In Southern Ry. Co. v. Jones' Adm'r, 118 Va. 685, 689, 88 S. E. 178, 180, it is held that—

"The inferences to be drawn from the evidence as to contributory negligence must be certain and incontrovertible, or they cannot be made by the court. If, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, it is a question about which reasonably fair-minded men may differ, it must be decided by the jury; and if the jury might have found for the plaintiff, on the defendant's demurrer to the evidence, the court must so find."

See, also, Perkins v. Southern Ry. Co., 117 Va. 351, 85 S. E. 401; Saunders v. Southern Ry. Co., 117 Va. 396, 84 S. E. 650.

We find no error in the judgment of the circuit court, and it is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

WASHINGTON-SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. GRIMES' ADM'R.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 16, 1919.)

1. TRIAL \Leftrightarrow 253(4)—INSTRUCTIONS—OMISSION OF DEFENDANT'S THEORY.

In an action for the death of plaintiff's decedent in a collision between the automobile wherein she was driving with her husband and defendant's engine at a public crossing, an instruction, directing a verdict for plaintiff if "defendant was guilty of any negligence alleged in plaintiff's declaration," was erroneous as omitting defendant's theory that decedent was guilty of contributory negligence.

2. TRIAL \Leftrightarrow 296(4, 5)—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE OF ERROR—CONTRADICTORY INSTRUCTIONS.

Where an instruction directing verdict for plaintiff is erroneous as omitting defendant's theory of the defense of contributory negligence, the error cannot be cured by other instructions, since it cannot be said whether the jury was controlled by one instruction or the other.

Error to Circuit Court, Fairfax County.

Action by Caroline H. Grimes' administrator against the Washington-Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Moore, Keith, McCandlish & Hall, of Fairfax, and Eppa Hunton, Jr., of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

C. V. Ford, of Fairfax, Nicol & Son, of Alexandria, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, P. Defendant in error, administrator of Caroline H. Grimes, brought this action against plaintiff in error, the Washington-Southern Railway Company, to recover damages for the death of his intestate alleged to be due to defendant's negligence. Plaintiff recovered a verdict for $5,000, to the judgment upon which this writ of error was granted.

The accident happened at 4:59 p. m. on December 21, 1916, while Joseph H. Grimes and his wife, plaintiff's intestate, were traveling east, in a Ford runabout, along the public highway where it crosses defendant's tracks at Lorton crossing. The automobile was struck by a fast north-bound passenger train, and both of the occupants were instantly killed. Intestate was on the side of the automobile from which the train was coming, and therefore it is contended was in better position to have discovered its approach than was her husband.

Instructions were requested both by plaintiff and defendant. The principal assignment of error for which a reversal of the judgment is pressed is to the giving of the last paragraph of instruction No. 1 at the request of plaintiff. The instruction is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that though they should believe from the evidence that Joseph S. Grimes was guilty of negligence whereby Caroline H. Grimes came to her death by reason of the collision of an automobile in which were seated said Joseph S. Grimes and his wife, Caroline H. Grimes, with an engine of the Washington-Southern Railway Company, yet if they further believe from the evidence that Joseph S. Grimes, the husband, was driver of said automobile at the time of said collision, and that his wife neither had nor exercised any control over her husband, in the operation of said automobile immediately prior to said collision or at the time of said collision, the negligence, if any, of said Joseph S. Grimes, cannot be imputed to his wife, the said Caroline H. Grimes; and the jury are further instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of any negligence alleged in plaintiff's declaration, whereby the said Caroline H. Grimes came to her death, they should find a verdict for the plaintiff in this case." (Italics ours.)

The correctness of the first part of the instruction is conceded. Va. Ry. & Power Co. v. Gorsuch, 120 Va. 655, 91 S. E. 632.

Nevertheless:

"While the negligence of the driver is not to be imputed to the passenger, it is the duty of the passenger to use ordinary care for his own safety. In approaching a grade crossing of a railroad, he should look and listen for approaching trains. The track is a signal of danger to him, and his failure to exercise reasonable precaution for his own protection is contributory negligence and bars a recovery." Southern Ry. Co. v. Jones, 118 Va. 685, 88 S. E. 178.

[1] It was to the last paragraph of the instruction that the first assignment of error was directed. Although the instruction directs a verdict, it omits the theory of the defendant that plaintiff's intestate was guilty of contributory negligence that barred her right of recovery and deprived it of the right to rely on that defense. While we forbear to intimate any opinion on the merits of the defense of contributory negligence as a bar to a recovery, we have no doubt of the sufficiency of the evidence to entitle the defendant to have the jury correctly instructed on that theory of the case.

Judge Harrison, in Virginia & S. W. Ry. Co. v. Skinner, 117 Va. 851, at page 853, 86 S. E. 131, at page 132, in discussing a similar instruction, observes:

"We are of opinion that this instruction is fatally defective, in that it ignores the question of contributory negligence on the part of each of the plaintiffs. The contributory negligence of each of these plaintiffs was relied on by the defendant as a ground of defense, and the evidence tended strongly to show that they were guilty of contributory negligence and that such negligence continued up to the time of the accident. This court has repeatedly sustained the objection taken to this instruction and held that where the contributory negligence of the plaintiff is relied on as a defense to an action of tort, and the evidence tends to support that view of the case, it is error to instruct the jury to find for the plaintiff if they believe the defendant was negligent, ignoring entirely the contributory negligence of the plaintiff."

[2] We have thus quoted at length from Judge Harrison's opinion, because what he says is as applicable to the case in judgment as it was to the case in which the opinion was delivered. Both cases involved injuries to passengers in automobiles from collisions with railway trains at public road crossings. The two cases are similar in their facts and indistinguishable in principal, and that case, upon the instruction, is decisive of this. Authorities to the same effect might be multiplied, but the above case sufficiently illustrates the doctrine we are considering. It also decides that—"It is equally well settled that the defect in this instruction is not cured by other instructions given by the court with respect to contributory negligence. That makes a case of contradictory instructions upon a material point, which would require the verdict to be set aside, as it cannot be said whether the jury were controlled by the one or the other."

A number of decisions are cited to sustain the last proposition.

This view renders it unnecessary to notice the remaining assignments of error, which either involve questions controlled by this ruling, or that are not likely to arise at the next trial.

Our conclusion is that the judgment under review must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial in conformity with the views herein expressed.

Reversed.

SIMS, J., absent.

(124 Va. 379)

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. ABEE'S ADM'R.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 16, 1919.)

1. RAILROADS \S 312(7)—WARNING SIGNALS—STATUTES—"HIGHWAY CROSSING."

A railroad crossing on extension of an alley from a street to a factory gate, recognized by the railway by the erection of a whistle post, held a "highway crossing" within Code 1904, \S 1294d, subd. 24, requiring engines to give warning signals on approaching highway crossings.

2. RAILROADS \S 312(1)—HIGHWAY CROSSINGS—NEGLIGENCE.

It is negligence for a railway company to run an engine at a high rate of speed without lights or warning over a highway crossing used by large numbers of persons.

3. RAILROADS \S 330(3)—HIGHWAY CROSSINGS—LIGHTS AND SIGNALS.

One who crosses a railroad track at a highway crossing after waiting for a train to pass may assume that any engine or train approaching on the adjacent track will carry lights and give proper signals.

4. RAILROADS \S 346(5)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—PRESUMPTION OF EXERCISE OF ORDINARY CARE.

It will be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that one killed by a railroad engine at a highway crossing was in the exercise of ordinary care.

5. RAILROADS \S 346(5)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where plaintiff's decedent was struck by a locomotive at a highway crossing, the burden of showing contributory negligence was on defendant, unless it was disclosed by plaintiff's own evidence, or fairly inferable from all the facts.

6. RAILROADS \S 312(4), 320—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—DUTY TO MAINTAIN LOOKOUT.

It is the duty of railroad employees running an engine and tender to exercise ordinary care and diligence in keeping a lookout to avoid persons crossing the tracks at a highway crossing, and to warn them of approaching danger.

7. TRIAL \S 296(3)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where decedent was killed by defendant's locomotive backing across a highway crossing, an instruction that defendant owed the duty of maintaining a lookout was not erroneous as leading jury to believe that a lookout in the rear of the tender should have been maintained, in view of instructions to disregard stricken evidence as to such lookout.

8. TRIAL \S 253(7)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where plaintiff's decedent was killed by a backing engine at a highway crossing, an instruction held not erroneous as directing a verdict on a partial view of the evidence.

Error to Circuit Court, Pittsylvania County.

Action by Loyd Abbee's administrator against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Leigh & Leigh, of Danville, for plaintiff in error.

B. H. Custer, of Danville, for defendant in error.

KELLY, J. On the 15th day of January, 1916, Loyd Abbee was killed at a crossing by a shifting engine owned and operated by the Southern Railway Company. His administrator brought this action alleging that his death was due to the negligence of the defendant company. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and thereupon the trial court rendered the judgment under review.

Stated briefly, and in general terms, the negligence complained of was that the engine approached the crossing at a reckless and dangerous rate of speed, in the dark, without lights, and without sounding the whistle or ringing the bell.

As to the most material facts and circumstances bearing upon these charges of negligence, the evidence is in glaring conflict; but the conflict has been conclusively settled for this court by the verdict of the jury. We must look at the case, so far as the facts are concerned, in the light of such of the evidence as tended materially to support the verdict; and, as thus portrayed, it is substantially as follows: The plaintiff's decedent, Loyd Abee, was a young man slightly over 20 years of age, of good habits, strong, active, and intelligent. He was physically well-developed, except that his hearing and power of speech were so limited that he could only utter a few familiar words, like digital numbers and family names, and could only hear loud sounds, like a nearby shout, a gunshot, a train bell or whistle. The accident occurred shortly before daylight, just outside the limits of the city of Danville. Abee lived in Danville, and was on his way to the Boatright furniture factory where he was regularly employed. In going there, like many other persons, he approached the railroad crossing through an alley extending from Stokes street to the gate entering the factory premises. Stokes street runs parallel with the railroad, and is about 160 feet west of the right of way. The crossing in question is between Stokes street and the factory, and the alley along which Abee was traveling crosses the railroad about at right angles. The railroad, which runs north and south at that point, is double-tracked, and trains pass there at frequent intervals, both day and night. Abee came east on the alley and had reached the crossing just as a south-bound passenger train was passing on the track next to him. Shortly after it passed, he crossed the first track, and had started across the second, when he was struck by the tender of a north-bound shifting engine, commonly known as a "shifter," which was moving backwards over the crossing. The conflict of evidence already adverted to is particularly marked as to: (a) The distance between the rear of the passenger train and the crossing when Abee crossed the south-bound track, (b) the rate of speed at which the shifter was moving, (c) the presence of signal lights thereon, (d) the distance from the crossing at which the shifter could have been seen by a man looking for it at that point, and (e) the sounding of the bell and whistle. These are vital and controlling facts, and the jury accepted the plaintiff's theory upon evidence which tended to show that, when Abee attempted to cross the track, the rear of the passenger train was some distance beyond the crossing, that the shifter was running downgrade at a speed of perhaps 30 miles or more an hour, without any lights, making very little noise by its movement, sounding no whistle or bell, and that in the darkness then prevailing the shifter itself was not visible until within a few feet of the crossing.

[1, 2] Taking up the assignments of error in the order of their importance, the first is that the court ought to have granted the defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence. We are of opinion that the motion was properly overruled. The negligence of the defendant company, viewing the evidence as upon a demurrer thereto, must be conceded. The Boatright alley, though owned by the furniture company, was in constant use by numbers of persons, employees of that company and others, who crossed the tracks there every day. The engineer and conductor in charge of the shifter both knew that the crossing was used every day by large numbers of persons at the very hour when the accident occurred; and there was evidence tending to show that the defendant company had recognized it as a highway crossing by the erection there of a "whistle post." It was clearly such a crossing as to fall within the letter and spirit of section 1294d(24) of the Code, requiring the sounding of the whistle and the ringing of the bell by all locomotive engines as a warning of their approach to highway crossings (N. & W. R. Co. v. Bristol, 116 Va. 955-962, 83 S. E. 421); and the case is not at all within the influence of the decision of this court in Washington, etc., Co. v. Fisher, 121 Va. 229, 92 S. E. 809, relied upon by counsel for the defendant company. That it was negligence to run the engine at a high rate of speed over this crossing without lights and without giving timely warning of its approach (all of which the jury may have properly believed was true from the evidence) is a proposition too plain for argument.

[3-5] Was the plaintiff's decedent guilty of contributory negligence? This question we think was likewise concluded by the verdict. We are unable to say, as a matter of law, that he was guilty of any negligence at all. That depends upon the same conflicting evidence which envelops the question of the defendant's primary negligence. There is no middle ground in the case. If, as contended by the railroad company, Abee crossed the south-bound track immediately after the passenger train had passed, and, without looking, stepped directly in front of an engine equipped with lights, giving the statutory signals, and running at a cautious rate of speed, then there was no negligence in the case at all except his own. On the other hand, if, as the plaintiff claims, the passenger train had passed some distance beyond the crossing, and if the engine was moving in the dark, at a dangerous speed, without sounding any warning, without any lights, then the only negligence which appears is that of the defendant. Abee had the right to assume that any engine or train then coming would carry lights and would give proper signals. If this engine had done these things, since the track was straight for a long distance from the crossing, Abee would certainly have discovered its presence if he exercised ordinary care, and this, in the absence of proof to the contrary, he is presumed to have done. The burden of showing his contributory negligence rested upon the defendant company. The trial court submitted this question to the jury upon an entirely correct instruction (plaintiffs No. 9), as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that as a general rule the burden of proof is on the defendant to show contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff if relied on as a ground of defense, unless contributory negligence of the plaintiff is disclosed by his own evidence or may be fairly inferred from all the facts and circumstances of the case." Southern Ry. Co. v. Bryant's Adm'r, 95 Va. 212, 220, 28 S. E. 183; Southern Ry. Co. v. Bruce's Adm'r, 97 Va. 92, 83 S. E. 548; Core v. Wilhelm, 98 S. E. 27, decided to-day.

The opinion of this court in So. Ry. Co. v. Mason, 119 Va. 256, 89 S. E. 225, cited and relied upon by counsel for the defendant company, is not in any way in conflict with the instruction here approved.

Certain witnesses, who are not contradicted by any direct testimony, stated that they could see Abee as he stood at the crossing while they were at some distance from him, and it is earnestly argued that, as nobody contradicted these witnesses, it necessarily follows, as a fact established without conflict, that Abee himself could see a like distance from the point at which he stood, and must therefore have been able to see the engine before it reached the crossing. There are two sufficient answers to this contention: First, that an electric light which stood near the intersection of Stokes street and Boatright alley threw a dim light down the alley on the crossing so as to probably make objects there visible without giving light to any appreciable distance on either side of the crossing; and, second, there was direct testimony that the engine could not be seen until it had arrived at the crossing, and that, after Abee was struck and his body had been carried a short distance from the crossing, the darkness was such as to make it necessary to strike matches and use lanterns before the persons who went to him could determine whether he was a white man or a negro.

[6] The next error assigned and discussed in the petition upon which this writ was awarded involves the action of the court in giving instructions 8 and 9 for the plaintiff. We have already quoted instruction 9, and cited the authorities which show that it was correct. Instruction 8 was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that it was the duty of the defendant's employes who were controlling the engine and tender on the morning of January 15, 1916, to have exercised ordinary care and diligence in keeping a lookout to avoid injury to the plaintiff's intestate and to warn him of approaching danger."

[7] In the light of the facts of this case as already stated, it is manifest that this instruction was free from error. The objection urged to it is that it tended to mislead the jury because during the course of the trial the plaintiff offered proof of an alleged rule of the company requiring the crew in charge to keep a man as a "lookout" on the rear of the tender; this proof having been at first allowed, and afterwards stricken out by the court. The contention here is that, because such evidence was first admitted and afterwards excluded, the giving of the instruction in question might have led the jury to believe that it was the duty of the company to have a man riding on the rear of the tender at the time of the accident. The court, in directing the jury to disregard the evidence about the rule, explicitly told them that the rule did not apply to the case on trial, and we are unable to appreciate the force of the objection to the instruction under consideration. As an independent proposition, it was entirely correct, and the introduction of the proof in question, in view of the express terms in which it was afterwards stricken out, could not in any reasonable probability have caused the jury to misunderstand the instruction.

The defendant asked the court to give two instructions, respectively designated as "B" and "C," which the court gave as requested, except that it added to each the words, "the approach of which could have been seen by him if he had looked in that direction," appearing in italics in the instructions as here set out.

Instruction B:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that, when Loyd Abee approached the tracks of the Southern Railway Company at Boatright's Crossing, a train on the Danville & Western Railroad Company was passing over said crossing on the south-bound track going south; that said Loyd Abee stopped to allow said train to pass, and, immediately after said train had passed, proceeded over said south-bound track in the rear of said train and on to the north-bound track, immediately in front of an engine and tender moving on said north-bound track, the approach of which could have been seen by him, if he had looked in that direction, and that when he stepped upon said north-bound track he was so near to said engine and tender that it could not, in the exercise of ordinary care, have been stopped in time to have avoided striking him—then they should find for the defendant in this action." (Italics added.)

Instruction G:

"The court instructs the jury that it is not the duty of the engineer of a railroad engine or train to stop when he sees a person standing near the track in a place of safety. He has the right to assume that the person will not go upon the track in front of a moving engine or train in plain view but will remain in a place of safety, and the duty of the engineer to stop his train or slow down does not arise until the engineer sees that the person is about to go upon the track in front of his engine or train, and if the jury believe from the evidence that Loyd Abee was standing near the track in a place of safety, and then went upon the track in front of the engine and train of the Southern Railway Company, the approach of which could have been seen by him if he had looked in that direction, and so near thereto that it could not be stopped in time to avoid injuring him, then the said Loyd Abee was guilty of such negligence on his part as bars a recovery in this action, and they should find for the defendant in this suit." (Italics added.)

[8] It is urged that the court erred in adding the italicized words to each of these instructions; but we are of opinion that the addition was entirely proper, and that both would have been misleading and erroneous without such addition. The purpose of both instructions was to present to the jury the defendant's theory that the plaintiff had blindly and negligently walked in front of a moving engine, but they ignored the plain-hear the engine because of the defendant's own breach of duty. Thus, the instruction B as offered told the jury that they must find for the defendant if Loyd Abee stepped on tiff's contention that he could neither see nor the track in front of the engine after it was too late for the engine to be stopped in time to avoid the accident (the very thing the plaintiff admits, but charges to the default of defendant), leaving out entirely the plaintiff's theory that Abee could not have seen or heard the engine up to the time when he went on the track. In other words, the instruction peremptorily directed a verdict for the defendant upon a partial view of the evidence, which this court has repeatedly held to be reversible error. Washington So. Ry. Co. v. Grimes' Adm'r, 98 S. E. 30, decided to-day.

Instruction G, as offered, apparently started out with the assumption that the plaintiff's decedent could see the engine; but, when it came to the proposition upon which it told the jury to find for the defendant, it omitted that assumption, and thus became amenable to the same fault which vitiated instruction B as offered.

We have discussed the only errors assigned in the petition. In the reply brief, the action of the trial court as to some of the other instructions is attacked, and, while this is not a sufficient assignment of error, we have considered all the questions thus made, and are of opinion that the court committed no error in regard to any of them.

The judgment is affirmed.
Affirmed.

(124 Va. 296)

PAYNE v. BUENA VISTA EXTRACT CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 16, 1919.)

1. QUIETING TITLE ⇨23—CLOUD ON TITLE—POSSESSION AND LEGAL SEISIN.

Prior to Pollard's Code 1904, § 2728, one could not maintain bill quia timet to remove cloud on title, unless having the legal title and the actual possession; and under such section he could not do so unless having the legal seisin, undisturbed by the possession of another, unless for some special reason the remedy by ejectment was inadequate.

2. ESTOPPEL ⇨68(2)—POSITION IN JUDICIAL PROCEEDING—QUIETING TITLE.

Maintenance of suit quia timet to remove cloud on title could not be justified on the theory that plaintiff's legal seisin was undisturbed, notwithstanding defendant's actual possession, because of defendant's claim to be a vendee of plaintiff's grantor, and the rule that the entry and possession of a vendee is tolled against his vendor and those in privity of estate with the vendor; plaintiff having throughout the litigation denied existence of any contract of sale to defendant.

3. QUIETING TITLE ⇨23—CLOUD ON TITLE—POSSESSION—WHITE ACT.

Bill quia timet to remove cloud on title can, under the White Act, amending Pollard's Code 1904, § 3058, be maintained, though plaintiff be not in possession, if otherwise it could be maintained.

4. QUIETING TITLE ⇨19—CLOUD ON TITLE—EXERCISE OF JURISDICTION—DISCRETION.

Exercise of jurisdiction to remove cloud on title by bill quia timet is discretionary, where plaintiff has legal title and actual possession, only when there is doubt whether there is such a cloud that injury may reasonably be apprehended therefrom.

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇨70(3)—JUDICIAL FUNCTIONS—POLICY OF LAW.

The Legislature having power to authorize bill quia timet to remove cloud on title, though defendant be in possession, the argument of policy against a law so doing cannot avail with the court.

6. JUDGMENT §570(12)—“DISCONTINUANCE”—EFFECT.

Under Pollard's Code 1904, § 3312, providing that a pending case, wherein for more than five years there has been no order or proceeding except to continue it, may be ordered struck from the docket, and it shall thereby be “discontinued,” such order is not a bar to a subsequent suit for the same cause; a “discontinuance” being in effect a nonsuit, which simply puts an end to the present action.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Discontinuance.]

7. JUDGMENT §562—RES JUDICATA—JUDGMENT ON MERITS.

A final order, to be a bar to a subsequent suit on the same cause of action, must be on the merits.

8. JUDGMENT §570(16)—BAR—DISMISSAL—RETRAXIT.

An order of dismissal is not a retraxit, which is a bar to another action for the same cause.

9. JUDGMENT §562—CONCLUSIVENESS OF JUDGMENT—STATUTE.

The judgment in ejectment, which Pollard's Code 1904, § 2756, provides shall be conclusive as to the title or right of possession established in the action, is one on the merits.

10. VENDOR AND PURCHASER §221—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—POSSESSION UNDER UNRECORDED CONTRACT—STATUTE.

Amendment of Code 1887, § 2465, by Acts 1895-96, c. 758 (Pollard's Code 1904, § 2465), by addition of proviso that possession of any estate without notice shall not be notice to a subsequent purchaser for value, affected possession under unrecorded contract existing at the time of the amendment, as regards subsequent purchasers, so that such possession was not constructive notice, as it was before the amendment.

11. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §109—VESTED RIGHTS—CHANGING RULE OF EVIDENCE—POSSESSION AS CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE.

Amendment of Code 1887, § 2465, by Acts 1895-96, c. 758 (Pollard's Code 1904, § 2465), that as to subsequent purchasers possession of land under unrecorded contract was not constructive notice, did not divest one then in such possession of any vested right of property; it merely changing a pre-existing rule of evidence.

Appeal from Circuit Court of City of Lynchburg.

Bill quia timet by the Buena Vista Extract Company against T. O. Payne. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This suit in equity was instituted in the court below by the appellee, which will be hereinafter designated the Extract Company, against the appellant, who will be hereinafter designated as Payne, by a bill quia timet to remove an alleged cloud upon the title to a certain tract of uninclosed wild mountain land, of certain boundaries supposed to contain over 300 acres, which will be hereinafter designated the 300-acre tract.

The Extract Company and Payne both claim title to the 300-acre tract as derived from a common source, namely, Henry Loving, executor of John Thompson, deceased, hereinafter designated Loving.

Payne's claim of title rests upon a deed to him from A. W. Fitzgerald and wife, of date May 19, 1905, duly recorded May 23, 1905, conveying the 300-acre tract, and upon an alleged executory contract in writing between Loving and A. W. Fitzgerald and his father, evidencing a purchase by the two latter from Loving of a tract of land of definite boundaries, but of uncertain acreage, hereinafter designated the 375-acre tract, which included the said 300-acre tract within its bounds. There is evidence in the cause that A. W. Fitzgerald was let into actual possession, under said contract, of a part of such 375-acre tract outside the bounds of the 300-acre parcel thereof, and that he from time to time exercised acts of ownership over the 300-acre tract, such as the cutting of timber therefrom, from some time in 1880 until the execution of said deed to Payne, and, indeed, afterwards down to the institution of the suit now before us, and after that, as will be hereinafter again mentioned, claiming the equitable title to the whole of this land under said contract as color of title.

There was another claim of title by A. W. Fitzgerald to a portion of said 375-acre tract, to wit, a parcel of 43 acres of it, not embraced in said 300-acre parcel, which it is not material, however, to further mention.

There is much conflict in the evidence in the cause over the questions of fact mentioned in the preceding paragraphs, but it will be assumed that the preponderance of the evidence shows that the contract mentioned existed; that a valuable consideration therefor existed (consisting of a giving up by the Fitzgeralds to Loving of the possession of a parcel of land as to which there was a controversy between such parties), and that other circumstances existed, not material to be mentioned, which made the contract valid and binding upon Loving and upon all subsequent purchasers from him with actual or constructive notice of such contract; and that A. W. Fitzgerald was in the actual possession aforesaid of a part of the 375-acre tract of land, claiming the right to hold possession of the whole of it under said contract as color of title, as aforesaid, at the time that the Extract Company first purchased and obtained its deed to its land hereinafter more particularly mentioned, and at the time the latter obtained its second deed to the same land, as will be also hereinafter more particularly set forth.

Payne makes no claim of title to said 300-acre tract of land as acquired by adverse possession of himself or of those under whom he claims title thereto.

The contract aforesaid was never recorded.

The Extract Company, as a complete purchaser for value thereof, derived title to a larger tract of land, which included in its boundaries the said 375-acre tract, by successive deeds, as follows (the full names of some grantors and grantees being omitted, as immaterial):

Loving to Rittenhouse, of date October 16, 1883.

Rittenhouse to Whelen, of date October 19, 1883.

Whelen to Buena Vista Extract Company, December 9, 1903.

Buena Vista Extract Company, to Leas & McVitty, December 14, 1906.

Leas & McVitty back to Buena Vista Extract Company, April 1, 1910.

The testimony in the cause of A. W. Fitzgerald is that Whelen, at the time of the purchase by and the conveyance aforesaid to the latter, had no notice of Fitzgerald's claim of equitable title. But according to the preponderance of the evidence in the cause Whelen was afterwards informed of such claim, and, as shown by the record, he instituted an action of ejectment against A. W. Fitzgerald to recover said 375-acre tract of land by declaration filed at the second January rules, 1901, with a statement that mesne profits were demanded for the unlawful use and occupation of such land, for five years next preceding the filing of the statement, of a certain sum per year, and also certain damages for shingles, tan bark, locust plins, and other timber alleged to have been unlawfully taken from the land. The defendant entered a plea of not guilty. On July 31, 1908, the following order was entered in that case:

"Alfred Whelen v. A. W. Fitzgerald.

"In Ejectment.

"It appearing to the court that no order has been entered in this case for more than five years, upon motion of the defendant it is ordered that it be stricken from the docket."

On December 10, 1908, the following other order was entered by the same court in which said action of ejectment was instituted as aforesaid:

"Alfred Whelen v. A. W. Fitzgerald.

"This day came the Buena Vista Company, by its attorneys, and, representing to the court that it has purchased the title of the plaintiff to the lands in litigation here, who has conveyed the same to said Buena Vista Extract Company by deed, moved the court that this cause, which, by order entered at the July term, 1908, was stricken from the docket, no order therein having been entered for more than five years, be reinstated and hereafter proceeded in the name of said Buena Vista Extract Company. And, counsel for defendant being absent from court, it is ordered that this motion be docketed and continued to the first day of the next term."

On July 24, 1916, after the cause before us was instituted, the following further order was entered by the court last named:

"Alfred Whelen v. A. W. Fitzgerald.

"In Ejectment.

"On motion of Buena Vista Extract Company, by counsel, the motion heretofore (on December 10, 1908) made by said Buena Vista Extract Company that this cause be reinstated upon the docket and be hereinafter proceeded in in its name, which was then docketed and continued, is now dismissed."

The cause before us was instituted on November 4, 1915. At that time the plaintiff in such suit was not in actual possession of said 300-acre tract, or any part of it. It was not in the actual occupancy even of any part of its larger tract of land, so far as the record discloses. The only acts of possession of the Extract Company shown by the record consisted in the patrol of its larger body of land, including the 300-acre tract, by rangers who passed over parts of such land at intervals of several months, and whose duties were to report any trespassing discovered and to protect the timber against fire.

Moreover, A. W. Fitzgerald was then still in actual occupancy of something less than 43 acres of said 375-acre tract, claiming the equitable title to the residue, which consisted of said 300-acre tract, under the above-mentioned contract, under which he had originally taken such actual possession as aforesaid. He still held such possession under such claim and color of title, as he testifies, in substance, in the cause, notwithstanding the said deed from himself and wife to Payne, because under an agreement between himself and Payne, he (Fitzgerald) still remained the beneficial owner of said 300-acre tract after such deed was made. This testimony was given in the presence of Payne, who did not testify, or introduce any evidence in the cause, to the contrary; and there is other evidence in the cause tending to prove such continued beneficial ownership in A. W. Fitzgerald.

Further mention of material facts will be found in the opinion below.

Volney E. Howard, of Lynchburg, for appellant.

Wm. A. Anderson, of Lexington, for appellee.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above). Among the questions presented by the assignments of error, those involving the construction of the statute law of the state in the particulars hereinafter mentioned are novel in this jurisdiction and of exceptional interest and importance. We are indebted to the learned and able arguments of counsel on both sides of the cause, and we will consider and determine the questions presented in their order as stated below.

The first question we have to consider is this:

1. Did the court below have jurisdiction of this suit in equity by bill quia timet to remove a cloud upon the title to the 300-acre tract of land mentioned in the above statement?

We are of opinion that, under the statute presently to be cited, this question must be answered in the affirmative.

The Extract Company takes the positions: (a) That such jurisdiction existed independently of statute, because it was in possession of the 300-acre tract of land, and for that reason could not maintain an action of ejectment; and that, if this be not so (b) such jurisdiction was conferred by what is designated as the "White Act," enacted February 20, 1912, amending section 3058 of the Code, and contained in Acts 1912, pp. 76-78, and 4 Pollard's Code, § 3058.

[1] (a) Now, it is true that, if the Extract Company, at the time it instituted this suit, had had actual possession of the 300-acre tract of land (having, as it did, the legal title to the land), it could have maintained this suit without the aid of the statute next above mentioned, because, in such case, such plaintiff would have had no remedy at law by action of ejectment (Hogg's Eq. Pr. § 46, pp. 82, 83); but it appears from the statement of facts preceding this opinion that it did not have such actual possession. It is also true that under the statute in Virginia (Pollard's Code 1904, § 2726), if the Extract Company at such time had had the legal seisin of the land, undisturbed by any actual possession of another, it might have maintained such suit against the defendant, Payne, as a "person claiming title thereto," without the aid of the White Act. Stearns v. Harman, 80 Va. 48, 54, 55; McNamara v. Boyd, 112 Va. 145, 70 S. E. 694. But the Extract Company and those under whom it claimed and derived title had their legal seisin of said land disturbed by the actual possession of A. W. Fitzgerald, set forth in the statement preceding this opinion, taken and held under the claim of equitable title also set forth in such statement. Legal seisin will not support the equity jurisdiction to remove clouds from title, where the plaintiff is not in actual possession, unless the possession be vacant. 2 Story's Eq. Jur. (13th Ed.) note on p. 11.

[2] The rule of the common law that the entry and possession of a vendee is tolled as against his vendor and those in privity of estate with the latter does not differentiate the cause before us; for the position of the Extract Company throughout this litigation has been that it denied the existence of any contract of sale to the Fitzgeralds. Therefore it could not have taken the position in a bill quia timet that A. W. Fitzgerald was a vendee of its predecessor in title, and that for that reason its legal seisin was undisturbed. Hence the Extract Company could not have maintained a suit quia timet in the premises on the jurisdictional ground that it had undisturbed legal seisin of the land.

The Extract Company therefore had its remedy at law by action of ejectment to try the title to and to recover the possession of said land; and so far as appears from the allegations of the bill or the evidence in the cause, such remedy was complete and adequate. No allegation is made in the bill of any impending injury or damage, to redress which the remedy at law aforesaid was inadequate. Therefore, prior to the White Act, the Extract Company could not have maintained this suit to remove a cloud from its title, on the jurisdictional ground that it had no remedy at law by action of ejectment, nor on the ground that that remedy was inadequate.

[3] (b) We come now to the consideration of the question whether under the White Act this suit can be maintained?

This act, so far as material, is as follows:

" * * * Whenever the circuit and corporation courts have jurisdiction on the chancery side to remove clouds from title to real estate by bill quia timet, in case the party filing such bill were in possession of such real estate, such courts shall have jurisdiction to maintain such a bill whether the party filing the same be in possession of such real estate or not. And any suit now pending to remove clouds from title, in which a final decree has not been entered, which, but for this act, would be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, shall be retained by the court and proceeded in as if brought after this act. * * *"

This statute, therefore, confers a jurisdiction on the courts mentioned which they did not possess as the law was before the enactment of the statute; and it confers such jurisdiction in all cases of bills quia timet, where the plaintiff is not in possession of the real estate affected, in suits instituted in one of the courts mentioned, where that court would have had jurisdiction of the case, as the law stood prior to the act, if the plaintiff had been in possession of such real estate at the time the suit was brought; in other words, the statute confers such jurisdiction in such a suit in all cases where the court, but for the act, would, under the law as it stood aforesaid, have to dismiss the suit on the sole ground that the plaintiff was not in possession of the real estate affected at the time the suit was instituted. Such a dismissal of such a suit on such ground was plainly what the act, in the language of it above quoted, sought to prevent. That was the mischief in the pre-existing law which this part of the statute meant to cure, as is manifest from the language used.

The statute leaves undisturbed the jurisdiction of suits by bills quia timet as it existed prior thereto, in cases where the plaintiff is in possession of the real estate affected at the time of suit brought. And we are not concerned in the cause before us with any consideration of the situations in which such a plaintiff may maintain a suit in equity on other grounds than that of removing a cloud from his title, such as to avoid a multiplicity of suits or to enjoin a trespasser; nor, indeed, are we here concerned, beyond what is said above, with the question of when a plaintiff not in possession of real estate may maintain a suit in equity to remove clouds upon the title or to enjoin a trespasser, although the plaintiff may have the legal title to the land, on the ground that his remedy at law is inadequate; nor with the question of when a plaintiff in or out of such possession may maintain a suit in equity to remove a cloud from his title on the ground that his title is equitable, which last named jurisdiction is the subject of a portion of the White Act that is not involved in the cause before us. Our consideration of the subject in hand, therefore, is confined to the new jurisdiction conferred on the courts aforesaid by that portion of the White Act which is above quoted.

Now, prior to the White Act, the courts mentioned had jurisdiction on the chancery side to remove clouds from title to real estate in all suits by bills quia timet, where the plaintiff held the legal title to such real estate and was in actual possession of it, if the deed, or other instrument or proceeding sought to be canceled, in truth constituted a cloud upon the title, as does the deed to Payne in the cause before us. 4 Pomeroy's Eq. (3d Ed.) § 1398; Hogg's Eq. Pr. § 46, pp. 82-85; 1 Barton's Ch. Pr. (2d Ed.) pp. 299, 300; Carroll v. Brown, 28 Grat. (69 Va.) 791; Steinman v. Vicars, 99 Va. 598, 39 S. E. 227; Va. Coal & Iron Co. v. Kelly, 93 Va. 332, 24 S. E. 1020; Kane v. Va. Coal & Iron Co., 97 Va. 329, 33 S. E. 627; Smith v. Thomas, 99 Va. 86, 37 S. E. 784. The ground upon which this jurisdiction rests in such class of cases, as appears from the authorities on the subject, is that injury from the continued existence of the cloud upon the title is reasonably apprehended by the plaintiff, and that, being in possession of the real estate affected, he cannot maintain an action of ejectment to try the title, and hence he is, in such case, without any remedy whatsoever at law, and the injury would be irreparable, but for the remedy in equity. In some of such cases it may be a matter of some doubt whether the instrument or proceeding which is alleged to be a cloud upon the title is in truth such a cloud thereon that the plaintiff may reasonably apprehend injury therefrom, as where doubt exists as to whether an instrument is so apparently void on its face that it creates no cloud on the title. 2 Story's Eq. Jur. (13th Ed.) §§ 698-710. And it is to the question of the reasonableness of the apprehended injury from the alleged cloud upon the title that Mr. Barton refers on page 284 of his valuable work (1 Barton's Ch. Pr. [1881 Ed.]), where, in reference to the relief by bill quia timet, he says:

"The application of this species of relief is addressed to the sound discretion of the court under the circumstances of the particular case, and relief will ordinarily be afforded where injury may reasonably be apprehended; the ground for such relief resting upon the danger of irreparable mischief."

Mr. Barton cites, to support such text, 3 Daniell's Chy. Pr. (4th Am. Ed.) 1961, note, and Story's Eq. Jurisprudence (13th Ed.) supra, § 710.

[4] The quotation next above is cited and relied on for the appellant, Payne, to sustain the position that prior to the White Act the courts mentioned did not have jurisdiction to remove clouds from title to real estate in all suits by bills quia timet, where the plaintiff held the legal title to such real estate and was in actual possession thereof at the time of suit brought; it being urged that such jurisdiction exists only where its exercise is allowed in the sound discretion of the court. The exercise of such jurisdiction was (and is) undoubtedly in the sound discretion of such courts, when the reality of the apprehended danger of injury from the alleged cloud upon the title is in question, as aforesaid, but not otherwise. If, as in the instant cause, there be no doubt upon the point of the reality of such apprehended danger—if it be a real cloud upon the title which exists—and the plaintiff has the legal title to the land and the actual possession of it, the courts mentioned in every such case have the jurisdiction under consideration and had it prior to the White Act. And prior to the White Act it was precisely when such a case was alleged in the pleading that it was held that, if—

"upon the hearing of the cause the evidence failed to show his [the plaintiff's] possession, the bill would be dismissed for want of jurisdiction in a court of equity." Smith v. Thomas, 99 Va. at page 87, 37 S. E. 784, citing a number of Virginia cases, including those above cited.

[5] The ancient landmarks of the exclusive jurisdiction at law to settle controverted boundaries of land and to try the title thereto by action of ejectment, and the ill effects that may flow from the disruption of so many established principles as would result from the allowance of a bill to be maintained to try the title to land under the guise of removing a cloud from the title thereto, are urged by the appellant, Payne, upon our consideration, and the following other authorities are cited and relied upon in that connection, viz.: Sulphur Mines Co. v. Boswell, 94 Va. 480, 485, 27 S. E. 24; Litz v. Rowe, etc., 117 Va. 752, 757, 86 S. E. 155, L. R. A. 1916B, 799; Deane v. Turner, 113 Va. 237-239, 74 S. E. 185; Callaway v. Webster, 98 Va. 790, 791, 792, 37 S. E. 276; Collins v. Sutton, 94 Va. 127, 128, 26 S. E. 415. But these authorities merely lay down the established rules governing the subject of the jurisdiction of courts of law and chancery independent of statute. The power of the Legislature over the subject is, confessedly, plenary. It has acted in the matter by the enactment of the statute under consideration in plain and unambiguous terms. That statute, therefore, must, from the time it went into effect, govern the subject. The argument touching the policy of such a statute must be addressed to the legislative branch of the government. The courts cannot afford relief in the premises.

We may remark, however, that the statutory suit authorized by the White Act is, as far as it goes, viz. to the extent of authorizing suits to remove clouds from title, substantially the same as the statutory suits to quiet titles which have been authorized in a number of other states. As said in 4 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 1396, this "in many states is the ordinary mode of trying titles." And he adds:

"The states adopting such statutes may be separated into two classes; the first and most numerous class requiring the plaintiff to be in possession, and the second allowing the action to be brought by a plaintiff either in or out of possession."

In section 1397 of this valuable work the same learned author says:

"* * * Possession is not required in states of the second class. The action may therefore be brought here in cases where a party at common law would be left to his remedy by ejectment. Several of the statutes in express terms allow the action to be brought to remove clouds from title; others are sufficiently general to include this as well as other adverse claims."

We may also mention that the Virginia statute, in a portion of it not above quoted, provides for a jury trial, by issue out of chancery, of any issue which, but for the act, would have entitled any party to a trial by jury, upon motion of such party. However, the verdict does not have the same effect as in an action at law, but only of verdicts in ordinary issues out of chancery.

It follows, from what is said above, that we are of opinion that the Extract Company had the right and option to institute its action of ejectment under the common-law rule on the subject, or its suit in equity, as it has done, under the White Act aforesaid.

2. Did the former pendency of the action of ejectment (set forth in the statement preceding this opinion), involving the same 300-acre tract now involved in this cause, wherein a predecessor in title of the Extract Company was plaintiff, and A. W. Fitzgerald, a predecessor in title of Payne, was defendant, and the order of court entered under what is generally designated as the five-year rule of the statute (section 3312 of the Code), directing that such action "be stricken from the docket," operate as a bar or estoppel to the institution or maintenance of the cause now before us?

We are of opinion that such question must be answered in the negative.

It is urged by the appellant, Payne, that said order "was such a final termination of the matter in litigation as [will] estop the plaintiff in that action and his privies, who acquired their interests after the commencement of that suit, from asserting the same claim in a subsequent suit," and section 2756 of the Code is referred to in this connection.

[6] Section 3312 of the Code, under which said order was entered, is as follows:

"Any court in which is pending a case wherein for more than five years there has been no order or proceeding except to continue it, may, in its discretion, order it to be struck from its docket; and it shall thereby be discontinued. A court making such order may direct it to be published in such newspaper as it may designate. Any such case may be reinstated, on motion, within one year from the date of such order, but not after. (Code 1849, p. 657, c. 173, § 7.)"

By the express terms of the statute, the order operated upon the pendency of the suit or action, and the authority thereby given the court extends no farther than to "order it to be struck from the docket." And as to what shall be the effect of such order, the statute itself provides that "it [the case or cause] shall thereby be discontinued."

Now, the term "discontinuance" has a well-settled meaning in the law, and has had from a very ancient time. "A discontinuance is 'in effect a nonsuit.'" Burks, Plead. & Pr. p. 598. To the same effect, 2 Chitty's Blackstone, p. 296; Muse v. Farmers' Bank of Va., 27 Grat. (68 Va.) 257; Doan v. Bush, 130 Ark. 566, 198 S. W. 261, L. R. A. 1918B, 525, 527. "The effect of a nonsuit is simply to put an end to the present action, but is no bar to a subsequent action for the same cause." Burks, Plead. & Pr. p. 596.

The cases of Echols' Ex'r v. Brennan, 99 Va. 150, 37 S. E. 786, Jones v. Turner, 81 Va. 709, and Battalle v. Maryland Hospital, 76 Va. 63, are cited and relied on by appellant. The first-named case, however, on the point under consideration, involved only the question of whether a cause dismissed under said statute can be reinstated on the docket and be further proceeded in after the expiration of the period allowed for such reinstatement by the statute. The other two cases last cited involved the question whether a final decree (not under section 3312) dismissing the cause can be set aside, except on a bill of review in the court which rendered it, or by appeal, and that within the time limited by the general statute on these subjects. None of these cases involved or decided the question which we have under consideration, namely, of the effect of a final decree or order upon the rights of the parties to the suit or action in which it is entered, when such rights are in controversy in a subsequent and different suit or action between the same parties.

The recent case of Snead v. Atkinson, 121 Va. 182, 92 S. E. 835, not cited in argument, involved the question whether a decree is void which is entered on proceedings by petition in a cause, subsequent to the order of dismissal thereof under the five-year rule and statute aforesaid, without any reinstatement of the cause on the docket. It was held in such case that the order of dismissal was final, and put an end to all further proceedings in that cause, until and unless the cause was reinstated on the docket, and that the subsequent decree therein was void. But that holding, likewise, did not touch the question which we have now under consideration in the cause before us.

[7] The question last mentioned must be resolved by the application of the rule of res adjudicata, where the cause of action and the parties or their privies are the same in the subsequent proceeding as in that in which the final decree or order was entered, but the suits or actions are not the same, which is the situation as presented by the cause before us. This rule is well settled. One essential factor for the application of such rule, it is true, is that there must have been a final decree or order in the former proceeding. But this is not of itself sufficient to make the rule applicable. There is another factor, the existence of which is equally essential to render the decree or order in a former proceeding a bar to a subsequent suit or action on the same cause of action by the same parties or their privies, and that is this: Such final decree or order must have been entered "on the merits." Steinman v. Clinchfield Coal Corp., 121 Va. 611, 619, 93 S. E. 684, and authorities cited. This is a well-established exception to the general rule that a final decree or order in a proceeding puts an end, as between the parties thereto and their privies, to all subsequent litigation over the same claim or demand, whether pleaded or litigated in the first proceeding or not, if it might have been so pleaded and litigated.

[8] An order of retraxit has the effect contended for by appellant, Payne. Burks, Plead. & Pr. p. 590. But such an order, in truth, goes to the merits of the case, because it is based on the renunciation by the plaintiff of his cause of action; and an order or decree dismissing an action or suit "agreed" has the same effect, but that is because such an order imports that the dismissal is on the merits by stipulation of the parties. Hoover v. Mitchell, 25 Grat. (66 Va.) 387; Doan v. Bush, supra, 130 Ark. 566, 198 S. W. 261, L. R. A. 1918B, 523-525. The mere dismissal of a case "is not a retraxit, but stands on the same footing as a nonsuit, and does not bar another action for the same cause." Burks, Plead. & Pr. 590; Cahoon v. McCulloch, 92 Va. 177, 23 S. E. 225.

[9] The judgment referred to in section 2756 of the Code, relied on for appellant, Payne, as above noted, is a judgment on the merits.

Now, the order in the ejectment suit was unquestionably a final order, and put an end to all further proceedings in that case, as the case was neither reinstated on the docket (nor any motion made therefor after notice to the opposite party) within the statutory period allowed for such reinstatement. But, not being an order on the merits of the case in which it was entered, the effect of such final order was merely to put an end to further proceedings in that case. It could not and did not have any effect upon the rights of the same parties not adjudicated therein, which are involved in a subsequent litigation between them in a different cause.

We will say, in passing, that the question whether, in such a case, a motion to reinstate, if made on legal notice to the opposite party, before the expiration of the year, but which is not acted on until after the expiration of the year period mentioned in the statute, will prevent the bar of the statute, if then favorably acted upon, is not presented by the cause before us, and hence is not passed upon by us.

[10, 11] 3. By the statute law of Virginia (section 2465 of the Code), as it stood when and after the contract was entered into between Loving, the predecessor in title of the Extract Company, and A. W. Fitzgerald, the predecessor in title to Payne, the possession of Fitzgerald under that contract, set forth in the statement preceding this opinion, until the Act of March 4, 1896 (Acts 1895-96, p. 842), went into effect, and again after that act was repealed by Acts 1897-98, p. 834, until the act of January 15, 1900 (Acts 1899-1900, p. 89), went into effect, was constructive notice of the rights of A. W. Fitzgerald under said contract to subsequent purchasers for value, the same in effect as the notice which is imputed by the recording acts. Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. 813, 50 Am. St. Rep. 846.

Section 2465 of the Code, so far as material, then read as follows:

"Every such contract in writing * * * shall be void as to subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, * * * until and except from the time that it is duly admitted to record in the county or corporation wherein the property embraced in such contract * * * may be."

By the Acts 1895-96, p. 842, section 2465 of the Code was amended by the addition of the following language:

"Provided, that the possession of any * * * estate or term, without notice or other evidence of title, shall not be notice to said subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration."

It is a part of the well-known history of the subject in this state that such proviso was enacted to change the rule announced in Chapman v. Chapman, supra.

This proviso was omitted from the amendment of the statute by Acts 1897-98, p. 834, but was restored by the act amending the same statute in Acts 1899-1900, p. 89, so that long before the deed from Whelen to the Extract Company, of date December 9, 1903, and before the second deed to the Extract Company from Leas & McVitty of date April 1, 1910, set forth in the statement of facts preceding this opinion, the rule of Chapman v. Chapman had been abolished by the statutory provision aforesaid, and the said possession of A. W. Fitzgerald did not operate to give the Extract Company constructive notice of the alleged rights of A. W. Fitzgerald under the contract aforesaid, unless the statute was inoperative or invalid as to contracts in existence prior to such enactment.

The positions of appellant, Payne, in his petition for appeal, are in substance as follows:

(a) That, if properly construed, the statute in question, as amended, does not affect contracts in existence prior to its enactment; that to so construe the statute would make it retroactive, which is never done, unless such an intent is plainly expressed, which is denied of this statute; and, if this position be not sound—

(b) That, as the law was when A. W. Fitzgerald took the possession aforesaid under said contract, he acquired a vested right of property under the doctrine of Chapman v. Chapman, aforesaid, that this vested right continued to inhere in A. W. Fitzgerald until he transmitted it from himself to the appellant, Payne, and that A. W. Fitzgerald could not have been divested of such right by the recording act aforesaid; that the latter contains no saving clause to owners of land who had acquired their rights under the law as it previously existed; that it provides no method by which such owners might put on record their claim to previously acquired rights, as, for instance, it fails to provide for the recordation or the filing of notice of claims under contracts for land which have not been acknowledged for recordation; that it was not within the power of Fitzgerald to have had his contract acknowledged for recordation after the enactment of the statute, for the reasons herein-after more particularly mentioned; and that when this new recording act was enacted Fitzgerald had been in possession of this land under his written contract for a period of 16 years, and that to construe this statute so as to deprive him of these rights, or the rights of transmission of the same to others, would be nothing short of confiscation.

These positions raise for our determination the questions which will be passed upon in their order as stated below.

4. Does the new recording statute (section 2465, as amended) under consideration affect contracts in existence prior to its enactment?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

We are of opinion that the purpose and meaning of this statute, as amended, is to provide that on and after it took effect, and so long as it remained in force, the mere possession aforesaid should not operate to give the constructive notice aforesaid in lieu of recordation of the contracts therein mentioned, so that the original and preceding portion of the statute (section 2465) would thereupon become operative upon all contracts of the kind mentioned in the statute, and every such contract would "be void as to subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, * * * until and except from the time that it is duly admitted to record in the county or corporation wherein the property embraced in such contract * * * may be," as provided in such preceding portion of the statute.

Such construction of the new recording statute may result in its affecting some contracts in existence prior to its enactment, but not necessarily so. Only those contracts which are not recorded as required by the statute prior to the acquisition of rights by purchasers for value and without notice are affected by the statute. The purchasers who are protected by such statute are future purchasers only. So that in no true sense can the statute be said to be retroactive in its operation.

The practical operation of the statute as amended as aforesaid was to give said A. W. Fitzgerald, from the time of its first enactment, March 4, 1896, until the Extract Company obtained its first deed, December 9, 1903—a period of over 7 years—within which to comply with such statute by recording said contract, before any rights of the Extract Company as a purchaser for value attached under such statute. Similarly, a period of nearly 14 years was given for such purpose before the second deed of the Extract Company was obtained on April 1, 1910.

We come now to the consideration of the following questions:

5. Did the recording statute under consideration in its effect upon the contract aforesaid divest A. W. Fitzgerald of any vested right of property? And was the statute for that reason invalid?

These questions must be answered in the negative.

The statute merely changed a pre-existing rule of evidence.

As said in State v. King, 64 W. Va. 546, 63 S. E. 468:

"The Legislature can, without infraction of the Constitution, * * * change the rules of evidence, * * * even as to pre-existing contracts and rights, provided it does not destroy the contract or right. Cooley's Const. Lim. 286, 288, 361. 'The right to have one's controversies determined by existing rules of evidence is not a vested right.' Cooley's Const. Lim. 367. Cooley says these rules go to remedy, and do not constitute a part of the contract, and cannot be regarded as of the same essence of any right, which a party may enforce. Dequasie v. Harris, 16 W. Va. 345. 'There is no vested right in a rule of evidence, and, as such rules only affect the remedy, it is within the constitutional power of the Legislature to modify them.' 6 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 950. See cases cited in Marx v. Hanthorn, 148 U. S. 181 [13 Sup. Ct. 508, 37 L. Ed. 410]. See Burk v. Putnam [118 Iowa, 232, 84 N. W. 1053] 86 Am. St. Rep. 372 and note."

Recordation statutes have for their purpose the better security and repose of titles, and they—"may postpone one who voluntarily neglects to avail himself of registry acts, which enable him to give notice to all the world of his claim, to the claim of a subsequent purchaser who acted on the faith of a public record." Connecticut Mutual Life Co. v. Talbot, 118 Ind. 873, 14 N. E. 586, 3 Am. St. Rep. 661, citing cases.

As to the position of appellant, Payne, that the contract under which he claims was not acknowledged for recordation, and that, the vendor party thereto having died in 1895, before the statute was enacted, his acknowledgment could not be obtained, and hence it was not in the power of A. W. Fitzgerald to have had such contract recorded after the enactment of the statute, so as to prevent the taking away of his rights aforesaid by the operation thereof.

We are of opinion that such facts are immaterial, and there is no merit in such position.

The statute (section 2465), as it existed at the time such contract was executed, required it to be recorded in order to give notice of its existence to all the world, unless the vendee, A. W. Fitzgerald, thereunder chose to rely on the then existing rule of evidence that actual possession of the land embraced in the contract gave notice of its existence. If he made that election, he took the risk of a subsequent change of law which might change such rule of evidence.

Further: Notwithstanding the death of Loving in 1893, leaving the contract unacknowledged for recordation, as the registry statute theretofore and has ever since required, the possession aforesaid of A. W. Fitzgerald gave the constructive notice aforesaid to the predecessors in title of the Extract Company, before said statute and while it was not in force. The contract, if valid and binding as claimed by appellant, Payne, might have been asserted by A. W. Fitzgerald by suit by bill quia timet (if the contract was not then for any reason immediately enforceable), against such predecessors in title of the Extract Company, up until the first deed to the latter aforesaid—that is to say, during a period of over 7 years—and during a period of nearly 14 years before the second deed to such company, by which suit the predecessors in title of the Extract Company could have been enjoined and restrained from selling or conveying to any one else the land embraced in the contract, which would have prevented the taking away or impairment of any of the aforesaid rights of Fitzgerald, or of appellant, Payne, by the operation of said recording statute.

The sole question remaining for our consideration is the following:

6. Does the evidence show that the Extract Company had actual notice, or such notice as placed upon it the duty of inquiry, which would have led to actual notice of the equitable title aforesaid in A. W. Fitzgerald, subsequently transmitted to appellant, Payne, as aforesaid, prior to the first or second deed to such company?

The evidence in the record on this subject is conflicting. The court below was of opinion that it does not prove such notice to the Extract Company. As no legal principle is involved in this question, we do not feel that any good purpose would be served by a detailed discussion of the evidence pro and con. We deem it sufficient to say that we have carefully considered all of the evidence in the record, and we are of opinion that it appears by a decided preponderance of the evidence that the Extract Company did not have the notice in question, either before its first or second deed, on both of which occasions, therefore, it became a complete purchaser for value of the 300-acre tract of land involved in this suit without notice of the contract aforesaid on which the appellant, Payne relies.

The decree of the court below under review was in accord with the views above expressed on all points, and it will therefore be affirmed.

NORFOLK HOSIERY & UNDERWEAR MILLS CO. v. AETNA HOSIERY CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Jan. 16, 1919.)1. PLEADING \hookrightarrow 93(2)—ANSWER—INCONSISTENT DEFENSES—SALE.

In seller's action for buyer's failure to accept and pay for ordered goods, buyer, under Code 1904, § 3264, may plead rescission of contract by interposing plea of non assumpsit, notwithstanding special plea of recoupment, under section 3290, to recover for seller's failure to deliver under the contract.

2. PLEADING \hookrightarrow 94—ANSWER—INCONSISTENT PLEAS.

In view of Code 1904, § 3264, inconsistent pleas are allowable; but each plea must be regarded as separate and distinct from every other, and the defenses under one cannot be straitened or curtailed by the existence of the other.

3. SALES \hookrightarrow 379—SELLER'S ACTION—PLEADING.

In seller's action to recover for buyer's failure to accept ordered goods, buyer may show, under plea of non assumpsit, rescission by it for seller's failure to manufacture and deliver the goods.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR \hookrightarrow 1033(1)—ERROR FAVORABLE TO APPELLANT.

Errors favorable to plaintiff in error are not assignable errors.

5. SALES \hookrightarrow 170—NONPERFORMANCE BY SELLER WITHIN SPECIFIED TIME.

Where time is of essence of sales contract, seller, after failing to perform within specified time, cannot recover for buyer's refusal to accept goods.

6. SALES \hookrightarrow 369 — BREACH — RESCISSION — WAIVER.

Party having right to rescind contract because of breach by other party may waive such right and hold other party to performance.

7. TRIAL \hookrightarrow 253(10) — INSTRUCTION — IGNORING EVIDENCE.

In action for refusal to accept ordered goods, defended on ground that seller breached contract by failure to deliver within specified time, instruction as to buyer's right to rescind upon such breach, without reference to buyer's right to waive right of rescission, was properly refused, where there was evidence of such waiver.

8. SALES \hookrightarrow 121—RIGHT TO RESCIND—WAIVER—EFFECT OF WAIVER.

Where buyer, upon seller's nondelivery within specified time, waived right to rescind, and elected to hold seller to contract, contract was kept alive in favor of seller, as well as buyer, and neither could sue, except for breach thereafter occurring.

9. SALES \hookrightarrow 121—EVIDENCE—BUYER'S WAIVER OF RIGHT TO RESCIND.

Buyer, by insisting on performance, waived right to rescind contract because of seller's failure to deliver within required time.

10. SALES \hookrightarrow 181(1) — ACTION BY SELLER — ABILITY TO PERFORM.

Seller, suing on contract which he was prevented from performing by buyer, to recover, must show, not only readiness and willingness to perform, but also ability to perform.

11. APPEAL AND ERROR \hookrightarrow 1064(1) — HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In action for failure to accept ordered goods, instruction that buyer breached contract, if it prevented seller from performing, where seller was ready and willing to perform, though erroneous, because omitting to require finding that seller was able as well as ready and willing to perform, held not to have misled jury, in view of the evidence.

12. SALES \hookrightarrow 182(1)—SELLER'S ACTION—JURY QUESTION.

Whether seller had been ready and willing to perform, and had been prevented from performing by buyer, was for jury.

13. SALES \hookrightarrow 388—INSTRUCTION—BREACH BY BUYER.

In action for failure to accept ordered goods, evidence of buyer's rejection of sample conforming to contract, of seller's ability, readiness, and willingness to deliver, and of buyer's conduct excusing delivery, held to warrant instruction that buyer, by preventing seller from performing, where seller was ready, able, and willing to perform, breached contract.

14. SALES \hookrightarrow 383—SELLER'S ACTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—DAMAGES.

In seller's action for buyer's refusal to accept ordered goods, evidence held sufficient to enable jury to ascertain damage seller sustained.

15. APPEAL AND ERROR \hookrightarrow 930(1)—REVIEW—VERDICT.

Supreme Court will not set aside verdict unless, considering case as on a demurrer to evidence by plaintiff in error, it is of opinion that verdict is without evidence to support it, or is plainly contrary to evidence.

16. SALES \hookrightarrow 387 — SELLER'S ACTION — JURY QUESTION—ABANDONMENT OF CONTRACT.

In seller's action for buyer's failure to accept ordered goods, whether contract had been abandoned by both parties was for jury.

17. SALES \hookrightarrow 127—RESCISSION—ELECTION.

A breach of contract does not effect a rescission, without the assent of the other party.

18. SALES \hookrightarrow 371—ACTION BY SELLER—BURDEN OF PROOF—TENDER.

Seller, suing for buyer's refusal to accept ordered goods, must show that its tender had been made in good faith, with a present ability and willingness to perform, and that it had kept itself ready to perform whenever called upon by buyer during life of contract.

19. SALES \hookrightarrow 176(1) — BREACH BY BUYER — WAIVER BY SELLER.

Seller could not recover for buyer's refusal to accept ordered goods, after having waived its rights against buyer growing out of such breach.

20. SALES $$175$ — PERFORMANCE — BUYER'S REFUSAL TO ACCEPT.

Where contract required seller to ship or store goods seller had agreed to manufacture for buyer, seller was relieved of such duty upon buyer's refusal to accept sample conforming to contract, for manufacture, after notice that buyer would not accept, would have been idle performance.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by the Aetna Hosiery Company against the Norfolk Hosiery & Underwear Mills Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This is an action of assumpsit, brought by the Aetna Hosiery Company (hereinafter called the plaintiff) against the Norfolk Hosiery & Underwear Mills Company (hereinafter called the defendant), to recover damages for failure to accept and pay for goods ordered by the defendant of the plaintiff. The defendant is a partnership composed of Joseph B. Hecht and Morton E. Hecht, trading and doing business under the name of the Norfolk Hosiery & Underwear Mills Company. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and to that judgment a writ of error was awarded the defendants.

In the transactions which led up to the present litigation, the plaintiff was represented by Charles S. Holden, its manager, and the defendants by Joseph B. Hecht, a member of the firm. The plaintiff was a manufacturer of hosiery located at Worcester, Mass., and the defendants were wholesale dealers in hosiery, located at Norfolk, Va. Holden and Joseph B. Hecht were personal friends, and the defendants had been purchasing hosiery from the plaintiff four or five years before the present controversy arose. In the fall of 1914, a few months after the great war in Europe began, the defendants had placed with the plaintiff two orders for the manufacture of half hose, one for 1,000 dozen per week at $$1.07\frac{1}{2}$ cents per dozen, and the other for 1,000 dozen per week at $$1.20$ per dozen. These orders were to run until March 1, 1915. These two orders were filled by the plaintiff and paid for by the defendants, and need not be further noticed. They are referred to in some of the subsequent correspondence. The plaintiff had hitherto manufactured only fine goods, but the defendants also wished to purchase large quantities of coarser goods, knit on larger needles, for the use of the soldiers in France. These the plaintiff was not prepared to manufacture. On January 5, 1915, Holden and Hecht, representing the plaintiff and the defendants, respectively, met in the city of New York and discussed the situation. The parties are not agreed as to what took place at this meeting. On the day of this meeting, to wit, January 5, 1915, the defendants addressed the following letter to Holden:

"The Norfolk Hosiery & Underwear Mills Co.

"Norfolk, Va., Jan. 5, 1915.

"Mr. C. S. Holden, Worcester, Mass.—Dear Sir: Confirming our talk of this morning, it is understood that, in addition to the 2,000 dozens, or more, per week, of the grades of wool half hose that you are now making on contract for me at $$1.07\frac{1}{2}$ and $$1.20$, you will also purchase immediately up to 20 76 needle machines, or a sufficient quantity of same to make a product of 150 dozens per day of wool half hose, weighing approximately 2 pounds 8 eight ounces, and containing approximately 50% wool and 50% cotton, at $$1.65$ per dozen, freight paid to New York. I agreed to advance to you the full cost of these 20 machines, or any part of same that you require for the purpose of the machine equipment, and the Aetna Hosiery Company, indorsed by Mr. C. S. Holden personally, agreed to pay back to me the money advanced for the purchase of these machines, any time within 18 months, with interest charges at 6% per annum.

"The product of these machines to be shipped to McClure & Co., No. 366 Broadway, New York City; the invoices covering same to be sent to the Norfolk Hosiery & Underwear Mills Company, Norfolk, Va. The cases to be packed approximately 100 dozen, and each case to be marked '(J B) No. 1,' and up.

"In addition to the above, it is further agreed that the Aetna Hosiery Company will give us an output of not less than 750 dozens per week of 128 and 144 needle machines at $$1.65$, which are to contain not less than 50% wool, and are to weigh not less than 2 pounds 4 ounces. Cases shipped on this order are to be marked '(J H) No. 1,' and up, and also, of course, to have net and gross weights and dimensions on invoices and cases.

"Yours very truly,

"Norfolk Hosiery & Underwear Mills Co.,
"By Jos. B. Hecht."

The coarser goods which defendants desired to obtain are those referred to in the above letter as the "76 needle" goods. It will be observed that the above letter does not fix any time during which the goods are to be furnished, nor the time or terms of payment therefor. On January 13, 1915, the plaintiff wrote to Hecht, and in the course of that letter says, in reference to the 76 needle goods:

"Would you state the time you would be able to take this production for? * * * When I was in New York, you told me you would be willing to give me a contract covering the year 1915. I do not know as I would want to take a contract like that at present, unless I could cover for stock ahead at about the present prices. I am very anxious to make as big a showing for the company the coming year as possible, and I believe you are willing to help me out and assure us about this by showing your faith in the demand for these goods for the coming season."

To this letter Hecht replied from New York on January 14, 1915, as follows:

"My Dear Mr. Holden: I have your letter of the 13th, and your report on the seconds at $1.05 is satisfactory.

"I note carefully your paragraph in regard to the 76 needle machines. I hope you will get these in a hurry, installed and ready to ship without delay.

"As regards to your question about how long we will take your production, we agree to take the production of these machines at the rate of 150 dozens per day, or more, at $1.65, freight paid to New York. The weight to be 2 pounds and 8 ounces, 50 per cent. wool and 50 per cent. cotton. I agree to take these goods from you as fast as you make them for a full year. Trust you will view this favorably, and hope to have very large shipments from you daily, as our friends at this end are pushing us hard for the goods here.

"With kind regards, yours truly,
"J. B. Hecht."

On the next day, January 15, 1915, the plaintiff wrote Hecht as follows:

"My Dear Mr. Hecht: We accept your order dated January 14th, for one (1) year from February 1st, to make you one hundred fifty (150) dozen per day, or the production of twenty (20) Banner machines seventy-six (76) needle, four (4) inch gauge, as per your specifications to weigh two (2) pound eight (8) per dozen, and to contain fifty per cent. (50%) wool and fifty per cent. (50%) cotton, at $1.65 per dozen; net cash upon receipt of goods f. o. b. New York City, or storehouse receipt. We shall begin to ship out some of these next week.

"We also accept your proposition to loan us, for eighteen (18) months, $1,800 on these twenty (20) machines, with interest at 6 per cent. (6%) per annum; we to have the option of paying the same any time before the expiration of the above eighteen (18) months.

"Respectfully, Ætna Hosiery Company."

This completes the correspondence, so far as it relates to the making of the contract which is the basis of this action. The plaintiff knew, that the goods were being ordered for the use of the soldiers in France, and that time was a most essential element of the contract. It is claimed by the defendants that the letter of January 5, 1915, embodied the terms of a parol contract which was entered into between the parties on that day, and that the letters of January 14, 1915, and January 15, 1915, fixing the period during which the goods were to be furnished, applied as well to the goods to be made on the 128 and 144 needle machines, as to those to be made on the 76 needle machines, and that the contract was one entire contract. Holden, representing the plaintiff, denies that there was any such parol contract on January 5, and says that the letter of Hecht of that date was a mere proposition along the lines of their discussion, and that the part relating to 128 and 144 needle goods was never accepted by him. His language is:

"Well, we didn't accept any order of them. The thing was still in abeyance; that is, we had talked backwards and forwards in his office and over the phone. We have talked about making something of that kind, but I did not accept any order on them because, as I say, we had talked this matter backwards and forwards, but I did not accept any order on that number on those machines."

He states that he would have been glad to have had the order, and could have made money on it, but did not accept it, "because we didn't consider that we could make it in connection with the other order." The dealings between the parties were conducted in part by personal interviews, in part by conversations over the telephone, and there was a voluminous correspondence. From January 15 to February 24, 1915, the defendants were urgently insisting upon the prompt delivery of the 76 needle goods, and the plaintiff was explaining the difficulty of obtaining the needed machinery for their manufacture, and from time to time promising delivery. Both parties knew that the machinery had to be purchased, and it sufficiently appears from the evidence that the plaintiff did all it could be reasonably expected to do to obtain it in time to begin delivery by February 1, but without success. On February 23, a letter from each party to the other crossed in the mails. These letters are as follows:

"New York, Feb. 23, 1915.

"Mr. C. S. Holden, Ætna Hosiery Co., Worcester, Mass.—My Dear Mr. Holden: I have your letter of the 20th, and really think, unless you have a place to put the goods, that you had better order the 10 cases returned to Worcester. I doubt that you will have a place to sell them, although you might, and it will be very much cheaper and safer to have the goods in your mill, and hold there until we can get further delivery orders on the goods.

"I am very optimistic about the prospects of new contracts on the 515 and 50N, but until these new contracts have come across complete, with the financial end on a basis satisfactory to me, I cannot permit you to ship. Now, do not understand for a minute that I want to hold you for your production on these goods. It would not be fair of me to ask it. If you have an opportunity to sell this product of yours elsewhere, just go ahead and do it.

"After Wednesday of this week, please make no shipments of any kind. Also, do not ship any of the heavy goods on the 84 needle or 108 needle contract, or any goods of any character excepting No. 50N, and discontinue shipping No. 50N after Wednesday.

"As soon as matters here take a different shape, I will advise you promptly, and you know this.

"With kind regards, yours truly,
"J. B. Hecht."

"February 23, 1915.

"Mr. J. B. Hecht, New York City—Friend Hecht: We are sending you by express sample dozen of the seventy-six (76) needle hose. These are in a small size and you will notice weigh forty (40) ounces. These are scoured very hard and as you will see are very dry, so you will find they will gain nearly (2) ounces going across the water. They are very clean. We think you will find they test about 53 to 55% wool. We think they are now coming through very nicely. We can begin to ship some of these right away.

"We will begin to send you to-morrow noon all the cases we have on the 50N and express at night whatever we can get off in the afternoon.

"We have the twenty (20) machines all tested out and you can send us check for $1,800 any time you wish. According to the agreement we had with the Hemphill Company was to pay for them $90 net cash.

"Thanking you in advance, respectfully,
"Aetna Hosiery Company."

On February 24, 1915, Hecht wrote the following letter to Holden:

"New York, Feb. 24, 1915.

"Mr. C. S. Holden, Aetna Hosiery Co., Worcester, Mass.—My Dear Mr. Holden: I have your letter of the 23d, and I also received this morning the dozen half hose, 76 needle. I do not like the look of this dozen goods at all, and I am returning 't to you to-day. Of course, I wrote you the other night not to make any shipments of any sort, other than the 50N, until I advise you, but it looks now as if we would be able to start again full blast on wool socks in a very few days, but, until I do advise you, do not ship anything except the No. 50N, which you will have closed by to-night's shipment.

"I am also handing you herewith the notice of arrival of the eight cases which I asked you to order back, and I suppose you have done so. "Will keep you posted with any change in the situation.

"With kind regards, yours truly,
"J. B. Hecht."

Thereafter, no further samples were demanded or sent, and no further explanation was asked or given for refusing the samples, but the plaintiff made repeated demands upon the defendants to remit the $1,800 agreed to be advanced by the defendants to pay for the 76 needle machines. Some of these demands were not answered, others were answered by suggested arrangements different from the terms agreed on, but in the result the $1,800 was not advanced, and no satisfactory arrangement made in relation thereto. Holden testifies that the plaintiff was able, ready, and willing to supply the 76 needle goods at all times from February 24, 1915, till February 1, 1916; that he had the materials, the machinery, and the labor, and simply awaited the acceptance of the sample tendered, or an order to proceed with the manufacture. He further testifies that the sample tendered measured up to the requirements of the contract. There was some conflict on this question, growing especially out of the use of wool waste, but on a demurrer to the evidence the statement of Holden must be accepted as true. In addition to the evidence hereinbefore mentioned, the plaintiff relies, upon the subsequent correspondence between Holden and Hecht, hereinafter quoted, to show a breach of the contract to accept the goods. It was claimed by the defendants that they demanded of the plaintiff the output of these machines through their associates, McClure & Co., about April 30, 1915; but this is flatly denied by Holden in his testimony. During the period covered by the contract, the plaintiff manufactured something over 11,000 dozen half hose on the 76 needle machines, but they were not manufactured under any particular contract, and none of them were tendered to the defendants. Part of them were sold, and the residue were on hand at the time this action was brought.

H. W. Anderson, of Richmond, and Tazewell Taylor, of Norfolk, for plaintiffs in error.

R. B. Hicks, of Norfolk, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3] This action was brought in June, 1916, by the Aetna Company against the Norfolk Company to recover damages for the failure on the part of the defendants to accept and pay for the output of the 76 needle machines from February 23, 1915, to February 1, 1916. The defendant pleaded nonassumpsit and a special plea of recoupment under section 3299 of the Code. The special plea sought to recover damages of the plaintiff for failure to manufacture and deliver to the defendants the goods called for in the agreement alleged to have been made on January 5, 1915. It is earnestly insisted by counsel for the plaintiff that—"When the defendant filed its special plea, it forever waived its right to defend on the ground that it had rescinded the contract because of the failure of the plaintiff to begin deliveries on February 1st."

In this, counsel for the plaintiff is clearly mistaken. The continued existence of the contract was put in issue by the plea of non assumpsit, and while there could be no recoupment if the contract did not exist, and to this extent the two pleas are inconsistent, this is not a valid objection, for the defendant may plead as many several matters of law or fact as he deems necessary. Code, § 3264. Not only so, but with us inconsistent pleas are allowable, and in trying one the court cannot look to the existence of the other; hence we look upon each branch of the pleading as totally separate and distinct from every other, and the defenses under one cannot be straitened or curtailed by the existence of the other. Were it otherwise, the liberty of pleading several, and even contradictory, pleas would be defeated. McNutt v. Young, 8 Leigh (35 Va.) 542, 553. Nothing is more common in practice than contradictory pleas. In the case at bar, if the defendant did not seek any recovery over and above the plaintiff's claim, there was no necessity for the special plea, as the defense set up by it might have been shown under the general issue of non assumption. Columbia Accident Ass'n v. Rocky, 98 Va. 678, 25 S. E. 1009; Burks, Pl. & Pr. § 239.

[4] On the trial, the court gave six instructions on the motion of the defendants. Some of them were probably more favorable to the defendants than they should have been, but this is not assignable error—not by the defendants, because they were favorable to them and asked by them, nor by the plaintiff, because it was not injured by them, as the verdict was in its favor.

The action of the trial court in refusing defendants' instruction No. 3 is assigned as error. This instruction was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that a contract existed between the Ætina Hosiery Company, the plaintiff, on the one hand, and the defendants on the other, whereby the said plaintiff agreed and undertook for the period of one year, beginning February 1, 1915, to make and deliver to the said defendants 150 dozen pair of 76 needle socks per day, for the consideration of $1.65 per dozen, and that it failed to make and deliver said socks at the time specified, and that said failure continued up to February 23d, that then the defendants had a right to notify plaintiff not to ship any goods after that time, and their so doing did not constitute on their part a breach of the contract sued on, and the jury shall so find."

[5-7] There was no error in refusing this instruction. Undoubtedly time was of the very essence of the contract in suit, and the parties fully realized that fact, and there is no need to cite authority for the elementary proposition that in such case there can be no recovery upon the contract in case of failure to perform within the time stipulated. But there is no reason why one party, who had a right to rescind because of breach by the other, may not waive that right and hold the other party to performance. The law on this subject is well settled. Conceding that the contract bound the plaintiff to begin deliveries on February 1, 1915, the instruction wholly ignored the evidence tending to show a waiver of this provision of the contract, and left the jury free to find for the defendants on this question notwithstanding such waiver. It presented only a partial view of the evidence as to the rights of the parties, respectively, under the contract. It is true that the instruction does not in terms direct a verdict for the defendants; but, ignoring all evidence tending to show that the defendants had waived their rights under the contract, it tells the jury that under the contract—

"the defendants had a right to notify the plaintiff not to ship any goods after that time, and their so doing did not constitute on their part a breach of the contract sued on, and the jury shall so find."

No other instruction given in the case dealt with the subject of waiver by the defendants of their rights under the contract, and to have given the instruction, as asked, would have been misleading. In New York, etc., R. Co. v. Thomas, 92 Va. 606, 609, 24 S. E. 264, 265, it is said:

"Calling the special attention of the jury to a part only of the evidence and the particular fact or facts it may tend to prove, and ignoring the residue of the evidence and the facts it may tend to prove, gives undue prominence to such recited evidence, and disposes the jury to regard it and the fact it tends to prove as the particular evidence, and the fact to be relied on in determining the issue before them, and thus mislead them.

"Instructions in writing are carried by the jury to their room when they retire to consider of the verdict, and, if they contain a rehearsal of a part only of the evidence, their tendency is to impress unduly on the jury such part of the evidence, to the disadvantage of the other evidence in the case, which may be equally or more important in determining the issue, but rests only in the memory of the jury."

For other cases on the same subject, see Burks, Pl. & Pr. § 268, note 15.

[8] The defendants insisted, and the court so instructed the jury at their instance, that their letter of February 23 was a mere shipping direction and "that it was not intended thereby to terminate the contract." If this be true, then the contract continued in force, and if the failure of the plaintiff to make deliveries between February 1 and February 23, 1915, gave the defendants the right to rescind, they waived those rights and elected to hold the plaintiff to its contract. The defendants were within their rights in doing this, but when they kept the contract alive against the plaintiff, they kept it alive also in its favor, and against themselves, and neither could sue the other except for a breach thereafter occurring.

In Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Ex. 111, it is said:

"The promisee, if he pleases, may treat the notice of intention as inoperative, and await the time when the contract is to be executed, and then hold the other party responsible for all the consequence of nonperformance; but in that case he keeps the contract alive, for the benefit of the other party as well as his own. He remains subject to all his own obligations and liabilities under it, and enables the other party, not only to complete the contract if so advised, notwithstanding his previous repudiation of it, but also to take advantage of any supervening circumstance which would justify him in declining to complete it."

In Bernstein v. Meech, 130 N. Y. 354, 358, 29 N. E. 255, 256, it was said:

"But whatever view may have been taken of the right of the defendants to treat the contract for the purposes of its performance as at an end, and to act upon that assumption when they received the plaintiff's letter, they disposed of that question by their letter to him.

By this it appeared that the defendants elected to keep the contract in force for the purposes for which it was made. This operated alike upon the rights of both parties, and the plaintiff was justified in so understanding it. In that view the contract was kept alive until the time arrived for performance, and the obligations of the defendants no less than those of the plaintiff for that purpose remained effectual."

See, also, Inman v. Elk Cotton Mills, 116 Tenn. 141, 92 S. W. 760.

[9] The defendants' letters of February 24, 1915, and April 12, 1915, also seem to indicate that the defendants intended to insist on the performance of the contract, and the testimony of W. P. McClure, who was associated with the defendants in this contract, and who was examined in this cause as witness on their behalf, is to the effect that between 20th and 25th of April, 1915, he had a talk with Holden "with reference to getting of any of these goods," but could not get them. Hecht also testifies that he tried to get all machine goods from the plaintiff after April 12, but without success, and Holden testifies that the defendants attempted to get goods from him on this order in April, 1915. We have no difficulty, therefore, in arriving at the conclusion that the defendants waived whatever rights of rescission they had for failure of the plaintiff to make deliveries prior to February 23, 1915.

The next assignment of error is to the action of the court in granting the following instruction, on the motion of the plaintiff:

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the contract mentioned in the declaration was entered into between the plaintiff and defendant, and that the plaintiff was ready and willing to perform the same, and that performance thereof was prevented by defendant without fault of the plaintiff, then there was a breach of the contract by defendants."

[10-12] There is omitted from this instruction the word "able," which should have been inserted in order to make it accurate. It was necessary that the plaintiff should have been, not only "ready and willing to perform," but also "able" to perform the contract. But no such objection was raised to the instruction, either in the trial court or this court, and, under the evidence, the jury could not have been misled by its omission.

"It was earnestly contended before the trial court, and is now just as seriously urged, that the evidence in this case discloses the fact, not only that the plaintiff was not ready and not willing, but that, on the contrary, the exact opposite condition existed."

The instruction, with the suggested insertion made, correctly propounds the law, and there was more than a mere scintilla of evidence in the cause upon which to base it. The plaintiff's manager testified that the sample tendered conformed to the contract, but was rejected; that the plaintiff was ever thereafter during the year ready, able, and willing to perform the contract, but received no orders to proceed; and that the only reason for nonperformance was the attitude and conduct of the defendants. Whether the facts were as hypothetically stated in the instruction was a question for the jury, and was properly submitted to them.

The third assignment of error is to the action of the court in granting the following instruction, on the motion of the plaintiff, to wit:

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this case, then they should proceed to assess the damages to which it is entitled; and the court further instructs the jury that in ascertaining such damages they should first determine from the evidence in this case what the entire costs would have been to the plaintiff to complete its contract with the defendants, and, after ascertaining the costs of completion, to deduct the same from the sum which the plaintiff would have been entitled to receive from the defendant under the terms of the contract, if the same had been performed. From this result they should then deduct any profits which the evidence shows were made by plaintiff by using the 76 needle machines described in the evidence. The result thus ascertained will be the damage which the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action."

[14] The objection to this instruction is that the contract calls for the output of 20 machines, when the evidence fails to show what that output was, or what the profit was per dozen, and hence the jury did not have before them sufficient data upon which to base a verdict. The defendants' letter of January 5 says:

"You will also purchase immediately up to 20 76 needle machines, or a sufficient quantity of same, to make a product of 150 dozens per day of wool half hose."

The plaintiff's letter of acceptance of January 15 accepted the order "to make you one hundred and fifty (150) dozen per day, or the product of twenty (20) Banner machines." Both parties calculated that the 20 machines would make 150 dozen per day. The price to be paid for the goods was fixed by the contract. Holden testified for the plaintiff that the price of the material, and the cost of manufacture amounted to 96.55 cents per dozen, and an itemized statement of how the amount was arrived at was laid before the jury. Another witness, disinterested, testified that the prices given by Holden were reasonable. While Holden had not actually tested the capacity of the machines, because there had been no necessity to do so, he estimated their capacity at 150 dozen per day, and, figuring on this basis, placed the plaintiff's loss of profits at $26,255.62. The expert placed on the stand by the defendants thought that the product of the machines could not be safely placed at over 500 dozen per week. Counting five working days per week, as is done by the plaintiff in error, that would be 100 dozen per day. If this be taken as the proper basis, it would reduce the plaintiff's profits by one-third, and ascertain its loss, on the basis of profits testified to by Holden, at $17,503.75; but from this there were to be some deductions, testified to by Holden, and mentioned in the instruction. The jury fixed the plaintiff's damages at $17,100. In view of these facts, we cannot say that—"There was no evidence of a sufficiently definite character to enable the jury to arrive at the damages sustained by the plaintiff."

[15] The last assignment of error is that the court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict on the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence. As the evidence appears in cold print, without the advantage possessed by the jury and the trial court, we probably would not have found or approved the verdict which was found by the jury and approved by the trial judge; but that will not justify this court in setting aside the verdict, unless, after considering the case as on a demurrer to the evidence by the plaintiffs in error, we are of opinion that the verdict is without evidence to support it, or is plainly contrary to the evidence. Jackson v. Wickham, 112 Va. 128, 70 S. E. 539, and cases cited.

There has been much argument on the subject of the divisibility of the contract, and counsel have ably discussed the authorities pro and con, but before entering upon that question it is necessary to first ascertain what was the contract between the parties. Only after this has been ascertained will it be necessary to determine whether or not that contract was divisible, provided any such question is involved in it. The defendants contended that there had been a verbal contract between the parties on January 5, 1915, and that it embraced not only the 76 needle goods, but also the 128 and 144 needle goods, and further that the letter of Hecht of that date contained the terms of the contract. It was further insisted that this contract for the two kinds of goods was indivisible, and could not be relied on in part and rejected in part, and further that if the defendants in good faith believed that the contract embraced the 128 and 144 needle goods and the plaintiff believed otherwise there was no meeting of the minds of the parties, and hence no contract. The plaintiff denied that there had been any such verbal contract, and contended that the letter of January 5 was a mere proposal concerning matters which the parties had discussed, that it did not contain the time and terms of payments or the duration of the contract, and that the plaintiff was free to accept any portion or all of the proposals; that the acceptance or rejection could be made within a reasonable time, and could be either oral or in writing; that, through its manager, Holden, it orally declined to accept the proposal as to the 128 and 144 needle goods, and that by the letter of January 15, 1915, it accepted the proposal as to the 76 needle goods upon the terms therein stated. Evidence was introduced to sustain each of these contentions, and the trial court fairly and fully submitted the question to the jury by instructions to which neither party objected. By instruction B, given for the plaintiff, the court told the jury:

"The court instructs the jury that in order to constitute a contract there must be an agreement of the parties, or meetings of the minds, upon the particular question at issue. A mere proposal, without an acceptance, would not create a contract."

By instruction D, given for the plaintiff, the court told the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that no time was specified during which the plaintiff was to furnish the 128 and 144 needle goods, it had the right to terminate the order at the end of any week. Instruction 5, given for the defendants was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff understood that the contract between it and the defendants only contemplated the making and delivery by the plaintiff at the rate of 150 dozen per day of half hose made on 76 needle machines, and the defendants on their part understood that the contract between the plaintiff and defendants contemplated, in addition to the 76 needle goods, the making and delivery by the plaintiff at the rate of not less than 750 dozen per week of half hose made on 128 and 144 needle machines, that then and in that event there was a mistake as to the subject-matter of the contract, the result of which was that there was no meeting of the minds of the parties, and the jury shall find for the defendants."

The verdict of the jury, in effect, sustained the contention of the plaintiff, and with that finding we cannot interfere. This finding eliminates any further consideration of the 128 and 144 needle goods.

[16] There was much evidence tending strongly to show that the contract had been abandoned by both parties to it, but whether or not it had been so abandoned was plainly a question for the jury, whose verdict enforcing the contract cannot be disturbed.

As hereinbefore pointed out, nondelivery prior to February 23 was waived; but the jury had further to consider whether or not there was a breach of the contract by the defendants on or after February 23, which gave the plaintiff a right of recovery. On February 24 the plaintiff tendered to the defendants a sample of the half hose to be manufactured, accompanied by a letter, saying:

"These are scoured very hard, and as you see are very dry, so you will find they will gain nearly two (2) ounces going across the water. They are very clean."

These samples the defendants rejected and returned, because they did "not like the look of this dozen goods at all." Thereafter the plaintiff made no inquiry as to any other objections to the sample, furnished no other sample, made no other tender or delivery under the contract, and manufactured no more goods under the contract, but relied upon what it had done as a sufficient tender of performance on its part. Viewed from the standpoint of a demurrer to the evidence, the defendants made no demand for any further samples, gave no further explanation for the rejection of the sample furnished, and made no further demand upon the plaintiff for the goods. The defendants offered evidence to prove that, while the contract called for goods containing 50 per cent. wool, the sample furnished contained only wool waste, that the plaintiff knew the goods were for the French government, and that they were of such character that, if they had accepted them, they would have been rejected and thrown on their hands by the French government. There was evidence on behalf of the plaintiff that the sample conformed to the contract, that the wool was of the same character as that used in all other contracts with the defendants, and was such as any well-organized plant would have put into them under a like contract.

[17] If the goods conformed to the contract of the parties, it is immaterial what the French government would have done upon inspection. The verdict of the jury for the plaintiff was, in effect, a finding that the sample conformed to the contract, and cannot be disturbed. This finding of the jury is a finding of a breach of the contract by the defendants. A breach of contract by one of the parties thereto, however, is by no means a rescission. It is a mere offer to rescind, which the other party may either accept or reject. The offer must be accepted before rescission is complete. It takes the assent of both parties to rescind. Rescission is the undoing of a contract, and the assent of both parties to it is as essential as it is to its making.

[18, 19] The act of the plaintiff in furnishing the sample was not a performance of the contract, but a mere tender of performance as far as performance was then possible. If the plaintiff relied upon the sufficiency of its tender to keep the contract alive and hold the defendants to complete performance, it was necessary for it to show that the tender had been made in good faith, with a present ability and willingness to perform, and that the plaintiff had kept itself ready to perform whenever called upon by the defendants to do so during the life of the contract. Inman v. Elk Cotton Mills, 116 Tenn. 141, 92 S. W. 760. It was also necessary, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, that it should have done no act waiving its rights against the defendants growing out of the breach aforesaid. The plaintiff's manager testified on its behalf that the tender was made in good faith, and that on and after February 24, 1915, the plaintiff had the materials, the machinery, and the labor necessary to perform the contract; that it was able, ready, and willing to perform ever thereafter until February 1, 1916, the date of the expiration of the contract; that it took no orders from others for this class of goods, but kept itself free and open to carry out the terms of the contract, and would have been glad to have had the order, as it would have made a good profit on it. There was some testimony on behalf of the defendants that they demanded of the plaintiff a part of the goods in the latter part of April, 1915, and could not get them; but this is denied by the plaintiff's manager, upon whom the demand was said to have been made, and who testified that, at the date of the trial, the plaintiff still had on hand some of the goods which were referred to in his letter to the defendants' associates of April 29, 1915.

[20] While the contract required the plaintiff to ship or store the goods, it was relieved of this duty by the refusal of the defendants to accept the sample. It would have been an idle performance for the plaintiff to have manufactured goods which defendants had notified it in advance they would not accept. If after this breach the defendants changed their mind and desired the goods, they should have so notified the plaintiff and given it a reasonable opportunity to perform the contract; but this they failed to do. Obviously the verdict of the jury finding for the plaintiff on this question cannot be set aside.

Did the plaintiff, after February 24, 1915, treat the contract as rescinded, or release the defendants from their liability for its breach? For months after that date the plaintiff was repeatedly demanding of the defendants a check for $1,800; they had agreed to advance to pay for the machines to make the 76 needle goods. In addition to this, the correspondence between the parties is relied upon to show the continued readiness of the plaintiff to fulfill its contract, and the unwillingness of the defendants to take the goods. On March 27 Hecht wrote Holden:

"I am now very much at unrest on account of the lack of business for export, as I have such a large amount of my finances tied up in this business at this time and I am unable to make any further moves until future business develops."

In reply to this statement, Holden on March 30 wrote to Hecht as follows:

"We, of course, bought these machines with your promise to pay for them and also to take the production for one year. You have apparently disregarded taking the goods as agreed, and we hope you do not think of not paying for the machines."

On April 12 Hecht wrote to Holden:

"So far we have not been able to get the new orders on heavy wool socks, on a satisfactory financial basis, but I haven't any doubt that during the year we will get a great deal of business."

Holden wrote Hecht on April 17:

"You know you told me, if we would buy these machines, you would take our production on them for one year, even if you could not use them during the summer."

Hecht wrote Aetna Hosiery Company on April 21 as follows:

"I am in receipt of yours of the 17th. We have no orders on heavy wool hosiery at this time, but we expect to have very large business later on in the season, at which time, of course, I could readily use the output of your 76 needle machines. Until that time, however, I do not want any of the goods, and I am sure you don't want me to think about taking them unless I can sell them."

On May 17 Hecht wrote Holden:

"It seems to me, also, that there should be an understanding between us that if we desire the product of these machines you will give us the same. We have booked some very large business recently, but it only covered, so far as the 84 needle product is concerned, actual merchandise that we had already made up in stock; but we have every reason to believe that we will have in the very near future some very large business for delivery September, October, and November of this year, in which case I will very probably need your assistance, and will advise with you concerning same later on. There is one point, however, that I might as well speak of at this time, and that is that the day of very long profits on the export hosiery business has passed. * * * It is no longer possible for me to give long profits to the manufacturer or to get long profits for ourselves."

On May 19 Mr. Holden replied to this letter and said in part:

"In letters since, it sounds as though you wanted us to feel you were doing us a kindness in paying for these machines. At the time, you were very anxious to get goods, and make the profit, and you were willing to concede most anything to get the goods. But as soon as business began to slack up you then refused to take the goods."

In reply to this letter Hecht, after acknowledging receipt of the letter of the 19th calling Hecht's attention to the refusal to take the goods, Hecht said:

"Now, as regards the output of these machines, of course, you will operate them, and I did not mean in my previous letter that you should depend upon us for the sale of the output of them. You, of course, will sell all you can, and if I can turn any business over to you that you want on new orders, which we, by the way, have none at this time, certainly I will let you hear from me, but I would say this: I haven't any doubt at all but what there is plenty of business coming this fall on wool socks for these machines."

Upon this and other evidence in the case, the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and with this verdict we have no right to interfere. Upon the whole case, we are of opinion to affirm the judgment of the circuit court.

Affirmed.

PAMPLIN v. NORFOLK & W. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 16, 1919.)

1. RAILROADS §113(1) — HIGHWAYS — LOCATION—CHANGE OF.

The consent of the board of supervisors, under Code 1904, § 1294b, subsec. 3, to a change of location of a public highway by a railroad company, does not shield the company from liability for such damages as the change may cause to the owner or occupants of any land.

2. RAILROADS §113(8,9) — INJURIES TO PROPERTY—RIGHT OF WAY—CONVEYANCES.

Conveyance to a railroad company of a right of way for its proposed railroad vested in the company the same rights as though the land had been acquired by condemnation, and the grantor cannot recover for any damages to remainder of his land resulting from a proper construction, use, and operation of the property conveyed.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN §112 — AWARD — DAMAGES INCLUDED.

Where part of a tract of land is taken by condemnation proceedings for a railroad right of way, the award includes damages to the residue of the tract which are due to the construction and operation of the railroad on a grade different from the natural surface of the land.

4. RAILROADS §113(2) — INJURIES FROM CONSTRUCTION—EMBANKMENT.

Though a railroad company, on condemning a right of way, is required to file a profile showing the cuts and fills, yet, where the company was granted a right of way over land, it was not liable for damages, because its road was constructed on an embankment, where the embankment did not deprive the adjacent land of support, or interfere with the flow of running streams, etc.

5. RAILROADS ⚡113(8,9) — INJURIES FROM CONSTRUCTION—EFFECT OF CONVEYANCE.

A deed to a railroad company for a right of way, though a conveyance in fee, held not an ordinary conveyance as to a grantee of land in fee, subject to the maxim "sic utere tuo ut alienum non lēdas," but a conveyance of the right of way for railroad purposes, entitling the company to build its road on an embankment.

6. RAILROADS ⚡67(1) — DEEDS — CONSTRUCTION—DRAWING OF DEED.

Where a deed to a railroad company was drawn by the grantee, the rule that any doubt as to the true meaning should be resolved against the draftsman has merely to do with the meaning of ambiguous language, and cannot affect the rules of law applicable to the construction of the deed where there is no ambiguity.

7. NOTICE ⚡5—CONSTRUCTIVE KNOWLEDGE —CONTENTS OF DEED.

Where a deed to a railroad company of a right of way, which was prepared by the company, disclosed the profile of the proposed line on a plan which was made a part of the deed, held, that the grantor was charged with constructive notice of what was shown on the plan.

8. RAILROADS ⚡113(8,9) — INJURIES FROM CONSTRUCTION—RIGHT OF WAY DEED—EFFECT.

Where plaintiff granted a railroad company a right of way over a particular parcel, the grant did not operate as a release of plaintiff's right to recover damages due to acts of the company on a different parcel of land, causing additional or different injury from the damages due to the acts of the company on the land granted.

9. RAILROADS ⚡114(4) — DAMAGES — JURY QUESTION.

Where plaintiff, who granted a railroad company a right of way, claimed that the residue of her property was injured by an embankment constructed by the company on other lands, held, that the question of the amount was for the jury.

10. RAILROADS ⚡113(8,9)—INJURIES FROM CONSTRUCTION—RELEASE—EFFECT OF DEED.

That a landowner granted a railroad company a right of way over her property did not operate as a release of a claim of damage due to the change by the railroad company of a public road which ran along the residue of the land retained.

11. EMINENT DOMAIN ⚡243(2) — AWARD —CONCLUSIVENESS—DAMAGES INCLUDED.

Where a railroad company condemned a right of way over land in which plaintiff had only a life estate, held, under Code 1904, § 1105f, subsec. 23, that the award in such condemnation proceedings did not bar plaintiff's action for the recovery of damages to other property of which she owned the fee, though the requisite notices were given, unless the commissioners considered and passed upon the damage to such land.

12. EMINENT DOMAIN ⚡243(2) — AWARD —CONCLUSIVENESS—MATTERS CONSIDERED.

The commissioners' report, in proceedings by a railroad company to condemn a right of way over land in which plaintiff had a life estate, held not to show that damages to other property which plaintiff owned in fee, due to the construction of the railroad, were passed upon and determined, and hence such award of damages did not, under Code 1904, § 1105f, subsec. 23, bar recovery.

Error to Circuit Court, Appomattox County.

Action by Dora E. Pamplin against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial, with directions.

This is an action at law by the plaintiff in error (hereinafter called plaintiff) against the defendant in error (hereinafter called the railroad company) to recover damages alleged in the declaration to consist of the diminution of the market value and the impairment of the right of use and enjoyment of the occupation of certain land and the dwelling house thereon, due to the construction and operation of the railroad of the defendant railroad company and a change of grade in a county road by the railroad company, near the plaintiff's said property.

The land in question consists of the residue of a tract of 8 or 9 and a fraction acres (which we will designate the "Pamplin home tract"), belonging to the plaintiff, after deducting therefrom a parcel of 1¼ acres which she conveyed to the defendant by deed dated June 2, 1915, which was acknowledged and delivered to the defendant on June 4, 1915. Such deed and the "Plan N-3086" thereto attached and made a part thereof, as provided in the deed, are as follows:

"This deed, made this 2d day of June, 1915, between Dora E. Pamplin (single), party of the first part, and Norfolk & Western Railway Company, party of the second part, witnesseth:

"That for and in consideration of the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000.00) cash in hand paid, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the party of the first part doth bargain, sell, grant, and convey unto the party of the second part all that certain piece or parcel of land situate in the county of Appomattox, state of Virginia, bounded and described as follows:

"Beginning at a point on the center line of the Burkeville to Pamplin Low Grade connecting line of the Norfolk & Western Railway at station 1949, said point of beginning being also in the dividing line between lands of Mrs. J. Y. Spencer and Miss Dora E. Pamplin; thence along said dividing line, between said lands, following the center of county road S. 16° 34' E. about 168 feet to a point; thence along other lands of Miss Dora E. Pamplin, parallel to and 60 feet distant easterly from aforesaid center line in a northern direction about 562 feet to a point in the dividing line between lands of Miss Dora E. Pamplin and Chas. Hindley; thence along the dividing line between said lands crossing aforesaid center line at station 1952 plus 64 S. 59° 23' W. 186 feet to a point in the dividing line between lands of Miss Dora E. Pamplin and Mrs. J. Y. Spencer; thence along said dividing line, between said lands, following the center of county road S. 16° 34' E. about 3,195 feet to the place of beginning, containing 1.4 acres, more or less, or as more fully shown on Plan N-3086 Revised May 22, 1915, hereto attached and made a part of this deed, it being a portion of the same property derived by the said Dora E. Pamplin under the will of Eliza T. Pamplin, dated July 14, 1891, and probated at the August term, 1891, in Will Book No. 1 at page 5, to which will reference is here made for a further description of the property hereby conveyed.

"The party of the first part hereby covenants that she is seized in fee simple of the property described above and has the right to convey the same, that the property is unincumbered, that the grantee shall have quiet and peaceable possession of same, and that she will execute such other and further assurances of title as may be requisite.

"Witness the following signature and seal.

This deed was acknowledged by the grantor before a notary on June 4, 1915, and that day delivered to the railroad company.

It will be noted that the "Plan" shows a profile, on which it is shown that the railroad will be constructed above the grade of the surface of the land conveyed by the deed.

The parcel of land thus conveyed to the defendant will be hereinafter referred to as "lot A," and the residue of the said "Pamplin home tract" as the "dwelling house land."

At the time of the execution and delivery of such deed a public road of the county, known as the Darlington Heights road, passed along the whole of the southwestern side of lot A (the southwestern boundary of such lot being the center of such road), and farther along directly in front of the said dwelling house of the plaintiff for some 138 to 150 feet to the intersection or junction therewith of another public road (the Pamplin-Charlotte C. H. road), coming from the east. The dwelling house land of the plaintiff lay to the north of and within the angle formed by the junction of these public roads, and the south side of such dwelling house land lay along the Pamplin-Charlotte C. H. road. At this time the grade of both of such roads was approximately on a level with the surface of lot A, and of the dwelling house land where such lot and land abutted on such roads.

Some time before the conveyance aforesaid to the railroad company, the plaintiff had conveyed to a nephew, Jack Spencer, an infant, in remainder after a life estate retained in herself, a parcel of some — acres of land, which will hereinafter be called the "Spencer tract," which lay immediately on the southwest side of the Darlington Heights road, its northeastern boundary being the center of such road, from the junction of the Pamplin-Charlotte C. H. road therewith, aforesaid, along the boundary line dividing it from the dwelling house tract and from lot A. It appears from the record that after making such conveyance the plaintiff forgot that she had retained a life estate in it, and that Mrs. J. Y. Spencer, mother of said infant, became the tenant of the Spencer tract in right of her said son.

The plaintiff had lived for many years in the dwelling house aforesaid prior to and was living therein at the time of the institution of this action, but did not occupy or use the Spencer tract, as aforesaid, as must be inferred from the evidence for the railroad company in the record.

The railroad company, something over a month before said conveyance to it of lot A, when the situation of the title and the possession of the lot and of the dwelling house land and of the Spencer tract was as aforesaid, proceeded under the statute contained in Acts of 1915 (Extra Sess.) p. 11, to locate and obtain the right of way for a connecting line between two points, Burkeville and Pamplin, on its existing main line for the more efficient and economical transportation of traffic between said two points, which the duty resting upon it as a public service corporation required it to transport. Such right of way as located by the railroad company took therefor said lot A and a portion of the Spencer tract.

On April 28, 1915, the railroad company, by ex parte proceeding under the statute, subsection 3 of section 1294b of Pollard's Code 1904, obtained from the board of supervisors of the county of Appomattox, in which the same is located, their consent to a change of location of the Darlington Heights public road where it passed along in front of plaintiff's dwelling house land and bounded lot A, such change consisting in the abandonment of that location for such road and the relocation of it so as to extend it from the junction or intersection of the Pamplin-Charlotte C. H. road therewith, aforesaid; thence almost due west, over the Spencer tract of land, across the proposed location of the right of way of the railroad company thereon, by an undergrade crossing; and thence, after reaching the western edge of the proposed right of way aforesaid on the Spencer tract, proceeding along such edge of such right of way until it reached and passed into the former location of said Darlington Heights road where it passed the northwest corner of lot A, thence going in a northerly direction towards Pamplin.

The railroad company in this proceeding, filed before the board of supervisors plats and profiles showing such change of location of the county road; the height of the embankment for its railroad which it proposed to construct at such undergrade crossing (which was some 15 feet in height at that point), and the height of such embankment which it proposed to construct thence along the right of way it proposed to acquire across the Spencer tract and across said lot A (such embankment being from about 15 to 18½ feet high from the natural surface of the ground, as it passed along in front of plaintiff's dwelling house land and dwelling house). Such plats and profiles also showed that the grade of the Pamplin-Charlotte C. H. road, where the south side of the dwelling house land of plaintiff abutted on it, would be lowered about 2 to 4 or 5 feet where this road passed along, about 50 feet south of the said dwelling house, toward the undergrade crossing—being about 2 feet below the former grade and the grade of plaintiff's dwelling house land at a roadway which she had theretofore used as a driveway and side entrance from such Pamplin-Charlotte C. H. road into such land to the dwelling house, and reaching a depth of about 4 or 5 feet below the old county road where that road formerly passed about 50 feet from and in front of said dwelling house.

The railroad company, whether before or after the said proceeding before the board of supervisors does not appear from the record, reached an agreement with the plaintiff to purchase from her lot A, to be conveyed to it for the consideration of $3,000, which was some $2,625 in excess of the market value of such lot of land. This agreement was subsequently executed by the conveyance to the railroad company aforesaid.

The railroad company also reached an agreement with Mrs. Spencer (just when does not appear from the record) for the purchase of the land necessary to be taken for the right of way of the railroad company for its line across the Spencer tract and for the damages to the residue of the Spencer tract not so taken, the total consideration therefor being the sum of $1,500, Mrs. Spencer at the time supposing that her said son owned a fee-simple estate in such land, and the railroad company, as it seems, not then being aware of the life estate of the plaintiff therein. Owing to the infancy of said son of Mrs. Spencer, the railroad company did not take a deed of conveyance of the part of the Spencer tract sought to be taken, as aforesaid, but on May 10, 1915, instituted a condemnation proceeding under the statute on that subject by notice "to Mrs. J. Y. Spencer and J. Y. Spencer, her husband, and to whom it may concern," which was served on Mrs. J. Y. Spencer and J. Y. Spencer on that day by the sheriff, which notice was to the effect that the railroad company would move the judge of the court below on May 29, 1915, for appointment of commissioners to ascertain what would be a just compensation for the portion of said Spencer tract proposed to be taken for the right of way aforesaid, setting forth the metes and bounds of such portion, and stating that—

"A plan showing the cuts and fills and a description of said property has been filed in the clerk's office of the circuit court of — [the court below] in accordance with the statute in such cases made and provided."

The railroad company accordingly on May 29, 1915, presented its petition under subsection 4, § 1105f, of the eminent domain statute in 3 Pollard's Code 1910, in which it set forth among other things—

"that the owners of the property sought to be condemned are not able to give your petitioner a clear title to this property; * * * that there is filed herewith as 'Exhibit No. 1' which is prayed to be taken as a part of this petition, plat of the survey of the said tract or parcel of land with a profile showing the cuts and fills, trestles and bridges, if any, and a description of the land which is sought to be condemned; that there is also filed herewith a memorandum showing the names and residences of the owners of said property as far as your petitioner has been able to ascertain the same. * * *"

The petition prayed for—

"the appointment of commissioners, as provided by law, to ascertain what will be a just compensation for the land proposed to be condemned for its uses and to award the damages, if any."

resulting to the adjacent or other property owners, or to the property of any other person beyond the peculiar benefits that will accrue to such property, respectively, from the construction and operation of the company's works."

Then followed at the foot of the petition a description of the property sought to be taken as aforesaid, which is the same as in the notice aforesaid, and includes that portion of the Spencer tract which will be hereinafter designated as "lot B."

The memorandum mentioned in said petition was as follows:

"The names and addresses, as far as your petitioner is able to ascertain, of the parties interested in the property sought to be acquired in the foregoing proceedings, are as follows:

"Mrs. J. Y. Spencer, Lynchburg, Va.

"Mr. J. Y. Spencer, Lynchburg, Va."

On May 29, 1915, proceeding under subsection 6 of said section 1105f in 3 Pollard's Code 1910, an order was entered by the judge of the said court below, which recited, among other things, that—

"It appearing to the court that notice has been given by the Norfolk & Western Railway Company to Mrs. J. Y. Spencer and J. Y. Spencer, her husband, that it would on this 29th day of May apply to this court for the appointment of commissioners for the purpose of ascertaining a just compensation for the real estate described in said notice and to award damages, if any, resulting to the adjacent or other property of the owners or others beyond the peculiar benefits that will accrue to any such properties, respectively, from the construction and operation of the company's works; * * * that said notice has been duly published once a week for two consecutive weeks in the Times-Virginian, a paper published in this county, and that the same was posted at the front door of the courthouse of this county on the first day of the rules next preceding this application, and that all the requirements of law preliminary to this application have been duly complied with."

Such order appointed commissioners—

"for the purpose of ascertaining a just compensation for such lands and awarding the damages, if any, resulting to the adjacent or other property of the owners or to the property of any person, beyond the peculiar benefits that will accrue to such properties, respectively, from the construction and operation of the company's works. * * *"

The report of the commissioners, under subsection 9 of said section 1105f in 3 Pollard's Code 1910, of their action under subsection 8 of said section 1105f, Pollard's Code 1904, so far as material, sets forth:

That they were appointed by said court, and the purposes of their appointment, viz.:

"To ascertain what will be a just compensation for such part of the land of the freehold whereof Mrs. J. Y. Spencer et al. are tenants and for such other property as is proposed to be taken by the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, and to assess the damages, if any, resulting to the adjacent or other property of said tenants or owners or to the property of any other person, beyond, * * * etc., as per said order of appointment.

That they met, on the day fixed upon in said order, on the part of said Spencer tract proposed to be taken as aforesaid, setting forth its metes and bounds aforesaid (being lot B aforesaid), and the fact that they were duly sworn, and reported their action as follows:

"* * * Upon a view of the part aforesaid and of the adjacent and other property of said owners and of the property of other persons who will be damaged in their property by the construction and operation of the works of said company, and upon such evidence as was before us, we are of opinion, and do ascertain, that for the said part and for the other property so taken $1,350 will be a just compensation, and the damages to the adjacent and other property of said tenants or owners and to the property of other persons, who will be damaged in their property by reason of the construction and operation of the works of said company, beyond the peculiar benefits that will accrue to such properties, respectively, from the construction and operation of such works are $150." (The italics in the above quotations are supplied.)

This report was dated June 3, 1915. The plats and profiles filed by the railroad company with such proceeding showed the height above the surface of the ground of the embankment it proposed to construct for its line of railroad along the right of way aforesaid in front of the dwelling house of the plaintiff on the Spencer tract and the proposed undergrade crossing and the lowering of the grade of the Pamplin-Charlotte C. H. road as it passed along the side of plaintiff's dwelling house land as aforesaid.

After the commissioner's report aforesaid was filed, to wit, on June 22, 1915, an order of said judge was entered in vacation appointing a commissioner to inquire and report, among other things, what persons were entitled to the said sum of $1,500 and in what proportions. Such commissioner issued a notice to the plaintiff and to Mrs. J. Y. Spencer, J. Y. Spencer, her husband, and Jack Spencer, of the pendency of such proceeding before him under such order. Legal service of such notice was accepted by Mr. Franklin, an attorney at law, as attorney for "all the defendants" in such proceeding. The commissioner reported, in substance, that the plaintiff owned a life estate in the said Spencer tract of land, and the commuted value of it, and that Jack Spencer was the owner in fee of such land in remainder after the life estate therein of the plaintiff.

Some time in July, 1915, as it would seem from the contents thereof (the precise date not appearing from the record), an order was entered by said judge of the court below in said Spencer land condemnation proceeding under said subsection 9 of section 1105f, 3 Pollard's Code 1910, reciting among other things, that the railroad company had paid into court the $1,500 aforesaid, and the order ratified, confirmed, and approved the proceedings and reports of the commissioners in all respects, directed the report to be recorded as provided by law, and dismissed the proceedings from the docket, with provision that the court, however, retain "jurisdiction to direct the distribution of said fund according to law."

By order entered October, 1915, the said judge, after directing the payment of certain costs and expenses, decreed that $747.78 of said $1,500 be paid to the plaintiff as the present value of her life estate in such sum of money, which was accordingly paid over to Mr. Franklin, as her attorney, and by him subsequently paid over to her.

It appears from Mr. Franklin's testimony in the record that he was present at the meeting of the commissioners above mentioned on June 3, 1915, in the Spencer land condemnation proceeding, and that he then represented the plaintiff as her attorney at law, not at her request, but, as he testifies, because the plaintiff had consulted him "time and again, and perhaps nearly every time she has any trouble, for that matter," and that he wrote the deed from plaintiff conveying the Spencer tract of land as aforesaid to Jack Spencer, and "knew that there was a reservation of a life estate in that deed," and, as such witness further testified:

"So when I appeared there * * * I was representing Miss Dora [the plaintiff], because I knew that Miss Dora did not know, and Mrs. Spencer did not seem to know, and I don't reckon she did, that she had a life estate in it. So the commissioners just went through and adopted what you all, you [addressing counsel for the railroad company] and Mrs. Spencer had already agreed on, $1,500."

This witness also testified that no question was considered by the commissioners in arriving at the $1,500 damages which they reported as aforesaid in the Spencer land condemnation proceeding—

"with reference to anything except the damage to that particular piece of land of Jack Spencer's, and you had agreed upon that beforehand."

The following diagram will show the respective locations above mentioned:

After the deed aforesaid from the plaintiff to the railroad company was delivered, and the report of the commissioners in the Spencer land condemnation proceedings had been confirmed as above stated, the railroad company commenced the construction of the works aforesaid and subsequently completed same, all in accordance with its plans and profiles aforesaid filed before the board of supervisors, in the Spencer land condemnation proceedings, and with the profile shown on the "plan" recorded with the deed from the plaintiff to the railroad company aforesaid.

The plaintiff was not examined as a witness in the case, and there is no evidence in this record that she had any actual knowledge as to what the construction of the works of the plaintiff on lot A, or lot B, or the operation of its tracks thereon, would be, or that there would be a change of location of the Darlington Heights road, or a change of grade of the Pamplin-Charlotte C. H. road, until the construction work was in progress; nor any constructive knowledge of any of these things, except that given her by the profile on the "plan" with said deed.

After the completion of said works and the operation for some time of trains of the railroad company over its said newly constructed line, the plaintiff, in October, 1916, instituted this action.

There is an original and amended declaration in the case, and the damages aforesaid sought to be recovered by the allegations thereof are for certain alleged injuries due to certain alleged causes, namely:

(1) To the construction by the railroad company, on lot A, of the embankment aforesaid for its railroad line, and the operation of its trains thereon.

This is alleged, in substance, to have occasioned the following injuries: (a) The depriving of the plaintiff of the front entrance to her dwelling and dwelling house land from the Darlington Heights public road, formerly passing such front, as above noted; (b) the expense to which she has been put in making alterations and repairs to such front entrance; (c) the destruction of the privacy of plaintiff's home; (d) the trash, dust, and dirt finding easy access into said dwelling; (e) the water to be collected and retained upon the dwelling house land, and to soak, percolate, and flow through and into the whole of it, and into and under the dwelling house, causing such house to become and be permanently damp and wet; (f) detraction from the appearance of the dwelling house and dwelling house land; and (g) a nuisance, resulting from the jarring of the ground, shaking the dwelling house, and the noise, smoke, and dust emitted by passing trains on said embankment, whereby the walls, windows, and doors of the dwelling have been cracked, displaced, and broken, and the air in and about the plaintiff's said premises has been so polluted as to sensibly impair the enjoyment thereof, and the ordinary comfort of human existence therein being otherwise materially interfered with.

The first count of the original declaration alleges also the additional injuries of the deprivation of the plaintiff of the use of her front yard and front porch, due to the same cause above mentioned.

(2) The construction by the railroad company of the embankment aforesaid for its railroad on lot B, and the operation by it of its trains thereon.

This is alleged to have caused substantially the same injuries as are alleged to have been caused by the construction of and operation of trains on the embankment on lot A, as aforesaid, except that the additional injuries alleged as aforesaid in the first count of the original declaration are not alleged as to the construction and operation on lot B.

(3) The change by the railroad company of the grade of the Pamplin-Charlotte C. H. public road above mentioned, along the south side of the dwelling house land.

This is alleged to have destroyed "the only road or way to and from the said property of the plaintiff" (being the side driveway entrance above mentioned to the dwelling house land and dwelling), whereby the plaintiff "was unavoidably and of necessity put to great expense in and about making and causing to be made alterations and repairs to her said property."

There was the following special plea filed by the railroad company, and other pleadings not material to be mentioned specifically:

"Special Plea No. 2.

"And the defendant also says that during the construction of the line known as the 'Burkeville-Pamplin Low Grade Line' it became necessary that it should cross the county highway in front of plaintiff's property, as shown on Exhibit No. 1, which is here again referred to, and that in order to do this certain alterations in the public highway adjoining plaintiff's property became necessary in order to construct an undergrade crossing; that the changes and alterations in said highway were made with the consent of the board of supervisors; that by said alterations an undergrade crossing was constructed by the defendant at great expense, instead of a grade crossing, which would otherwise have been necessary; and that such undergrade crossing is greatly to the safety and convenience of the public, and that if plaintiff suffered any inconvenience by such construction and change in said highways that it resulted through a legal and proper change made by or with the consent of the proper authorities having charge of such matters, and for which the defendant is not liable.

"And this the defendant is ready to verify."

Thereupon there was a trial by jury.

Further reference to the evidence and absence of evidence on certain points will be found in the opinion below.

The following instructions were given to the jury over the objection of the plaintiff:

"A. The court instructs the jury that all the elements of damage claimed by the plaintiff in her evidence in this case could be recovered in the condemnation proceedings under the statute of the state of Virginia, and as it is shown by the plaintiff that she appeared by counsel, in the condemnation proceedings of the lot conveyed by her to Jack Spencer, and subsequently received her proper proportion of the damages allowed therein, the jury must find a verdict for the defendant.

"B. The court further instructs the jury that, when the plaintiff conveyed to defendant the strip of land described in the deed to the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, the ownership of said property was vested in defendant, and that it was permitted to use the same for the purpose of the reconstruction of its railroad.

"C. The court further instructs the jury that in so far as the plaintiff claims to have been damaged by the construction of the undergrade crossing, and the vacation of a portion of the old county road that ran in front of her premises, the law vests in the board of county commissioners authority to authorize railway companies to alter public highways whenever in their judgment an equally convenient road shall have been provided by the railway company seeking to cross the said highway, and that if the jury believe from the evidence the plans for said undergrade crossing were submitted to the county commissioners, and approved by them, then the defendant was permitted under the law to proceed with said construction, and it is not liable for the damages thereby occasioned, especially in view of the deed and condemnation proceedings above mentioned."

There was a verdict and judgment for the railroad company, and the plaintiff brings error.

A. S. Hester, of Lynchburg, for plaintiff in error.

F. S. Kirkpatrick, of Lynchburg, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above). The assignments of error present the questions for decision which will be passed upon in their order as stated below.

[1] 1. Does the consent of a board of supervisors under subsection 3 of section 1294b (1 Pollard's Code 1904), to a change of location of a public road by a railroad company, shield the latter from liability for such damages, if any, as such change may cause to the owner or occupant of any lands?

This question must be answered in the negative. Such statute expressly provides that the company exercising such privileges "shall make proper compensation for such damage."

Indeed, we do not understand that the railroad company disputes the correctness of the conclusion just stated, although its plea No. 2 (quoted in the above statement) filed in the case by leave of court over the objection of the plaintiff, raised such question in the trial court, and one of the assignments of error presents it to us for decision.

The positions of the railroad company before us on this subject are, in substance, that while the plaintiff, as an original proposition, was entitled to demand and receive of it just compensation for such damages, that compensation therefor was in fact included (along with compensation for many other claims of damages) in the consideration which the railroad company paid the plaintiff for her deed to it (quoted in the above statement), and that such deed will be construed to have released all claims of the plaintiff for such damages, or that, if this be not so, that such damages were either included in the $150 item of award of damages made by the commissioners in the Spencer land condemnation proceeding (set forth in the above statement), or that such award operated as an estoppel against any subsequent claim for such damages, and that all claims of the plaintiff therefor are barred by such proceeding by reason of the eminent domain statute law on the subject, hereinbelow more specifically set forth.

These positions will be hereinafter dealt with.

[2, 3] 2. Did the deed above mentioned, when properly construed, operate as a release by the plaintiff of the claims of damages made in her original and amended declaration in this case, which were due to the construction of the railroad company, on lot A, of the embankment for its railroad and the operation of its trains thereon?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

A summarized statement of such claims of damages will appear from the statement preceding this opinion.

It is well settled that, if it be a fact that the land conveyed by the deed under consideration (which is shown on the diagram above as "lot A") was conveyed to the railroad company as a right of way for its proposed railroad, the deed vested in the railroad company the same rights as though lot A had been acquired for that purpose by condemnation.

"The conveyance will be held to be a release of all damages which would be presumed to be included in the award of damages if the property had been condemned. The grantor therefore cannot recover for any damages to the remainder of his land which result from a proper construction, use and operation of works upon the property conveyed." 2 Lewis on Em. Dom. (3d Ed.) § 474, citing numerous authorities; Cassidy v. Old Colony R. R., 141 Mass. 174, 5 N. E. 142; Roushlang v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 115 Ind. 106, 17 N. E. 198; Hortman v. Covington, etc., R. Co., 18 B. Mon. (Ky.) 219.

This rule covers all damages to the residue of the tract, where a part of a tract is taken by condemnation proceedings, or is conveyed, for a right of way for a railroad, which are due to the construction and operation of the railroad on a grade different from the natural surface of the land, because of the erection of an embankment on the right of way on such part of the land which does not physically impinge upon or upheave the land adjacent to the right of way, or deprive it of lateral soil support, or violate the riparian or surface water rights of the owner thereof, unless the railroad company has limited itself to a particular grade or method of construction and operation, or the damages have been assessed, in the case of condemnation, or paid, in the case of a purchase and conveyance, upon the basis of such limitation. In the absence of such limitation, all damages, past, present, and future, to the residue of such real estate due to such construction and operation, are presumed to have been included in the award of damages in a condemnation proceeding, and in the consideration paid therefor in case of a conveyance. 2 Lewis on Em. Dom. §§ 110-114, 712-714, 818, 820, 821, 824, 830; Cassidy v. Old Colony R. Co., 141 Mass. 174, 5 N. E.

E. 573; Costigan v. Penn. R. Co., 54 N. J. Law, 233, 23 Atl. 810. The case of Fisher v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 102 Va. 363, 46 S. E. 381, 1 Ann. Cas. 622, rests upon the same presumption.

[4] It is true that for a number of years there has been a general statute in Virginia which in condemnation proceedings requires all companies exercising the right of eminent domain to file with the petition a plat of the survey of the right of way proposed to be taken, with a profile showing the cuts and fills, etc., which enforces upon such companies a fixing of a limitation upon the grade line differing from that of the natural surface of the land to which they propose to construct their works and upon which they propose to operate their trains. Such limitation forms a basis for the assessment of damages by the commissioners in the condemnation proceeding, and such a company, if it afterward desires to change or adopt a substantially different grade, must obtain authority therefor, either by purchase or by further condemnation proceedings; otherwise, it will in subsequent actions therefor be liable for damages occasioned to property owners affected by such change of grade of the construction or operation thereon of its works.

A railroad company, in the absence of such statute or of a similar requirement in its charter, at the time of the location and acquisition of the right of way, on a parcel of land which is a part of a larger tract, having acquired a right of way of a certain width by condemnation proceedings, is, as between it and the owner of the residue of such tract of land, and those in privity of estate with the latter, bound by no limitation upon the height to which it may construct its works thereon and operate the same, and change such height of construction and operation thereon of its trains from time to time, except such limitation as may arise from its duty to keep within the reasonable requirements of the discharge of its duties as a public service corporation and the further requirement of law that such construction and operation shall be done in a reasonably skillful and proper manner.

There being no statute enforcing upon railroad companies a fixing of a limitation upon the construction and operation of its works prior to its purchase of a right of way, unless it voluntarily does so, a conveyance to it of land for its right of way will operate to confer upon it, as between it and the grantor and those in privity of estate with the latter, as aforesaid, the unlimited right of construction and operation of its works upon the land conveyed, at such height from the natural surface of the ground as its requirements aforesaid and reasonably skillful manner of construction and operation from time to time may dictate.

Some of the decisions hold, as indicated above, but not without conflict of authority, that notwithstanding a condemnation or conveyance of a right of way for a railroad company, unlimited as to the right of construction of the railroad thereon at any grade at variance with the natural surface of the ground, there is nevertheless a limitation imposed upon the railroad company's right of construction of its works in certain particulars, which is the same as that upon the rights of ordinary proprietors of land, namely, that the railroad company cannot, any more than an ordinary owner of land, by construction of works upon its right of way, do any actionable injury to an adjacent landowner by depriving the soil of the adjacent land of support, or by interfering with the flow of running streams thereon, or with the surface water rights of the adjacent land owner, without liability to him for damages, in addition to those awarded in the condemnation proceedings, or covered by a consideration for a conveyance. See 2 Lewis on Em. Dom., supra, especially sections 110-114, 818, 820, 824, 826. But since there is no allegation in the pleadings of the plaintiff in the instant case of any injuries caused by deprivation of lateral soil support to her land adjacent to the right of way of the railroad company, nor of interference with any riparian water rights in any flowing stream thereon; and since there is no proof in the case of any violation of surface water rights, although there is, as noted in the above statement of the case, an allegation in the declaration of the violation of the latter rights of the plaintiff on her adjacent land, we are relieved of the duty of entering upon any consideration of the precise limits of such rights as are mentioned in this paragraph, or of how far they may furnish exceptions to the rule we have under consideration as to the effect of a deed to a railroad company conveying to it a right of way for its railroad.

[5] But the plaintiff contends that it cannot be said that the deed in the instant case was for a right of way for the railroad company, that it is but an ordinary conveyance to it as the grantee of land in fee, with a description of the boundaries thereof, and conferred no other rights upon the railroad company with respect to the use thereof than any individual grantee has, namely, to hold and use the land subject to the law applicable to adjoining proprietors of land and of the maxim "sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas," and the following authorities are cited to sustain such position, viz.: Pettit v. Jamestown, etc., R. Co., 222 Pa. 490, 71 Atl. 1048, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 822, 323; Lewis on Em. Dom., supra, § 820; Beatty v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., 6 W. Va. 391.

In the Pettit Case cited, the deed was to an individual as "trustee," not stating for whom the grantee was "trustee," so that it did not appear on the face of the deed that the conveyance was to a railroad company. Further, in that case, the injury in question consisted of the removal of the lateral support of the soil of plaintiff's land by work done by defendant on its adjacent right of way conveyed by the deed, as to which subject an exceptional rule applies in some jurisdictions, as above noted. Lateral soil support and interference with riparian rights in running streams of water and with surface water rights of an adjoining landowner, as furnishing exceptions to the general rule applicable to the effect of the award of damages in a condemnation proceeding, and to the construction of deeds of conveyance of land for the right of way aforesaid, are above considered, and are the subject of what is said in section 820 of Lewis on Eminent Domain, cited. In Beatty v. B. & O. R. R. Co., cited, the injury and resultant damage complained of concerned the water rights of the plaintiff, and was caused by the failure of the railroad company to make or provide a sufficient drain to carry off the water through an embankment built on its right of way. As above noted, an exceptional rule obtains in some jurisdictions on that subject, and there are considerations as to when such exceptional rule is operative, or as to whether a given case does or does not fall within such exception, which are immaterial to the instant case and need not be entered into here. However, in that case, itself, the deed conveyed a parcel of land in fee simple without any condition, merely referring to the proposed line of railroad in the designation of the boundaries of the land conveyed (as does the deed in the instant case, if the profile therewith be left out of view), and the court in its opinion said:

"Although no purpose is expressed in the deed, the company acquired this land, it may well be inferred, for the purpose of constructing its road upon it."

So, in the instant case, in view of the fact that the deed is made directly to the railroad company as grantee, in view also of what is stated in the deed on the subject of the line of railroad which was not then in existence, and of what is shown on the "Plan" made a part of the deed (which "Plan" appears in the statement preceding this opinion), even if we left out of consideration the profile shown on such "Plan" which evidenced that the railroad would be constructed on the land conveyed on an embankment, as it was afterwards constructed, we cannot escape the conclusion that it appears on the face of the deed that the conveyance was of a right of way for the proposed railroad of the grantee, especially in view also of the statute law of this state, which requires a railroad company to purchase the land for its right of way, if it can agree with its owner upon the price and terms therefor (which includes damages to the residue of the land of the owner where only a part of a tract is taken for the right of way), and does not allow the railroad company to proceed by condemnation proceeding, unless it cannot so agree with such owner, or unless title to such land cannot be obtained by conveyance from the owner.

That a conveyance in fee has no significance upon the question of whether it is a right of way for a railroad, since under our eminent domain statute the company obtains title to its right of way in fee by condemnation proceedings.

The general rule applicable to the change of grade of streets, namely, that damages occasioned by such change are not in general presumed to have been included in a prior condemnation proceeding, or to have been released by a prior conveyance of a right of way for a street, is urged upon us for plaintiff as in conflict with the view of the law which we have above taken. The case of Harman v. City of Bluefield, 70 W. Va. 129, 73 S. E. 297, is cited and especially relied on for plaintiff upon this point. An examination of such case and of other authorities on this subject (see 2 Lewis on Em. Dom. §§ 712-714, 825, and authorities there cited) discloses that where no limitation is placed upon the grade of the street prior to or at the time of the condemnation of the right of way therefor, by plans establishing a grade line or otherwise, damages will be awarded in the condemnation proceeding, once for all, to cover the right of the municipality to establish any grade it may see fit. And the general rule adverted to in the beginning of this paragraph obtains only where a prior limitation has been placed upon the grade of the street, either by a formal establishment of grade lines, or by the use of a road or street way of a certain grade, which it was not contemplated at the time of such use would ever be changed. Hence such general rule cannot be regarded as at all in conflict with the view which we have above taken of the law.

[6] It should also be noted that it is urged upon our consideration for plaintiff that the deed in the instant case was drawn by the grantee, or its agents, and that the rule as to such a deed is that "any doubt as to its true meaning should be solved adversely to the company," citing Lockwood v. Ohio R. R. Co., 103 Fed. 243, 43 C. C. A. 202. Such rule as applied in that case, however, had to do merely with the meaning of ambiguous language in the deed, and cannot at all affect a rule of law applicable to the proper construction of a deed about the language of which there is no ambiguity. Hence we think there is no merit in such position.

[7] The foregoing has proceeded upon the idea that the profile shown on the "Plan" which is a part of the deed in the instant case, conveyed no meaning to the plaintiff, which is the position taken for the plaintiff in the case. We cannot concur in this view, however. We think that the plaintiff is as much bound by and affected with constructive knowledge of what is shown on such "Plan" as she is with knowledge of any other contents of the deed. The "Plan" aforesaid is expressly made a part of the deed by the language of the deed itself. This being so, the conclusion above reached, as to the release of damages which the law will imply from the execution and delivery of said deed, is strengthened.

Coming now to the application of the above conclusions of law to the injuries complained of by the plaintiff in the instant case, as due to the construction by the railroad company of the embankment on lot A, and the operation of its trains thereon (which are set forth in detail in the above statement of the case), and resultant damages sought to be recovered in the instant case therefor, we are of opinion that the deed aforesaid operated as a release of all of such claims of damages of which there is any evidence whatever in the record. We will here mention these matters and our conclusions thereon seriatim:

(a) The embankment constructed on lot A occupied the old location of the Darlington Heights road to its center, and its construction, so as to be used as a part of the railroad, necessarily obstructed the whole of that road, and that deprived the plaintiff of the front entrance to her dwelling and dwelling house land from such road.

(b) Any expense to which the plaintiff has been (or may be) put in making alterations and repairs to such front entrance has the same cause.

(c) The destruction of the privacy of the plaintiff's home has the same cause.

The same is true of—

(d) The trash, dust, and dirt finding easy access into said dwelling; (f) the detraction from the appearance of the dwelling house and dwelling house land; and (g) the nuisance, resulting from the jarring of the ground, shaking the dwelling house, and the noise, smoke, and dust emitted by passing trains on said embankment, whereby the walls, windows, and doors of the dwelling are alleged to have been cracked, displaced, and broken, and the air in and about the said premises has been so polluted as to sensibly impair the enjoyment thereof and the ordinary comfort of human existence therein, etc., as alleged—so far as there is any evidence in the case tending to show such injuries, or any of them.

As above noted, there is no evidence in the case tending to prove the allegation mentioned above under the heading (e), with respect to the collection of water and its retention upon the dwelling house land, causing it to soak, percolate, and flow through and into the whole of such land, and into and under the dwelling house, causing it to become and be permanently damp and wet; hence no further mention need be made of that matter.

As to the allegations of the first count of the original declaration of the additional injuries of the deprivation of the plaintiff of the use of her front yard and front porch:

There is no evidence in the case of any deprivation of use of the front yard or porch. The only evidence of deprivation of use of any entrance to the front of the dwelling house land (except that afforded by the old location of the Darlington Heights road, which was obstructed and necessarily made impassible by the construction of the embankment on lot A and its use as a part of the line of railroad constructed thereon, as aforesaid) is to the effect that a front driveway was obstructed, which entered the dwelling house land from the Darlington Heights road, by a gate located on the north side of the front yard (which gate was on the eastern line of lot A); but that was obstructed, and necessarily so, by the embankment constructed on lot A.

[§] 3. Did the deed above mentioned operate as a release by the plaintiff of her claims of damages which were not due to the construction by the railroad company on lot A of the embankment for its railroad, or to the operation of its trains thereover, but were due to the construction or operation of the works of the railroad company on lot B, of the embankment, undergrade crossing, etc., mentioned in and shown on the diagram with the statement preceding this opinion?

This question must be answered in the negative.

The rule is well settled that, while an award of damages in a condemnation proceeding to take a part of a tract of land will be presumed to include damages to the residue of that tract, due to the construction and operation on the part of the land taken, as above stated, such award will not be presumed to include other damages to such residue of land due to the construction and operation of the company's works on a different, or on part of a different tract of land not involved in such condemnation proceeding. And the same rule applies to deeds of conveyance of a right of way for a railroad. Lewis on Em. Dom. § 822; Alabama, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 92 Ala. 277, 9 South. 203; Tinker v. City of Rockford, supra, (137 Ill. 123, 28 N. E. 573); Eaton v. B. C., etc., R. Co., 51 N. H. 504, 12 Am. Rep. 147; Delaware, etc., Canal Co. v. Lee, 22 N. J. Law, 243; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Harris, 47 Ark. 340, 1 S. W. 609.

On this subject Lewis on Em. Domain says, in section 822, cited:

"* * * If parts of black acre and white acre are taken, and if the works as constructed upon black acre produce damage to white acre, then there is no presumption that these were included in the assessment to the proprietor of white acre, and he may recover therefor as though no land of his had been taken for the work"—citing numerous cases.

The same section of this work also states that—

" * * * When parts of certain lots were taken for a railroad and damages assessed therefor, and the parts not taken were damaged by the railroad crossing and obstructing a street upon which the lots abutted at some distance from the lots, it was held that the latter damages were not included in the assessment and that an action would lie to recover the same. * * * Many of the cases which have been cited are where the plaintiff had conveyed or released the part appropriated, but the effect of a conveyance or release as to future damages is the same as a condemnation."

It is said on this subject in the opinion of the court in the case of Tinker v. City of Rockford, supra (137 Ill. 123, 28 N. E. 573), that the principle involved is:

"That the deed of land for right of way for a railway company has the same effect, as between the parties, that a condemnation under the law of eminent domain, for that purpose, would have. But it must be obvious that this principle can have no application to anything not included within the grant—as, for instance, to damages caused by acts done by the railroad company upon other lands than those to which the grant relates—for, as between the grant and damages resulting from such acts, it is impossible that there can be the relation of cause and effect."

The case of Forest View Land Co. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 120 Va. 308, 91 S. E. 198, is relied on for the railroad company as establishing a different rule in this state. In that case the deed involved contained an express release of claims for damages, which was the same in its terms as the release of damages implied by law in a deed to a railroad company for a right of way where the deed is silent on the subject of such release. The landowner in that case did not contest the effect of the release upon any ground in conflict with the views above expressed, but contended that the works of the railroad company were not in fact constructed on the land conveyed. We rejected this contention, and held that the works of the railroad company were on the land conveyed, within the meaning of the language of the release, when construed in the light of all the facts and circumstances in the case, including particularly the knowledge with which the grantors in the deed were charged as to the unified and entire plan of the company. It follows, therefore, that the Forest View Land Company Case is not controlling as authority in the case now before us.

Of course, the rule last mentioned must be reasonably applied. If the acts of the railroad company done on lot B were inseparably attendant upon those done on lot A, and have not caused any additional injuries to the dwelling house land, or dwelling thereon, than have been caused by the acts of the railroad company on lot A, then, manifestly, the claim that such injuries were in part caused by acts of the railroad company on lot B would not avail the plaintiff to obviate the aforesaid bar of the deed. Only one satisfaction can be demanded for the same damages, although they may be due to more than one contributing cause. However, the deed does not bar the plaintiff's right to recover damages, due to the acts of the railroad company on lot B, which are additional to or are different from the damages due to the acts of the railroad company on lot A.

[9] It may be true that little, if any, of the injuries complained of in the instant case as due to the construction and operation of the railroad company's works on lot B were different or in addition to those caused by the same character of construction and operation on the adjacent lot A. But this is a question for the jury under proper instructions and cannot be properly decided by us. Such question was not submitted to the jury in the court below, but was withdrawn from the jury as a result of the instructions given as aforesaid.

[10] 4. Did the deed above mentioned operate as a release by the plaintiff of the claim of damage due to the change of grade by the railroad company of the Pamplin-Charlotte C. H. public road, above mentioned, along the south side of the dwelling house land?

The injury and resulting damage which such change of grade is alleged to have occasioned is set out in the above statement of the case.

Such act of the railroad company was not done on the land granted by the deed, but upon other land, and the injury alleged was different from any of those alleged to have been occasioned by the acts of the railroad company upon the land granted. Hence, for the reasons stated and upon the authorities cited in the consideration of the third question above, we are of opinion that this fourth question, now under consideration, must be answered in the negative.

[11, 12] 5. Did the Spencer land condemnation proceedings, set forth in the statement preceding this opinion, operate as an estoppel of, or bar the plaintiff's action in the instant case for the recovery of the alleged damages to her dwelling house land and dwelling thereon alleged to have been occasioned by reason of the construction by the railroad company of its works on the embankment, undergrade crossing, etc., on lot B, and its subsequent operation of its trains thereon, and by reason also of the changing of the grade of the Pamplin-Charlotte C. H. public road, as also set forth in the said statement?

This question will be decided by the determination of whether the statute herein-after quoted purports to bar the plaintiff's action in the instant case. We shall, therefore, confine our consideration of the subject in hand to that question.

The railroad company relies on the statute contained in subsection 23 of section 1105f (the eminent domain statute, 1 Pollard's Code 1904), as a bar to the plaintiff's action for the damages now in question, which, so far as material, is as follows:

"Who may be a Party to the Proceedings—When Right of Action will Abate.

"(23) Any persons * * * who claims that he will be damaged in his property by reason of the location, construction * * * of the line * * * maintenance, or proper and reasonable operation of any works in this act mentioned * * * for public use, may appear before the commissioners appointed as in this act provided, at the time and place provided for their meeting, make himself a party to the proceedings, and have his rights passed upon by the commissioners, and his damages, if any, ascertained, allowed; and paid as in this act hereinbefore provided for the taking of land, material, water, or other things. But after the notice required by this act, and the judgment of the court upon the report of the commissioners, and the payment to the * * * persons therein named, or into court, for their use, of the sum or sums of money ascertained by such report, no action shall be brought by any person, whether he appeared or not, to recover compensation for * * * damages, considered and passed upon by the commissioners, resulting * * * from the location, construction * * * of the line, or * * * maintenance, or proper and reasonable operation of any such works." (Italics supplied.)

We are of opinion that under such statute the plaintiff might have appeared in the Spencer land condemnation proceeding and have had her right to the damages now under consideration "passed upon by the commissioners" acting therein. But the test of whether the plaintiff is or is not estopped, or is or is not barred from maintaining a subsequent action for the damages we have under consideration, is not the application of the doctrine of res adjudicata, but a test prescribed by the statute just quoted. Under that statute the question is not one of estoppel, but one of whether the action is or is not barred. And the test of the latter is the same, as we shall presently point out in more detail, whether the plaintiff "appeared or not" in such condemnation proceeding. It becomes unnecessary, therefore, to consider the questions raised in the record as to whether the plaintiff, by the appearance of her attorney before the commissioners, became then a party to the proceeding, or as to what was the effect upon her said rights of being a party to the subsequent proceeding making distribution of the damages awarded as aforesaid.

Further: It will be observed from a reading of the statute that it provides, in substance, that if certain prerequisites as to notice, etc., set forth in the statute, are fulfilled, then all persons, whether they have "appeared" in the proceeding "or not," are thereafter barred from bringing any action to recover compensation for the "damages considered and passed upon by the commissioners" in such proceeding, but only such damages as have been so considered and passed upon are thereby barred of future recovery.

The record furnished by the commissioners' report in the Spencer land condemnation proceedings is relied on by the railroad company to evidence the fact that the damages to plaintiff's dwelling house land and dwelling house thereon sought to be recovered in this action, were "considered and passed upon by the commissioners" in such condemnation proceeding.

If the commissioners' report does show this, with the certainty which the law requires in such case, in the absence of fraud (and none is alleged in the instant case) the report is conclusive of that fact in a collateral proceeding (such as this is).

The only portion of the commissioners' report aforesaid which can be relied on to establish the fact aforesaid is the following:

"We are of opinion, and do ascertain, that for the said part [of the Spencer land] and for other property so taken, $1,350 will be a just compensation, and the damages to the adjacent and other property of said tenants or owners [of the Spencer land] and to the other property of other persons, who will be damaged in their property by reason of the construction and operation of the works of said company * * * are $150."

It will be observed that this on its face presents a case of a report awarding, and not denying, damages. First, so considering the report—

The precise question before us is: Does it appear from such language of such report with any reasonable degree of certainty that a part of the $150 damages awarded was awarded as damages to the plaintiff's property last above mentioned?

It is apparent that some of the language employed in reporting the damages considered and passed upon by the commissioners was unquestionably copied, and did not report an actual consideration of and passing upon damages. For instance, the report states that the $1,350 was ascertained as a just compensation not alone for the "said part" of the Spencer tract "so taken," which was the fact as disclosed by the record of the proceeding set forth in the above statement, but that such $1,350 was also "for the other property so taken." There was no such other property taken. The proceedings being statutory, the plain mandate of subsections 4 and 8 of said eminent domain statute, requiring a description of any "other property" proposed to be taken to be contained in the petition and report, could not be ignored as a prerequisite to such taking. No such description was contained in such proceedings under consideration, and no such property was even sought to be taken in such proceeding. Again: The report states that the commissioners ascertained that—

*"The damages to the adjacent and other property of said tenants or owners, and to the property of other persons who will be damaged in their property * * * are $150."*

Now there was no "other property of said tenants or owners" (meaning the tenants or owners of the Spencer land), as to which damages could have been "considered and passed upon" by the commissioners, except the residue of the Spencer tract adjacent to the part of that tract "taken," as shown by the record. This being so, it seems manifest to us that the commissioners were using some form for their report which, in the particulars mentioned, probably copied the language of the eminent domain statute, or of the petition of the railroad company in the proceedings, or of the order of court appointing them, quoted in the statement preceding this opinion, and that such language was inapplicable to and did not report the actual action of the commissioners in such particulars. That no such action occurred is disclosed by the face of the record, such report notwithstanding, when the report is read in the light of the whole record in the condemnation proceeding.

How, then, stands the question of whether the commissioners, as a matter of fact, did consider and pass upon the damages to the dwelling house land and dwelling thereon of the plaintiff? The only language in the report which can be relied on to show such fact is the sentence, included in the above quotation, in which the commissioners report $150 as the—

As we have pointed out, no portion of the $150 was in fact awarded as damages to "other property of said tenants or owners." Can it be said from the report with any reasonable certainty that any portion of the $150 was awarded as damages "to the property of other persons?" Is it not equally probable that the language of the report which is relied on by the railroad company to have the effect of making the commissioners so report, was copied, as aforesaid, and no more reported or was intended to report actual action of the commissioners than did the other language in the same sentence which, as we have just seen, was merely formal and was probably so copied. To say the least of the language under consideration, as was in part said in the case of C. & O. Canal Co. v. Hoyer, 2 Gratt. (43 Va.) 514, of a similar ambiguity in a report of commissioners in a condemnation proceeding:

*"It is probable the words * * * were copied from the terms of the act," or from the* *papers in the condemnation proceeding aforesaid, "and that no damages were allowed for this reason. * * * Their finding is uncertain. * * "

It is true that the case last cited is not one in which the report of the commissioners was drawn in question in a collateral proceeding, as in the instant case, but it is helpful as disclosing the view taken by this court of the definiteness and certainty which should characterize such reports and of the principle involved.

But wholly aside from the matters of uncertainty aforementioned, the report of the commissioners in the instant case, in the language above quoted, relating to the award of the $150 damages, contains another serious, and as we shall presently see fatal, ambiguity, even if the view be taken of it that the commissioners meant to report any damages to "other property of other persons," or that they had "considered and passed upon" the damages now sought to be recovered by the plaintiff, and had allowed or denied an award of anything as such damages. The report upon such view of it, either awards the $150 damages to three separate, different, and distinct properties, to wit: (1) The adjacent Spencer land, being the residue of the Spencer tract not taken; (2) other property of the tenants or owners of the Spencer land; and (3) "to the other property of other persons"—or it awards such damages to the adjacent Spencer land and denies any damages to the other property of the tenants or owners of the Spencer land and "to the other property of other persons."

What "other property" and what "other persons" are meant? It is impossible to determine these questions from the report. It does not say all other property, or all other persons. (We should perhaps say in passing, however, that we do not mean to hold that the use of the word "all" in this connection would have removed the ambiguity under consideration.) For aught that the report contains, the commissioners may have considered and passed upon the damages to the property of A. and B., or any other two or more persons, and never considered the damages to the property of the plaintiff last above mentioned. The only fact which it could be claimed that the report evidences as to what damages "to other property of other persons" the commissioners considered and passed upon is that they awarded a part of the $150 as damages, or denied the award of any damages, to the property of other persons (in the plural number), the persons being unnamed and the property otherwise unidentified. Such a report, manifestly, supplies no record evidencing that damages to any particular property of any person, other than the Spencer property, were considered and passed upon by the commissioners, favorably or unfavorably, by being awarded or denied; and clearly it does not show that the damages to the plaintiff's property under consideration were considered and passed upon by the commissioners by being awarded or denied; that is to say, the commissioners' report furnishes no evidence whatever on that subject.

It would be easy enough in all cases of condemnation for the commissioners to state in their report specifically what cases they in fact consider on the question of damages and the results of their action, whether in awarding or denying the award of damages, in each case considered, so that when any subsequent suit for damages is instituted the report may be turned to for evidence upon the question of whether such damages have or have not been considered and passed upon in the condemnation proceeding. Such a procedure would be but fair alike to companies exercising the right of eminent domain and to property owners affected. And that the report of the commissioners should measure up to such requirement is, we think, the true intent and meaning of the eminent domain statute aforesaid. Only by such a procedure can such companies be freed from the danger of being vexed with suits for damages which have been awarded and paid, and property owners be relieved from the danger of the effort being made to deprive them of their right to have their bona fide claims of damages in fact passed upon and adjudicated, so that such property right may not be taken away without due process of law by some constructive adjudication which never in truth occurred.

The general rules prevailing on this subject are considered in chapter XXI of Lewis on Eminent Domain (3d Ed.), especially in sections 764, 766, and 767. We refrain, however, at this time from a more specific holding in the premises than that made in the next preceding paragraph, since the decision of the case before us does not require it.

6. There were rulings of the trial court on questions of the admission or exclusion of testimony which are made the subject of assignments of error Nos. II and III, on pages 2 and 3 of the printed petition for writ of error in the instant case; but, as they raise no novel questions, we deem it unnecessary to say more of them than that we are of opinion that there was no error in such rulings of the court below.

7. There were instructions asked for by the plaintiff which were refused by the trial court, which are not set forth in the statement of the case preceding this opinion, as they do not raise any questions upon the facts of this case not otherwise raised in the record. It is deemed sufficient to say of such instructions that some of them are in conflict with the views above expressed, and as a whole they are not so framed as to be applicable on a new trial of the case in accordance with this opinion.

For the reasons stated above, we are of opinion to set aside the verdict and judgment under review and award the plaintiff a new trial, to be had, if she is so advised, not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

HANCOCK v. MITCHELL. (C. C. No. 70.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 14, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER §48(2)—CONDITIONAL PRIVILEGE—STATEMENTS IN PETITION TO REMOVE PUBLIC OFFICER.

A citizen having an interest in the due and proper performance of the duties of a public officer or agent may petition the tribunal appointing such officer or agent and having power to remove him, for his removal, without liability for false or erroneous representations made therein as ground for removal, provided they were made in good faith for the purpose aforesaid and without malice and knowledge of their untruthfulness, even though he has no right to prosecute the removal proceeding as a party litigant, and he may set up such right as a qualified or conditional privilege by way of defense in an action against him for libel, based upon allegations of false and malicious representations contained in his petition.

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER §36, 101(4)—PETITION FOR REMOVAL OF PUBLIC OFFICER—STATEMENTS IN GOOD FAITH—PRESUMPTION—ABSOLUTE PRIVILEGE.

Such right raises a presumption of good faith in the preparation, circulation, and presentation of the petition, which precludes right of recovery, in the absence of allegation and proof of express malice therein; but it does not constitute an absolute privilege, absolving the petitioner from liability without regard to his motives and conduct.

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER §83, 100(5)—QUALIFIED OR CONDITIONAL PRIVILEGE—PLEADING.

Though such qualified or conditional privilege may be established by proof under the general issue, it may be pleaded specially, since the plea setting it up is in the nature of a confession and avoidance.

4. LIBEL AND SLANDER §9(1), 10(1)—IMPROPER CONDUCT OF PUBLIC OFFICER—RIGHT OF ACTION—DEFENSES—INCAPACITY IN TRADE OR PROFESSION.

A writing which imputes to an officer improper conduct in his office or incompetence to discharge the duties thereof properly, or charges a person with incapacity in his trade or profession, is actionable without allegation or proof of special damages, in the absence of proof of legal excuse therefor or justification thereof.

Certified Questions from Circuit Court, Monroe County.

Suit for libel by Jack W. Hancock against C. C. Mitchell. Demurrer to declaration overruled, and plaintiff's demurrers to two special pleas of privilege overruled, and rulings certified. Action of Circuit Court sustained.

R. L. Clark, of Union, and Morton & Mohler, of Charleston, for plaintiff.

Jno. L. Rowan, of Union, and T. N. Read, of Hinton, for defendant.

POFFENBARGER, J. The rulings certified for review in this case adversely disposed of the defendant's demurrer to a declaration charging libel of the plaintiff and the plaintiff's demurrers to two special pleas of privilege.

All of the questions so raised and disposed of depend largely upon the relative rights of a public officer or agent and a citizen and taxpayer, respecting a written or printed petition or memorial to the tribunal appointing the officer and having power to remove him for cause, charging incompetence and misconduct, circulated among citizens and taxpayers for signatures and afterward adopted by such tribunal, as charges of misconduct in its unsuccessful proceeding for removal of the officer. Claiming absolute privilege for such a publication by a citizen and taxpayer, the defendant denied the legal sufficiency of the declaration charging libel in the writing, circulation, and filing of the petition. On the overruling of his demurrer, he filed two special pleas, in one of which he claimed absolute privilege to write and use the paper in the manner complained of, and in the other a qualified or conditional privilege to do so.

The plaintiff, a civil engineer by profession, held the office of county road engineer of Monroe county, by appointment of the county court of that county. While supervising the grading of a certain portion of one of the main roads of the county, he became involved in controversies with some of the citizens respecting the use of it and means of travel between the town of Union and another place called Salt Sulphur Springs, which culminated in the circulation and filing of the petition to the county court. It sought the establishment of a temporary road for the use of the public in lieu of the existing road, while the latter was undergoing improvement, and removal of the road engineer from office for "incompetency and for misfeasance and malfeasance in office."

Right in the defendant to seek the establishment of a temporary road, by means of a petition to the county court, seems to be admitted, and the charge is that, in the exercise of such right and under cover thereof, he maliciously and wrongfully sought removal of the officer, specifying in the petition several instances of alleged misconduct. This basic proposition is asserted under the impression that the law does not permit a citizen to invoke a proceeding for removal of a county road engineer, notwithstanding the authority conferred upon county courts to remove such officers, by the statute (chapter 43, § 37, Barnes' Code of 1918), and that, therefore, the defendant had no right to compose and circulate the petition for signatures and present it to the county court. Though the statute does not prescribe nor expressly authorize such procedure, it confers the power of removal upon county courts, saying such a court may exercise it "upon its own volition or upon complaint by the state road commission."

[1] Under the right of petition guaranteed by Const. art. 3, § 16, any citizen or body of citizens may petition public officers and tribunals for redress of grievances. A citizen and taxpayer has such interest in the public roads of his county and the control, management, and improvement thereof as makes incompetence, misfeasance, or malfeasance on the part of officers and agents in control thereof work an injury and grievance to him. He may therefore rightfully complain of it to the tribunal appointing such officers and agents, and having power to direct and govern their action and to remove them. White v. Nicholls, 3 How. 206, 11 L. Ed. 591; Tyree v. Harrison, 100 Va. 540, 42 S. E. 295; Kent v. Bongartz, 15 R. I. 72, 22 Atl. 1023, 2 Am. St. Rep. 870; Gray v. Pentland, 2 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 23; Decker v. Gaylord, 85 Hun (N. Y.) 584; Thorn v. Blanchard, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 508; Blakeslee v. Carroll, 64 Conn. 223, 29 Atl. 473, 25 L. R. A. 106; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 1040; 25 Cyc. 389, citing numerous authorities.

But the privilege thus allowed is not an absolute one, as contended by the attorney for the defendant. It raises a presumption of good faith and lack of malice in the representations made, in consequence of which express malice must be established by allegation and proof, to warrant a recovery. See the authorities just referred to. This declaration expressly alleges malice in all the charges made. The petition was not a pleading filed in a judicial proceeding. The statute confers no right upon citizens to initiate or prosecute a removal proceeding by the suing out of process and filing of pleadings. In the circulation and filing of such a memorial, they exercise only the right of assembly and petition for the redress of grievances, and are not deemed to be, in any sense, litigants. County Court v. Armstrong, 34 W. Va. 326, 12 S. E. 488; County Court v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 87, 11 S. E. 747; City of Charleston v. Littlepage, 73 W. Va. 156, 80 S. E. 131, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 353. The spreading of the petition on the record or the filing thereof as for charges and specifications of grounds of removal was the act of the county court, and did not legally make the petitioners parties to the proceeding. Hence the principles announced and applied in Johnson v. Brown, 13 W. Va. 71, and according absolute privilege in some instances, do not apply here.

[2-4] Although the charges of accusation of criminal offenses, made by way of innuendo in the declaration, are not sustained by the terms alleged to have been used in the petition, the language used there was libelous, if false, for it branded the plaintiff with incompetence in his profession and office, neglect of duty and misconduct. For this reason, it is actionable, and an allegation of special damage was not essential to the right of action asserted. Odgers, Lib. & Sl. 2, 17, 25, 32; 26 Cyc. 344, 345; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 942, 949; Hoyle v. Young, 1 Wash. (Va.) 150, 1 Am. Dec. 446.

Though privilege, whether absolute or conditional, may be proved in actions for libel, under the general issue, the defense may be set up by special pleas, since they are in the nature of a confession and avoidance. Johnson v. Brown, cited; 1 Chitty, Pl. (11th Am. Ed.) 493.

The court overruled several motions to strike out words, phrases, and clauses of the plea. Some of the matter thus excepted to constitutes mere surplusage, and the residue of it may not be essential. Under the statute authorizing this form of review, the appellate court is required and empowered only to determine the legal sufficiency of pleadings, process, and service. The consumption of time necessary to correction of pleadings as regards form only cannot be deemed to have been within the legislative purpose. We have statutes dispensing with matters of mere form. Surplusage in pleadings is not substantially harmful. If more is claimed than the facts set up confer, the trial court has ample power to limit the parties to their actual rights by its rulings in the course of the trial. For reasons already stated, both the declaration and the pleas are found to be sufficient in law, and we are under no obligation to conduct any further inquiries upon this certificate.

FISHER v. SOMMERVILLE, Judge, et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 14, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE — 308 — ABANDONMENT — PENAL STATUTE — CONSTITUTIONALITY.

In so far as the provisions of chapter 51 of the Acts of the Legislature of 1917, sections 16c(1) to 16c(8) of chapter 144 of Barnes' Code of 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, §§ 5179a-5179h), provide for enforcement of the duty of a husband to provide for the support of his destitute wife and children, pending a criminal proceeding against him for his failure to support them, without just cause, they are constitutional and valid.

2. COURTS — 43 — EQUITY JURISDICTION — POWER OF LEGISLATURE.

The Legislature is not inhibited by anything in the Constitution from extending the powers and jurisdiction of the law courts to subjects of equity cognizance.

3. JURY — 14(1) — RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL — ABANDONMENT OF WIFE.

The Constitution does not guarantee to a husband right of trial by jury on a charge of inexcusable failure to support and maintain his wife and children, nor on an issue as to what amount he should pay for such purpose.

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE — 316 — CRIMINAL PROCEEDING FOR ABANDONMENT — PROCEEDING FOR SUPPORT — MERGER.

Although said statute authorizes initiation of the proceeding for support and a criminal prosecution at the same time, in the same court and on a single complaint, it does not merge or consolidate the two proceedings into one, nor make the former an aid to the latter.

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE — 316 — ABANDONMENT — PROCEEDINGS — STATUTE.

The complaint and the warrant issued thereon, under it, confer jurisdiction to enforce payment of money for temporary support and to recognize or commit the accused pending an inquest by the grand jury, as to his probable guilt of the criminal offense charged therein.

6. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION — 2(4) — JURY — 31(11) — INDICTMENT — NECESSITY.

Properly construed, said statute accords to the accused the benefit of the constitutional guaranties against trial without an indictment and otherwise than by a jury, in respect of the criminal offense it creates.

Prohibition by George E. Fisher against J. B. Sommerville, Judge, and others. Writ refused.

Martin Brown, of Moundsville, for petitioner.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., Henry Nolte, Asst. Atty. Gen., and James D. Parriott, of Moundsville, for respondents.

POFFENBARGER, J. Upon the assumption that the provisions of chapter 51 of the Acts of the Legislature of 1917, section 18c (1) to section 16c(8), c. 144, Barnes' Code 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, §§ 5179a-5179h), authorizing the juvenile, circuit, intermediate, and criminal courts to convict any husband who shall, without just cause, desert or willfully neglect or refuse to provide for the support and maintenance of his wife in des-stitute or necessitous circumstances, or any parent who shall, without lawful excuse, desert or willfully neglect or refuse to provide for the support and maintenance of his or her legitimate or illegitimate child or children under the age of 16 years, in like circumstances, of a misdemeanor punishable by a fine or imprisonment or both, and to substitute for such punishment, in its discretion, an order requiring payment of money for the support and maintenance of the neglected person, is unconstitutional because it fails to provide for inquiry and indictment by a grand jury, as a condition precedent to right of trial and punishment, the plaintiff seeks a writ of prohibition to inhibit and restrain the circuit court of Marshall county from proceeding against him under said statute.

The statute provides for the making of an order of arrest by the court or the judge thereof, founded upon a complaint to be filed by the wife, child, children, or any other person. Under this order, a warrant is issued, commanding the apprehension of the accused and his production in court or before the judge thereof in vacation, to answer the complaint and to be further dealt with according to law. As to any inquiry or indictment by a grand jury, the act is silent.

The proceeding against the plaintiff, instituted by his wife under this statute, has not progressed to final judgment. Being advised of the issuance of the warrant, he voluntarily appeared and resisted it, denying the validity of the statute and also his liability under it, in case of the overruling of his contention as to its validity, on the ground of desertion on the part of the complainant. His motion to quash the complaint and warrant having been overruled, he pleaded not guilty and caused to be entered upon the record a declaration of his willingness at all times to support his wife, the actual provision of such support, her rejection thereof through the influence of her parents, and his offer to take her back to his home. Thereafter, the court, on the hearing of testimony, required him to enter into a recognizance to appear on the first day of the next regular term of the court to answer an indictment in the event of the finding thereof by the grand jury. A few days later, the wife, after notice, filed a petition in the cause praying an order requiring him to pay her money for her support, under the provision of the statute empowering the court to "enter such temporary order as may seem just, providing for the support of the deserted wife or children, or both, pendente lite." A motion to quash the petition and a demurrer thereto having been overruled, the court, after considering the evidence previously taken on the return of the warrant, and the offer made by the husband, entered an order requiring him to pay the wife $30 per month during the pendency of the proceeding. It is to prevent the enforcement of this order that he seeks a writ of prohibition.

[1] The primary and ultimate purpose of the statute is coercion of provision for support of deserted wives and children by those upon whom the law places the burden of their support, when they, being able to provide it, refuse to do so. Jurisdiction for such purpose, as between husband and wife, has been held and exercised by the courts of equity for centuries. They alone, under the common-law and equity principles, were competent to enforce matrimonial obligations. The legal unity of husband and wife, and their inability to make contracts with one another that courts of law could take cognizance of or enforce, made the equity court the only forum in which their rights against one another could be asserted. The policy of the law committed the delicate relations of husband and wife, in so far as they were judicially cognizable, to the enlightened conscience and judgment of the chancellor, not the inflexible rules of law. But this method of procedure, like all others, had its defects which the Legislature has endeavored to remedy by the passage of the act in question. It gives a summary and cumulative remedy and a harsher one than that afforded by the equity courts and, to restrain and, if possible, suppress the evil of dereliction of marital and parental duty, as well as to provide a more efficacious means of enforcing performance of such duties, it has made willful neglect thereof criminal. In view of the necessity of vesting the jurisdiction of the criminal procedure in the law courts and the undesirability of distributing the two branches of the subject to the two recognized classes of courts of general jurisdiction, the Legislature has conferred upon the law courts, to a limited extent, a jurisdiction formerly exercised by the courts of equity. This is not unusual in legislation. There are a great many cumulative legal remedies, and the acts creating them are everywhere held to be valid and constitutional.

[2-4] The extension of the jurisdiction of the law courts to the enforcement of performance of the husband's duty to support and maintain his wife does not alter the character of the duty, nor enlarge the rights of the husband. In the equity courts, he was not entitled to have a jury determine whether he had neglected performance of the duty or what sum of money the wife was entitled to have for her maintenance. Having no such constitutional right under equity procedure, he could not have had it at all, for the duty was enforceable only in equity. Extension of the jurisdiction of the law courts to a case formerly cognizable only in equity, without provision for a jury trial, involves no more than the difference between a judge of a law court and a chancellor, and nothing in the Constitution either expressly or impliedly withholds power from the Legislature to make such an extension. As it involves no alteration of the substantive right constituting the subject-matter, whether it shall be done or not is a question of mere expediency or public policy falling clearly within the domain of legislative power. There are many exceptions to the constitutional rule inhibiting trial without a jury (Ex parte Jones et al., 71 W. Va. 537, 596, 77 S. E. 1029, 45 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1030, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 31), and this is one of them.

The exercise of this power by the law courts is not an incident of the procedure for enforcement of criminal liability authorized by the act, to be conducted at the same time and initiated by the same complaint. Nor is it an aid to such procedure. The two authorized proceedings start at the same time and on the same complaint, but they are clearly separable in character, progress, and operation. The complaint makes out a prima facie case for a temporary allowance or award of support, as the verified bill or answer or petition and affidavit did in equity. It continues until the final hearing, when a permanent allowance or award is made or refused agreeably to the determination of the controversy on its merits. In equity, that was effected by the decree on the merits. Here, it is to be effected by the trial of the indictment, if one is returned, and, in the event of a failure to indict, by the discharge of the accused. In either event, the temporary allowance ends. The criminal prosecution could go on without the award of money for support, and maintenance could be enforced without the criminal prosecution. An amalgamation of the two subjects is not a necessary incident of their contemporaneous cognizance in the same court. Since the Legislature could have authorized either of the proceedings without the other, it is obvious that it could authorize simultaneous prosecution thereof in the same court on the same complaint, without intention to merge one of them in the other. No terms indicative of intent to merge them are found anywhere in the statute.

[5, 6] After having provided for the arrest of the accused and production of his body in court to answer the complaint, the statute prescribes procedure for enforcement of the duty of support, with the consent of the accused before trial, or in the discretion of the court, on a plea of guilty or a conviction, in lieu of a judgment imposing a fine or imprisonment or both, or in addition to the penalty. Trial is mentioned, but the mode thereof is not prescribed. Without disregarding or contravening any of the words of the act, the complaint may be used as the basis of a commitment to await an indictment or a recognizance to appear and answer it, as well as the foundation of an order requiring payment of money for support.

Resort to the Constitution, the common law, and general statutes relating to criminal procedure for the method of trial for the criminal offense created by the act, does not imply or involve any addition to its terms. When the Legislature makes an act a criminal offense and prescribes the punishment, the general laws relating to procedure in criminal cases become applicable to it, without incorporation thereof into the creating act by words of reference or otherwise. To prescribe the procedure in a statute creating a new offense would be both unusual and unnecessary, unless the Legislature contemplated something different from the ordinary procedure. If, in this act, it had expressly required the trial to be had on the complaint, intention to dispense with an indictment would have been expressed, and the statute would not have been susceptible of the interpretation the trial court has given it. As it did not do so and is silent as to the mode of trial, the court properly construed it as it would have construed and applied any other statute creating an offense and prescribing the punishment. It correctly regarded the support proceeding and the criminal proceeding as separable and dealt with them separately.

Perceiving no constitutional infirmity in the statute nor any lack of jurisdiction in the circuit court, we decline to award the writ prayed for.

POCCARDI, Royal Consul of Italy, v. OTT,
State Compensation Com'r.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 14, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT §398—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION LAW — PARTICIPATION IN FUND—APPLICATION.

To entitle an applicant to participate in the Workmen's Compensation Fund he must have filed his application with the compensation commissioner within six months after the date of death or injury of the person on whose account the claim is made, as required by section 39 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Code Supp. 1918, § 695).

2. MASTER AND SERVANT §398—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—APPLICATION FOR RELIEF—DATE OF FILING.

Neither the date of the mailing or posting of such application nor the date when by due course it should have reached the compensation commissioner can be treated as the date of the filing of such application in order to bring it within the provision of the statute, although such delay may have been due to the existence of a state of war not between the United States and the country in which such application was posted, the statute not in terms suspending the operation of the statute of limitations in such cases.

Appeal from order of State Compensation Commissioner.

Proceeding by Gaetano Poccardi, Royal Consul, of Italy, etc., against Lee Ott, State Compensation Commissioner, to vacate an order, refusing to consider a claim of the alleged dependents of Pietro Garufi, deceased, or to allow compensation to them, and to require the commissioner to award them compensation. Order of commissioner affirmed, and petition denied.

Jos. W. Henderson, of Philadelphia, Pa., for appellant.

El. T. England, Atty. Gen., and Frank Lively, Asst. Atty. Gen., for appellee.

MILLER, P. Petitioner on behalf of the alleged dependents of Pietro Garufi, deceased, seeks by this proceeding to vacate the order of the State Compensation Commissioner, made on May 13, 1918, refusing to file or consider their claim and to allow compensation to said dependents, being the widow and daughter of said decedent, and to require said commissioner to receive, award and allow them compensation pursuant to the statute creating the Workmen's Compensation Fund.

[1] The sole ground for the commissioner's action as shown by his opinion and report was that the claim for such compensation was not made in due form or in any form within six months from and after the death of the decedent as required by section 39 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Code Supp. 1918, § 696), citing and relying upon the construction and application of said section in the recent case of Culurides v. Ott, Commissioner, 78 W. Va. 696, 90 S. E. 270.

In the case cited there had been a bona fide though defective application made for compensation within the limitation prescribed by the statute. We decided that by giving the statute the liberal construction required by the provisions thereof, the defective application supplemented as it was by other proceedings, constituted a valid application for such compensation, warranting payment. But, we said in that case, what the statute plainly prescribes, that where no attempt is made to prepare and file an application within the required six months, the claim cannot be allowed, holding the statute in this respect to be imperative.

The only answer made to this proposition and the order of the commissioner is: First, that as the formal application, mailed at Flumedinisi, Messina, November 6, 1917, was delayed in transmission on account of the existence of a state of war, not between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Italy, but between them and the Central Powers of Europe, did not reach and was not filed with the commissioner until December 13, 1917, the application should be considered made as of the date of posting or at least as of the date when according to the usual time required for transmission, about twelve days, the same should have been received and filed with the commissioner. Second, that to deprive the applicants of compensation under the facts assumed in the first proposition is opposed to all theories of constitutional and private international law suspending the operation of the statute of limitations during the existence of war delaying or preventing intercommunication between citizens of the belligerent powers.

On the first proposition it is sufficient to answer that the statute makes no exception in favor of delayed applications; it is imperative. To entitle the applicant to participate in the compensation fund, he must substantially comply with the statute. Luckie v. Merry, 9 N. C. C. A. 895, note 906, and cases cited. The English act of 1906, section 2, as shown in the Luckie Case, suspends the operation of the statute of limitations under certain circumstances such as mistake, absence and other causes. But our statute contains no such provision, and such provision cannot be interpolated under the most liberal rules of construction. Lewis' Sutherland Statutory Construction, section 367. The record shows that petitioner was promptly notified of the death of decedent a very few days after it occurred, and if anything could excuse the delay, it has not been sufficiently shown so as to justify any exception to the limitation of the statute.

[2] On the other proposition, involving the existence of a state of war, it is sufficient to answer that the rule or principle invoked is not applicable except as between citizens of opposing belligerent states, and when the courts of the one are closed to the citizens of the other. As the Kingdom of Italy and the Government of the United States of America were not at war between themselves, but were united against a common enemy, the rules of international law so appeared to have no application. Besides, no sufficient excuse is offered by any proof why the application could not have been made on time. Wood on Limitations, section 6; Buswell on Limitations, section 129.

For the foregoing reasons we must affirm the order of the commissioner and deny the petitioner the relief prayed for.

STATE v. COWGER. (C. C. No. 72)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 14, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BREACH OF THE PEACE §20—WARRANT—COMPLAINANT.

A peace warrant alleging no facts or circumstances from which the justice, or the court on appeal, can determine whether the fear of the complainant is well founded, should be quashed.

2. BREACH OF THE PEACE §21—REVIEW—MOOT QUESTION.

The validity of a warrant on which a defendant has been required to give bond to keep the peace for a period of six months, being certified to this court under the provisions of section 1, c. 135, Barnes' Code of West Virginia (Code Supp. 1913, § 4981), does not become a moot question because the period covered by the bond expires before the question can be decided by this court in view of the power under section 6, c. 153 (Code 1913, § 5497), to require appellant to give a new recognizance.

Certified questions from Circuit Court, Webster County.

Hyson H. Cowger was arrested on a peace warrant issued by a justice of the peace and required to give bond to keep the peace, and after giving the bond, he appealed to the circuit court, and moved to quash the warrant. Motion overruled and validity of warrant certified. Order overruling the motion to quash reversed and cause remanded.

J. M. Hoover and W. S. Wysong, both of Webster Springs, for the State.

W. T. Talbott, of Webster Springs, for defendant.

WILLIAMS, J. Defendant was arrested on a peace warrant issued by a justice of the peace and required to give bond to keep the peace for a period of six months from the 9th of July, 1918. He gave the bond, and appealed to the circuit court, and then moved to quash the warrant on the ground that it failed to show any facts or circumstances from which the justice could determine that defendant intended to commit an offense. The court overruled his motion, and certified the question of the validity of the warrant to this court for its determination.

The warrant sets forth the following complaint made before the justice:

"Whereas, S. S. Degarmo has this day made complaint and information on oath before me, H. F. Hines, a justice of said county, that there is good cause to fear that Hyson H. Cowger, within the county and state aforesaid, intends to commit an offense against the person and property of another, to wit, the person and property of S. S. Degarmo and against the person and property of Ina F. Degarmo."

Then follows the warrant, commanding that the defendant be arrested and brought before the justice to answer the complaint.

[1] This proceeding is had under chapter 153 of the Code of West Virginia, designed for the prevention of crime. Section 2 of that chapter (sec. 5493) reads as follows:

"If complaint be made to any justice, that there is good cause to fear that a person intends to commit an offense against the person or property of another, he shall examine on oath the complainant and any witnesses who may be produced, reduce the complaint to writing and cause it to be signed by the complainant."

Although the statute does not prescribe any form for such complaint, it should, nevertheless, state sufficient facts or circumstances to enable the justice to determine whether or not complainant had any reason to fear that some particular offense is about to be committed; it is not enough to say that he fears an "offense" will be committed. That is a mere conclusion. The facts and circumstances on which his apprehension is based should be stated in order that the justice may see whether or not the fear is justified, and whether or not the design of the defendant, if carried into execution, would constitute an offense in law. It is the common right of every one, against whom complaint is made, to be fully apprised of the matter with which he is charged, in order that he may prepare to combat the charges and make his defense. If he is not informed of the charges, how can he be prepared to meet them? That he should thus be fully informed is clearly indicated by the language of the statute. It requires the justice to examine the complainant and his witnesses on oath, reduce the complaint to writing and have it signed by the complainant. Section 3 (sec. 5494) then requires him, "if it appear proper," to issue his warrant, reciting therein the complaint, evidently for the purpose of informing the defendant of the matter with which he is charged.

"The warrant should show that some threat was made, or should state circumstances from which the court can determine whether or not the fear expressed is well founded." 5 Cyc. 1031. Bradstreet v. Ferguson, 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 638.

"A peace warrant in which is alleged no threat, fact, or circumstance from which the court can determine whether the fear of the prosecutor is well founded should be quashed." State v. Goram, 83 N. O. 664, citing State v. Cooley, 78 N. C. 538. See, also, State v. Coughlin, 19 Kan. 537.

[2] Having given a bond to keep the peace for a period of six months, and that time having expired on the 10th of January, 1919, the attorney for the state makes the point that the question presented to this court is now moot. We do not think so, for the reason that, on appeal from a justice, the court is authorized by section 6 of said chapter (sec. 5497), either to dismiss the complaint or affirm the judgment of the justice and make such order as it sees fit as to the costs; or the court may require the appellant to give a new recognizance, if it sees fit. The court has the power to require the appellant to enter into a new recognizance for an extended period. He is therefore vitally interested in having the question of the validity of the warrant passed on by this court.

The order, overruling defendant's motion to quash the warrant, will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

CLIFTON v. CLIFTON. (No. 71.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 14, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE §4, 289—OBLIGATION TO SUPPORT—ENFORCEMENT—EQUITY JURISDICTION.

There is an obligation upon a husband to support and maintain his wife, and unless by her conduct, or for some other reason, he is discharged therefrom, a court of equity has jurisdiction to enforce the performance of such duty, as well upon the ground of the wife's disability to maintain an action at law against him, because of the relationship, as upon the ground of inadequacy of any remedy which courts of law are competent to afford.

2. EQUITY §44—JURISDICTION — LEGISLATION.

Courts of equity are not deprived of the jurisdiction theretofore possessed and exercised by them by an act of the Legislature conferring jurisdiction upon courts of law to grant similar relief, unless such act evinces a plain intent to take away the jurisdiction of equity; otherwise such jurisdiction will thereafter be exercised concurrently by both courts of law and equity.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE §289—SUPPORT OF WIFE — ENFORCEMENT—EQUITY JURISDICTION—STATUTE.

Chapter 51 of the Acts of the Legislature of 1917 (Code Supp. 1918, §§ 5179a-5179h), in relation to the desertion and nonsupport of wife and children, and providing punishment therefor, does not deprive courts of equity of the jurisdiction theretofore possessed to entertain a suit by a wife to compel her husband, who refuses to do so, to make proper provision for her support and maintenance.

Certified Questions from Circuit Court, Webster County.

Bill by Elizabeth Clifton against John Z. Clifton seeking maintenance and support from defendant, her husband, independent of any relief by way of divorce. Demurrer to bill overruled; and ruling certified from the circuit court. Ruling of circuit court sustained.

W. T. Talbott, of Webster Springs, for plaintiff.

W. S. Wysong, of Webster Springs, for defendant.

RITZ, J. Plaintiff's bill alleges her marriage to the defendant some 14 or 15 years prior to the institution of the suit. It alleges his subsequent desertion and abandonment of her, that he otherwise maltreated her, and charges his failure and refusal to make provision for her proper maintenance and support. Facts are averred showing the defendant's ability to make such provision, and the court is asked to enter a decree requiring him to pay such reasonable amount as may be determined to be proper and sufficient for the support of the plaintiff. It will be observed that this is a pure bill by the plaintiff to secure her maintenance and support from her husband independent of any relief by way of divorce. A demurrer to the bill was overruled by the circuit court, and the propriety of that ruling certified to this court for its decision.

[1] It is insisted by the defendant that the court is without jurisdiction to entertain a bill by a wife against her husband seeking only maintenance and support, and not praying for divorce. The contention made is that the court only has jurisdiction to grant such relief as an incident to divorce. It is quite true that the statute conferring jurisdiction upon courts of equity to hear and determine divorce cases also confers jurisdiction to award alimony, both temporary and permanent, as incident thereto; but does this provision mark the limits of the jurisdiction of a court of equity in this regard? It cannot be doubted that there is a legal and binding obligation upon every husband to support his wife, unless she, by her conduct, relieves him thereof, and can it be said that where such an obligation exists there is no remedy for its enforcement, that the aggrieved party must depend entirely upon the will and pleasure of the one from whom the obligation is due? It is a familiar maxim of the law that there is no wrong without a remedy, and surely a wife who is denied support by her husband is wronged, and it is the duty of the properly constituted authorities to provide her a remedy for the redress of that wrong. It will not do to say that she may bring suit for divorce and get support and maintenance as an incident to any relief granted in such suit. She may not desire a divorce; in fact, the grounds may not be sufficient to justify the awarding of a divorce. It would be unjust and inequitable to force her to accept relief which she does not want in order to secure the relief which she does desire, and to which she is justly entitled. Because of the relation of husband and wife, this obligation cannot be enforced in a court of law. As we held in Bolyard v. Bolyard, 79 W. Va. 554, 91 S. E. 529, L. R. A. 1917D, 440, courts of law have no jurisdiction to entertain a suit by a wife against her husband. While she is laboring under the disability of coverture, a court of equity alone has the power to grant her relief. There is another reason why resort to equity is proper in such case, even though the disability because of relationship did not exist, and that is that any remedy which a court of law is competent to give would be entirely inadequate. The neglected wife might bring an action at law on the obligation which her husband owes to her, but because of the uncertainties of human life, the liability of the fortunes of the parties to change either for the better or for the worse, any judgment which such a court might render would likely not even approximate a just determination of the rights involved; while, on the other hand, a court of equity can grant relief exactly commensurate with the obligation imposed upon the husband, and to which the wife is entitled. This question, however, is not an open one in this state. It was before this court in the case of Lang v. Lang, 70 W. Va. 205, 73 S. E. 716, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 950, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1129. In that case the jurisdiction was sustained, and upon a review of the authorities there cited we are of opinion that the conclusion reached is a sound one.

[2, 3] The defendant insists, however, that chapter 51 of the Acts of 1917 (Code Supp. 1918, §§ 5179a-5179h), being an act relating to the desertion and nonsupport of wife and children, and providing punishment therefor, furnishes the deserted wife a means of complete and adequate redress, and that therefore a court of equity will not entertain a bill for that purpose. Even though that act does furnish a means by which a court of law can grant relief in such cases, does that deprive courts of equity of the jurisdiction which they theretofore possessed? It seems to be quite well settled that, where equity has jurisdiction of a subject-matter, the fact that the Legislature by a statute gives a remedy at law therefor does not deprive the equity courts of their jurisdiction, unless the statute so expressly declares. The jurisdiction thereafter will be exercised concurrently. Corrothers v. Board of Education, 16 W. Va. 527; 1 Story's Equity Jurisprudence, § 80; Hickman v. Painter, 11 W. Va. 386; Mitchell v. Chancellor, 14 W. Va. 22.

But is the remedy provided by chapter 51 of the Acts of 1917 adequate to afford relief? That statute makes it a criminal offense for a husband to desert and fail to provide for his destitute wife and children. The primary purpose of the act was to prevent such deserted and abandoned persons from becoming charges upon the public. It is the protection of the public that is sought by the act. This obligation of a husband to support and maintain his wife exists whether she is destitute or whether she is not, while the act referred to only gives the remedy in case of destitution. Then it only provides for convicting the husband of a criminal offense, putting him in jail, and working him on the road. There is no means provided in it for sequestering any of his estate, in case he has any, and applying it to the maintenance of the wife. This power is possessed by courts of equity. Should he fail or refuse to comply with the court's decree, and his ability to perform it is shown, not only may his person be seized and he be punished for disobedience of the order, but his property may likewise be seized and applied to satisfy the decree in favor of the deserted wife. So we say that the remedy provided by chapter 51 of the Acts of 1917 is primarily for the benefit of the state. It does not look so much to the protection of the deserted wife, and is entirely inadequate and insufficient to confer that complete and full relief which can be afforded by a court of equity.

We are of opinion that the demurrer to the bill was properly overruled, and answer the question certified accordingly.

STATE ex rel. TESTERMAN v. LAMBERT,
Mayor, et al. (No. 3782.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 14, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MANDAMUS ¶74(1) — APPOINTMENT OF ELECTION OFFICERS—MUNICIPAL COUNCIL.

Mandamus lies to compel a municipal council to appoint election officers recommended by the proper officer of a political party which, under the provisions of law, is entitled to representation on the election board, and where there is a disputed succession in the official personnel of such party, and there is no higher authority within the party to which such controversy can be submitted for determination, the court will, upon the application for the writ of mandamus, decide which of the two claimants is entitled to nominate such election officers.

2. ELECTIONS ¶51—APPOINTMENT OF COM-MISSIONERS — CHALLENGERS AND POLL CLERKS.

Under the General Election Law, upon the municipal council, in a municipal election, devolves the duty to appoint commissioners of election and challengers upon the recommendation of the chairman of the two leading political parties, but such council has no authority to appoint poll clerks.

Original mandamus by the State, on relation of C. C. Testerman, against S. T. Lambert, Mayor, and others. Peremptory writ of mandamus awarded.

B. Randolph Bias, of Williamson, for relator.

Goodykoontz & Scherr, of Williamson, for respondents.

RITZ, J. The relator applied for a writ of mandamus to compel the respondents composing the common council of the town of Matewan to appoint certain election officers as representatives of the party whose candidate for mayor he claims to be.

Prior to December, 1917, there were two parties in the town of Matewan, one known as the "Citizens Party" and the other as the "Independent League Party." It is admitted that a convention of the Citizens party was held early in December, 1917, and that at this convention candidates were nominated to be voted for at the election to be held in the January following, and it is contended by the relator that said convention also selected an executive committee to represent said party until the holding of the next convention of the party. The respondents, on the other hand, contend that no such action was taken, and that R. W. Buskirk, who it is conceded was the chairman of the party prior to this convention, held over. The committee, which relator contends was selected at this convention, subsequently met and elected a chairman and secretary, and relator contends took charge of the campaign for the election of the candidates nominated by the Citizens party. Buskirk also attempted to exercise the duties of chairman of the party during this campaign. The election resulted in the defeat of the candidates of the Citizens party. Subsequently Buskirk died, and by his death, according to the contention of the respondents, the Citizens party was left without officers, while the relator claims that this only made a vacancy on the committee of that party, Buskirk being one of the committee named at the convention in December, 1917. Subsequently another member of the committee died, making two vacancies thereon. The chairman thereupon called a meeting for the purpose of filling these vacancies, which meeting was held and the vacancies filled, and the committee then called a convention to nominate candidates of the Citizens party for the election to be held in January, 1919. The respondent Lambert and some others, claiming that the Citizens party had no organization after the death of Buskirk, called a mass meeting of that party for the purpose of selecting a chairman to succeed Buskirk, which meeting was held and such a chairman chosen. The man so chosen chairman then called a convention of the Citizens party to nominate candidates to be voted for at the election to be held in January, 1919. It will thus be seen that two conventions of this party were called for the same purpose. The convention first above referred to met and nominated the relator as its candidate for mayor, and also nominated a candidate for the office of recorder, and candidates for councilmen. It also selected an executive committee, and this committee subsequently met and elected a chairman and secretary. The chairman thus selected certified to the town council the names of certain parties whom he desired appointed as commissioner, clerk, and challenger to represent his party in the January, 1919, election. The convention of the Citizens party called by the chairman selected by the respondent Lambert and his associates also met and nominated candidates to be voted for in the municipal election, and the chairman selected by this convention also certified to the common council the names of certain parties to be appointed as election officers to represent the Citizens party in the election. Immediately upon the adjournment of this latter convention, a convention of the Independent League party was held in the same hall, and the same candidates nominated that had been selected by the last-named convention of the Citizens party. At a meeting of the council held to appoint election officers, that body declined to recognize the relator's party as the Citizens party, and appointed the election officers certified by the chairman selected at the convention at which the relator, Lambert, was nominated.

It may be observed that it appears without contradiction that Buskirk, who was undisputed chairman of the Citizens party until the convention of that party held in December, 1917, had at that time transferred his allegiance to the Independent League party. It is shown without contradiction that before the holding of the convention of the Citizens party in December, 1917, Buskirk certified to the council the names of parties to be appointed as election officers to represent the Citizens party, all of whom were in sympathy with and supporters of the opposing party. The respondents contend that members of the Citizens party called the mass meeting to select a successor to Buskirk, its deceased chairman. The record discloses the names of only two of the parties who called this meeting, one of them the respondent Lambert, who was elected by an opposition council to fill a vacancy in the office of mayor, and who is the candidate of that opposition party for that office in the coming election, and the other, who is openly co-operating in removing any opposition to the Independent League candidates. Can these men be classed as belonging to the Citizens party? The executive officers of any political party must be members of it, and it may be said that only those voters who believe in its principles and support its candidates are members of a particular political party. The fact that a voter at one time affiliated with a certain party does not prove that he is a member of it when, at the particular time at which his party affiliations are brought in question, he is devoting his energies to an effort to compass the defeat of the candidates of the party to which he professes to belong. The real spirit of our election law seeks to have elections conducted by officers representing the parties opposed to each other. It was never intended that one party in a community, where its members are more than double that of the opposition, can divide itself into two parties, each nominate the same candidates, and, because it polls more votes in each of its branches than the opposition, exclude such opposition entirely from official participation in the election.

[1] It is contended here that, inasmuch as the common council has decided this question, this court will not take cognizance of it, and the cases of Smith v. County Court, 78 W. Va. 163 and 259, 88 S. E. 662, 793, Bogges v. Buxton, 67 W. Va. 679, 69 S. E. 367, 21 Ann. Cas. 289, Republican Executive Committee v. County Court, 68 W. Va. 113, 69 S. E. 522, and Kump v. McDonald, 64 W. Va. 323, 61 S. E. 909, are relied upon. Those cases hold that when a dispute arises in a political party which has a tribunal of its own to which appeal can be made, this must be done, and the decision of such tribunal is final. In this case the only decision made as to who is entitled to represent the Citizens party was by the common council, admittedly composed of members of the Independent League party, whose political interest is in the destruction of its adversary. It does not appear that there exists in the Citizens party any superior authority to whom this question of disputed succession can be submitted, and for that reason the authorities referred to are inapplicable.

But it is insisted that, even though the persons recognized by the respondents as the officers of the Citizens party do not properly represent that party, this would not give the relator the relief he asks, unless he shows that the persons he contends are the officers of that party are such in fact; and this is true. The relator must show his right. The fact that the persons recognized by respondents may be getting something to which they are not entitled can make no difference to the relator, unless he is prejudiced thereby. Unless the committee claiming to have been selected by the Citizens party at the December, 1917, convention was in fact so selected, then it had no more authority to act for that party than had the committee recognized by respondents. As to what happened at the December, 1917, convention, there is some conflict. Those best in a position to know say this committee was selected as an executive committee for the party, while a number of others say it was simply a nominating committee. The officers of that convention it is shown made a minute of what transpired a very few days thereafter, and this original paper is introduced. It bears the earmarks of genuineness upon its face, and its authenticity is vouched for by the secretary of the convention who made it. It shows that the party at that time did select an executive committee as contended by the relator, and we think, supported as it is, it is evidence of such a character as to conclude this question, especially when considered with the fact, well known at the time to the Citizens party, that Buskirk, who claimed to be chairman of it, was acting with the opposition.

[2] The respondents, at the request of the chairman recognized by them, undertook to appoint a commissioner of election, a poll clerk, and a challenger to represent the Citizens party, and the writ is asked to compel them to appoint the nominees of relator's committee to these offices. The council under the provision of section 85 of chapter 3 of the Code (Code 1913, § 107) is required, in case of a municipal election, to perform the duties devolving upon the county court in a general election, and unquestionably the appointment of commissioners of election is such duty. But how about the appointment of poll clerks and challengers? Section 8 of chapter 3 (sec. 24) provides for the appointment of poll clerks by the election commissioners. It is true section 26a4 of chapter 3, Barnes' Code 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, § 50d), provides for the appointment of both commissioners of election and poll clerks by the county court in a primary election, but this does not purport to change the law then in existence, providing for the appointment of such officers in other elections. We are therefore of the opinion that the action of the council in appointing poll clerks was without authority and is void. Provision was made for the appointment of challengers by act of the Legislature now contained in section 48 of chapter 3 of the Code (Code 1913, § 70). Under this section such challengers were appointed by the chairmen of the respective parties. In 1905 the Legislature revised the election law, and in a provision now contained in section 93 of chapter 3 (sec. 115) provided for the appointment of such challengers by the county court, upon the nomination of the chairmen of the two leading political parties. This act did not expressly amend section 48, but it was a general revision of the election law, and provided for the repeal of all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with it. It is therefore clear that so much of section 48 as provides for the appointment of challengers is superseded by the provisions of section 93 in regard thereto.

The writ is therefore awarded, requiring respondents to appoint the persons named in relator's petition to the offices of commissioner and challenger, to represent the Citizens party in the municipal election to be held in January, 1919.

NORTON et al. v. R. C. NEELY CO. (No. 887.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

STATEMENT OF CASE.

Easter Norton died testate in December, 1912, having appointed Jenette Norton executrix, who qualified as such. In 1909 the testatrix became indebted to R. C. Neely Company for the purchase of two mules, giving her note therefor in the sum of $470, only $69 of which was paid. In 1912 she also obtained from R. C. Neely Company advances and supplies for certain of her croppers and tenants to the amount of $246.95, which was not paid. At the time of obtaining the credits she was solvent, having a certain interest in lands in Burke county. In July, 1911, she purchased a half interest in 45 acres of land in Screven county for $1,528, which she conveyed by deed, on October 11, 1912, to Jenette Norton and Lila Norton Bryan for a named consideration of $50. During the fall of 1912, in the lifetime of Easter Norton, her tenants delivered at her yard in Waynesboro 15 bales of cotton valued at $900. This cotton was sold by Jenette Norton a few days before Easter Norton's death, for a sum in excess of $900. After the death of Easter Norton the R. C. Neely Company filed a claim for the sum of $851.95 principal, and $228.08 interest, with Jenette Norton as executrix, who refused payment, and suit was brought and judgment obtained in the city court of Waynesboro for the amount sued for. The execution issued upon the judgment was levied on the lot of land in Waynesboro, and a claim thereto was filed by Jenette Norton and Lila Norton Bryan. It was alleged that there were no other assets of the estate of Easter Norton to be found. The present suit was brought for the purpose of canceling the deeds to the defendants as void, and as made, with the knowledge of both parties thereto, to delay, hinder, and defraud the creditors of Easter Norton, especially R. C. Neely Company; also to consolidate this case and the claim case, and to obtain a judgment against Jenette Norton individually and against Lila Norton Bryan for the full amount of the proceeds of the 15 bales of cotton alleged to have been received by them or either of them; also that the interest of Easter Norton in the Screven county land be declared subject to the lien of plaintiff's judgment and a sufficiency thereof be sold to satisfy the fi. fa. The defendants demurred to the petition, on various grounds. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendants excepted pendente lite. The sixth ground of the de-murrer raised the issue that Lila Norton Bryan did not, according to the petition, take charge of or dispose of any of the cotton, and that so much of the petition as asked for a personal judgment against her should be stricken. The case proceeded to trial, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. A motion for new trial was overruled, and the defendants excepted.

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS \Leftrightarrow 443(1) — PETITION.

Relatively to all the property, the petition set forth a cause of action against Jenette Norton individually and as executrix. It also set forth a cause of action against Lila Norton Bryan individually, except as to the cotton. The sixth ground of the demurrer should have been sustained as to her; and whatever further was done in the case with reference to her, so far as the cotton was concerned, was nugatory.

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES \Leftrightarrow 286(1) — CONSOLIDATION OF CLAIM SUIT — OMISSION OF FI. FA.

The first special ground of the motion for a new trial complains of admission in evidence of the fi. fa., over objection that it did not follow the judgment upon which it was based. Upon comparison it appears that the fi. fa. did not follow the judgment in the respect as contended in the motion; but, the case being one to set aside fraudulent sales and to subject the property to the payment of the plaintiff's debt, so far as the judgment was valid, it was unimportant, for the purposes of this case, for the execution to follow the judgment technically, and the admission of the evidence furnishes no cause for a new trial.

8. WITNESSES \Leftrightarrow 140(2) — COMPETENCY — INTERESTS.

The second, third, and fourth grounds relate to the admission of evidence over the objection that the witnesses, on account of interest, were prohibited by the statute from testifying in the suit against the executrix. If the sales which it was sought to set aside were void on the ground of having been made to hinder, delay, and defeat creditors, they were void only as to the Neely Company, and neither of the witnesses could gain anything by the sales being set aside only in so far as to enable the Neely Company to subject the property to the payment of its debt. Under these circumstances the witnesses were not incompetent to testify, under Civil Code 1910, § 5858, para. 2, 4.

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES \Leftrightarrow 309(2) — INSTRUCTION — LIABILITY.

The fifth and sixth grounds assign error upon the following charges of the court: "Is the plaintiff, R. C. Neely Company, entitled to recover any amount against the defendants for the proceeds of the cotton alleged to have been sold by the defendants or their agents just prior to the death of Easter Norton in January, 1913? If so, how much against either or both? Then you write under it, 'Yes,' and the amount that you find the cotton to be worth, and the amount that you find from the evidence either or both of them liable in having misappropriated under this fraudulent scheme, if you believe such to have existed." And "as far as the cotton is concerned they [referring to movants] sold the cotton and the proceeds of it never went to them, they contend, but went in extinguishment of the debts of their mother; anyhow it was turned over to her." The charge thus excepted to was erroneous in so far as it affected Lila Norton Bryan, against whom the petition had not set out a cause of action relatively to the cotton. What is here said also disposes of the ninth ground relative to Lila Norton Bryan on account of the conversion of the cotton, on complaint that said charge was without evidence to support it.

5. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES \Leftarrow 309(12)—CHARGE.

The seventh ground complains of the charge by the court: "However, if the consideration of this property was altogether inadequate, if they took it in good faith with no suspicion even of the purpose of their mother to defraud, if there was no such purpose, then they would be protected, and your verdict should be for the defendants." This charge was an attempt to apply the principle of Civil Code 1910, § 3224 (2), but it did not employ the language of the statute. It was charging too strongly against the defendants to use the expression "no suspicion even," as employed by the judge in the charge excepted to.

6. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES \Leftarrow 310—CONVERSION OF COTTON BY DEFENDANT—INDIVIDUAL LIABILITY.

The eighth ground complains of the form of the verdict in so far as it related to the cotton, on the ground that it was too indefinite. One object of the suit, and one object of the question propounded to the jury, was to ascertain the amount in money for which Jenette Norton would be individually liable on account of the conversion of the cotton, and for the jury to find that the plaintiff was "entitled to recover the value of ten bales of cotton against both defendants equally" was not to find the value of the cotton in money. Such a verdict was too indefinite to authorize a decree for any specific money value of the cotton, irrespective of what the uncontradicted evidence might have shown. If the evidence demanded a verdict on this question, the verdict should have expressed it, and not left to the court in formulating the decree to go back and review the evidence in order to see what it was.

7. ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

The tenth ground is too indefinite to present any question for consideration.

Error from Superior Court, Burke County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Suit by the R. O. Neely Company against Jenette Norton, executrix of Easter Norton, deceased, and another, to cancel a debtor's deed to defendants as void and as made to defraud creditors, and to consolidate such suit with a claim case arising on execution on a judgment against Jenette Norton, executrix. Demurrer overruled and verdict for plaintiff, motion for new trial denied, and defendants except and bring error. Reversed.

DEEDS \Leftarrow 140—QUIETING TITLE \Leftarrow 10(1)—EXCEPTIONS—EFFECT.

A plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, not on the weakness of the title of his adversary. Powell on Actions for Land, § 130, and citations. Where a deed excepts from its provisions certain land as conveyed in a specified deed recited to have been formerly executed by the grantor to another person, such grantee does not thereby acquire the land so excepted; and in a suit by such grantee against such other person, to cancel the former deed and have the title to the land conveyed thereby decreed to be in the plaintiff, where the petition with the exhibits made a part thereof showed upon its face the existence of facts as indicated above, the case was properly dismissed upon general demurrer. (a) It would not affect the case even if the former deed had not been delivered, or if the witnesses thereto were incompetent, or if it was not upon a valuable consideration, or if the plaintiff exercised adverse possession for 15 or 16 years, or if the grantee in the senior deed (a corporation) did not have charter power to own land.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1919.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)FINES — PROCEEDS — DISTRIBUTION — STATUTE.

The city court of Valdosta was created by an act of the Legislature in 1901. Acts 1901, pp. 176-188. Section 44 of the act provides as follows: "Be it further enacted, that on the second Monday of each quarter, or any day previous to said second Monday he may see proper to do so, the judge of said court shall distribute the money received from the proceeds of the labor of convicts convicted in said court, and the fines and forfeitures arising from cases tried in said court. Said money shall be distributed as follows: All bills for insolvent cost due the solicitor of said court, the sheriff, the county and the clerk, shall be approved by the judge of said court and entered on the minutes thereof, and shall be a lien upon all the fines and forfeitures raised in said city court and money derived from convicts as aforesaid, superior to all other claims for insolvent cost; and when the judge distributes such fines and forfeitures he shall pay the same to the solicitor of said court, the sheriff, the county, and the clerk pro rata on their bills for insolvent costs, for fees in cases in said city court, and when said bill of insolvent costs of the solicitor of said court, sheriff, the county and clerk are fully paid, the judge shall order the surplus paid to the person who by law acts as the treasurer of Lowndes county, which surplus shall be by him placed to the credit of the fine and forfeiture fund of said county and distributed as now provided by law." In 1917 the Legislature amended the act of 1901, by abolishing fees for criminal business in the city court and providing salaries instead. Acts 1917, p. 275. Section 5 provided that the act should not go into effect until January 1, 1918. Section 8 of the act of 1917 is as follows: "Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all cost, fines and forfeitures arising through cases in the criminal side of the city court of Valdosta shall be collected by the clerk of said court and shall be paid into the treasury of Lowndes county and to the treasurer of said county, save and except such costs, fines and forfeitures or parts thereof which are legally due and payable to other officers; and any and all fees, emoluments, perquisites of office and insolvent cost which under any laws heretofore or now existing, or which may hereafter be enacted, shall become due and payable to said officers or shall appertain to said offices, shall become the property of said county of Lowndes and the said county of Lowndes shall be subrogated to, and shall stand in the place and stead of said officers as regards any and all such fees, emoluments or perquisites of office derived from the criminal business of the said court: Provided, that nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the fees now allowed by law to solicitor of said court for services in the Supreme Court and Court of Appeals and said last-named fees shall be the property of the solicitor as heretofore." At the time the last-named act went into effect the plaintiffs in this case, Johnson, as solicitor, and Gornto, as sheriff, held insolvent cost bills for costs, which were approved by the judge of the city court. After January 1, 1918, the defendant Lastinger, as clerk of the court, collected certain fines which he declared his purpose of turning into the treasury of Lowndes county on authority of the act of 1917, supra, instead of to the plaintiffs and those entitled thereto as formerly. The plaintiffs brought a petition praying for a rule against the clerk, treasurer, and the county of Lowndes, with a prayer to require the clerk to pay over to the plaintiffs the amounts of their respective insolvent cost bills which had been approved by the judge of the city court. The defendants filed demurrers to the petition, which upon consideration the court sustained, and dismissed the case. The plaintiffs excepted. Held, irrespective of the constitutional question raised in this proceeding, the treasurer of the county is entitled to receive and disburse the money arising from fines and forfeitures, and the remedy, if any, of the former officers of the court is against the treasurer after he has received the fund. Acts 1901, p. 176; Acts 1917, p. 275; Gamble v. Clark, 92 Ga. 695, 19 S. E. 54; Bartlett v. Brunson, 115 Ga. 459, 41 S. E. 601; Ball v. Wright, 115 Ga. 729, 42 S. E. 32.

Error from City Court of Valdosta; J. G. Cranford, Judge.

Suit by J. M. Johnson and others against B. G. Lastinger, Clerk of the County of Lowndes, and others. Demurrer to petition sustained, and cause dismissed, and plaintiffs except and bring error. Affirmed.

BROSSEAU v. JACOBS' PHARMACY CO.
et al. (No. 781.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EVIDENCE \S 413, 443(1) — PAROL EVIDENCE VARYING WRITTEN CONTRACT—MOTIVE—DEED.

The court erred in admitting parol evidence to show a verbal collateral agreement which added to and varied a written contract which was unambiguous and complete, and in admitting evidence to show motive for the execution of the contracts; and the judgment refusing a new trial must be reversed in so far as it applies to the cancellation of the contract for the purchase of stock in the corporation.

2. EMPLOYMENT CONTRACT—FAILURE.

The evidence authorized the finding that the contract of employment had failed; and the court did not err in rendering the judgment of cancellation in regard to that contract.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County;
Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Suit by the Jacobs' Pharmacy Company and others against D. I. Brosseau. From the judgment, defendant brings error. Reversed in part and affirmed in part.

Little, Powell, Smith & Goldstein, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

John L. Hopkins and Chas. F. & L. C. Hopkins, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

GILBERT, J. [1] When this case was last before us the facts, as they then appeared, were fully reported. Brosseau v. Jacobs' Pharmacy Co., 147 Ga. 185, 98 S. E. 293. Because of the admission of parol testimony varying the terms of the written contracts, the judgment refusing a new trial was set aside. The contracts sought to be canceled were then held to be separate contracts, and not dependent one upon the other. It was held that they were unambiguous and complete, and that the evidence on the admission of which error was assigned did vary the written contracts. Before the return of the remittitur the plaintiffs amended their petition by alleging, among other things, that the two written instruments were obtained by fraud on the part of Brosseau; that they were parts of one contract; that neither was in itself a complete contract; and that the contract for the sale of stock in the Jacobs' Pharmacy Company was dependent upon the faithful performance of the contract for personal services to that company. Over objection, parol testimony was admitted for the purpose of proving these allegations, and also to show the motive which moved Dr. Jacobs to execute the contracts. A judgment annulling both contracts was rendered by the court, to whom the cause was submitted without the intervention of a jury. The amendment offers no reason or basis for the admission of the testimony which did not already exist. The allegations of fraud and the evidence offered in support thereof are insufficient to afford cancellation. The contracts speak for themselves; and mere allegations that either of them was ambiguous or incomplete cannot change the facts which have already been adjudicated. The former decision is the law of the case; and, in view of what was then said by Presiding Justice Evans, it is unnecessary to enter into another discussion of the principles of law involved.

[2] 2. The evidence on this, as on the former trial, authorized the finding that the contract of employment between Brosseau and the Jacobs' Pharmacy Company had failed; and the judgment cancelling that contract will not be set aside.

Other matters pleaded in the amendment are not herein stated. There was no judgment concerning them by the trial court. The judgment rendered was for the cancellation of both contracts. It is ordered that the judgment be reversed in so far as it undertakes to cancel the contract between Brosseau and Dr. Joseph Jacobs for the purchase of certain shares of stock in the Jacobs' Pharmacy Company, and affirmed in so far as it cancels the contract of employment between Brosseau and Jacobs' Pharmacy Company.

Judgment reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

All the Justices concur.

VADA NAVAL STORES CO. v. SAPP.
(No. 987.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1919.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. LANDLORD AND TENANT \S 285(3)—ACTION AGAINST PURCHASER FROM TENANT—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

The petition as amended set forth a cause of action, and there was no error in overruling the general and special demurrers.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT \S 64—PURCHASERS FROM TENANT—RIGHTS.

The vendee of a tenant, who has an apparent legal title and from whom the purchase was made, with or without notice of the tenancy, cannot dispute the title of the landlord, in an action of complaint for land, until he has restored the possession to the latter.

3. COMPLAINT FOR LAND—EVIDENCE—VERDICT.

Without regard to the special assignments of error upon the admissibility of testimony and upon certain instructions given by the court to the jury, the verdict for the plaintiff was demanded, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for new trial.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT §64—RELATION—SUCCEEDING POSSESSORS.

As a general rule, when the relation of landlord and tenant is once established, it attaches to all who may succeed to the possession through or under the tenant, either immediately or remotely, and the fact that the tenant's assignment is in the form of a fee-simple conveyance is immaterial.

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT §66(1)—PURCHASE FROM TENANT—PRESCRIPTION.

A purchaser from a tenant having apparent legal title, without knowledge of the tenancy, may assert his adverse possession as a basis of prescriptive title.

6. LANDLORD AND TENANT §280—EJECTMENT BY LANDLORD—RIGHT OF POSSESSION.

An action of ejectment by the landlord against the tenant, where the landlord relies for recovery upon the privity existing between the parties, involves only the right to possession.

7. JUDGMENT §739—CONCLUSIVENESS—ACTS BY DEFENDANT.

In ejectment, a judgment for the landlord against a tenant, where landlord relies for recovery upon privity existing between the parties, involving only right of possession, is not conclusive in a subsequent action by tenant, as he cannot be concluded by a judgment as to matters which he could not litigate in an action in which judgment was rendered.

8. EQUITY §60—MAXIMS—PRIORITY OF RIGHT.

As between a purchaser from a tenant, who has an apparent title and from whom the purchase was made without notice of the tenancy, the equities between the purchaser and the lessor are equal, and in such case the landlord, having the prior equity, should prevail.

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; W. C. Worrill, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. H. T. Sapp against the Vada Naval Stores Company. Verdict for plaintiff, motion for new trial overruled, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is a condensed statement of the facts necessary to an understanding of the rulings made in this case:

In July, 1904, H. H. Sapp purchased from the Troxwell heirs the west half of lot of land No. 382, containing 125 acres, more or less, in the Sixteenth district of Decatur county. The deed was not recorded. Shortly after his purchase Sapp conveyed the land, for a valuable consideration, to Mrs. H. H. Sapp, his wife. Thereafter she leased the land to him, to be used as a location, as long as needed, for the purpose of manufacturing turpentine. The lease did not specify any particular part of the land, nor restrict the lessee to the use of any particular number of acres. In November, 1904, H. H. Sapp sold a half interest in the turpentine location to J. L. Peebles, executing to him a lease, which was recorded on November 9, 1904, containing the following recital:

"The land on which said still is located belongs to Mrs. H. H. Sapp. The said H. H. Sapp hereby conveys to said Peebles a lease which he holds to said land, to be used as a location as long as it is needed for the purpose of manufacturing turpentine."

Thereafter Sapp sold his remaining half interest in the turpentine location to M. A. Bethune; and the lease from Sapp to Bethune, also recorded on November 9, 1904, contained in substance the same recital. Peebles and Bethune were, at the time, members of the copartnership of J. L. Peebles & Co., or shortly thereafter formed said copartnership, of which D. A. Autry also was a member. In 1905 Emma H. Wright and Columbia H. Lewis, two of the Troxwell heirs, conveyed said west half of lot of land to J. E. Harrell by deed recorded on August 10, 1905. Harrell conveyed the land to J. L. Peebles & Co. on September 6, 1905, by deed recorded on the following day. At or about the time of this last purchase Peebles & Co. notified Mrs. Sapp, by letter, that they no longer held under her, but that they were the owners of the true title to the half lot of land upon which the still site was located. Neither Mr. nor Mrs. Sapp, according to their contentions, received this notice. Peebles & Co. did not surrender or offer to surrender the possession of the still or any part of the land to Mrs. Sapp. On October 25, 1906, Bethune conveyed to his copartners his interest in the copartnership and turpentine site, and on January 18, 1910, by deed recorded on March 12, 1910, the copartnership conveyed the property to D. A. Autry & Son.

On February 14, 1911, Mrs. Sapp filed suit against Autry & Son, alleging that she was the owner in fee simple of said west half of said lot of land and had a perfect paper title thereto; that the defendants were in possession of the timber on said land and were turpentineing it under some pretended claim of right, to her injury and damage; and she prayed for injunction against the defendants, for damages in a sum stated, and for process. By amendment she alleged, in substance, that Autry & Son were her tenants; that they procured possession of the premises in the manner hereinbefore detailed, and, after the purchase from Harrell, attempted to set up an adverse claim of title, in disregard of plaintiff's title; that the turpentine site was located on said half lot of land; that the defendants had the right to use the same, so long as needed, for the purpose of manufacturing turpentine, but that the boxing of the timber on the land was a trespass; and that, inasmuch as defendants occupied the relation of tenants to the plaintiff, the trespass was willful. She therefore prayed for damages in an increased amount. The defendants filed an answer in which they denied the trespass, and set up title in themselves to the half lot of land. On May 13, 1913, the plaintiff recovered a verdict against Autry & Son in the sum of $65. In 1911, after the filing of the suit aforesaid and before its termination, Autry & Son sold the half lot in dispute to the Vada Naval Stores Company, a copartnership, and delivered the possession to them. The purchase was negotiated by one Ball, a member of said copartnership.

Mrs. Sapp filed suit to the May term, 1914, of the superior court, against the Vada Naval Stores Company, for the recovery of the land with mesne profits. In addition to the foregoing, she alleged that Ball had actual notice and knowledge of the suit against Autry & Son at the time of the purchase, and that whatever claim of title "defendants had to said land is void as against plaintiff." Before the trial she amended by praying that "she recover possession of the property described in the petition, and that judgment be rendered directing the defendants to restore said property to the possession of the plaintiff," and that she recover rents only from the filing of the petition. The defendants demurred generally and specially. The verdict was for the plaintiff for the premises and $100 rents. The defendants filed a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and they excepted to that ruling, and to the overruling of the demurrer.

M. E. O'Neal and Hartsfield & Conger, all of Bainbridge, for plaintiff in error.

T. S. Hawes, of Bainbridge, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3] The petition set forth a cause of action, and the court did not err in overruling the general demurrer. In so far as any of the grounds of special demurrer were meritorious they were fully met by timely amendment. In our opinion the verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the court below for the premises in dispute was demanded by the evidence. The special assignments of error, complaining of rulings of the court upon the admissibility of evidence and of instructions by the court to the jury, do not relate to the question of mesne profits, or, if they do relate to that issue, no reason appears from any of them why the verdict for mesne profits should be disturbed.

The relation of landlord and tenant existed between Mrs. Sapp and her husband, H. H. Sapp, as well as those holding the possession of the premises under him. In the assignment of his lease to Peebles & Co., or to Peebles and Bethune, it was recited that Mrs. Sapp was the owner of the half lot of land in controversy, but that the assignees of Sapp should have the right to use the land so long as needed for the purpose of manufacturing turpentine. The elder Autry was a member of the firm of Peebles & Co., and his possession of the premises was acquired with full knowledge of the tenancy of Sapp and of Peebles & Co. The relation of landlord and tenant, therefore, existed between Mrs. Sapp and Autry & Son. Autry & Son sold the land in controversy to the Vada Naval Stores Company. The evidence in the record does not require a finding that the Vada Naval Stores Company knew of the tenancy of Autry & Son at the time of the purchase from the latter. In the view we take of the case, it is immaterial whether the Vada Naval Stores Company knew of the relation between Mrs. Sapp and Autry & Son before or at the time of the purchase. The tenant is estopped, as against the landlord, to deny the lessor's title. As otherwise stated, the tenant cannot dispute the title of his landlord. The tenant can neither dispute the title of his landlord nor attorn to another while in possession acquired by his contract or lease; and if after the expiration of his term he desires to contest the title of his landlord, he must first surrender the possession acquired from him. Civil Code, § 3698; Williams v. Garrison, 29 Ga. 503; Grizzard v. Roberts, 110 Ga. 41, 35 S. E. 291 (2). This rule of the common law, as well as of our Code, will not be controverted.

[4] It is, however, insisted that the rule has no application here, since the Vada Naval Stores Company had no knowledge of the tenancy of Autry & Son at the time of the purchase. As a general rule, when the relation of landlord and tenant is once established, it attaches to all who may succeed to the possession through or under the tenant either immediately or remotely. Were this not so, the general principle above discussed would be of little benefit to the landlord. The fact that the assignment by the tenant is in the form of a fee-simple conveyance is immaterial. The fact that the tenant exhibited to the purchaser an independent title is, in our view of the matter, likewise immaterial. We are aware that the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in the case of Thompson v. Clark, 7 Pa. 62, has reached a contrary conclusion, but, as we think, erroneously. In that case it was held:

"The vendee of a tenant, who has an apparent legal title, and from whom the purchase was made, without notice of the tenancy, is not bound to deliver up possession to the landlord, but may defend in ejectment."

In 2 Herman on Estoppel, § 861, it is said that the same estoppel which prevents a tenant from disputing his landlord's title likewise extends to all persons who enter upon premises under a contract of lease, and to all persons who by purchase, fraud, or otherwise, obtain possession from such tenant. It is there, however, added:

"But if one, not knowing that the tenant holds a lease, purchases the estate by an absolute deed from the tenant, who has an apparent legal title other than his lease, such purchaser may contest the title of the lessor."

The text is based upon Thompson v. Clark, supra, and upon intimations contained in Cooper v. Smith, 8 Watts (Pa.) 536, and Jackson v. Davis, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 123, 15 Am. Dec. 451. In White v. Barlow, 72 Ga. 887, the second headnote is as follows:

"A tenant cannot dispute his landlord's title, and the title of the landlord is good against such tenant, or one holding under him with notice."

In the course of the opinion by Chief Justice Jackson it was observed that the proof in that case positively showed notice in the assignee or purchaser from the tenant. The apparent intimation contained in the decision must therefore be taken in connection with the facts of the case.

[6] It is, of course, true that a purchaser from such tenant, without knowledge of the tenancy, may assert his adverse possession as a basis of prescriptive title. This principle is recognized in McDougald v. Reedy, 71 Ga. 750. These two distinct principles must not, however, be confused. A clear statement of what we believe to be the sound rule upon the question presented in this case is found in Lane's Lessee v. Osment, 17 Tenn. (9 Yerg.) 86:

Neither the tenant himself, nor a purchaser of the land under him, whether with or without notice of the landlord's right, can dispute the title of the landlord within the period necessary to form the bar of the statute of limitations.

In Jackson v. Harsen, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 323, 17 Am. Dec. 517, it was held:

A "purchaser from the tenant, entering under an absolute conveyance in fee, is deemed to enter as the lessor's tenant, though he may not have known that his grantor derived possession from the lessor."

So, also, in Reed v. Shepley, 6 Vt. 602, it was ruled:

"One holding land under another cannot set up an adverse claim until he has first surrendered up the possession; and all who claim under him are tenants subject to the same rule, whether they knew of that relationship or not."

See, also, Jackson v. Scissam, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 499; Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Grat. (Va.) 220, 58 Am. Dec. 217; Jackson v. Davis, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 123, 15 Am. Dec. 451; Phillips v. Rothwell, 7 Ky. (4 Bibb) 33.

Prior to the Code of 1863 a judgment in ejectment was not conclusive as to the title between the parties thereto. Parker v. Stambaugh, 71 Ga. 735. By section 3275 of the Code of 1863 (Code of 1910, § 5583) it is declared that—

"A judgment in ejectment shall be conclusive as to the title between the parties thereto, unless the jury find for the plaintiff less than the fee."

[6] The action of ejectment by the landlord against the tenant, where the landlord relies for recovery upon the privity existing between the parties, involves only the right of possession. Cases may be found to the contrary. Jochen v. Tibbells, 50 Mich. 33, 14 N. W. 690; Shaw v. Hill, 79 Mich. 86, 44 N. W. 422; McKie v. Anderson, 78 Tex. 207, 14 S. W. 576.

[7] But the true rule is that such a judgment in favor of the landlord is not conclusive in a subsequent action by the tenant, because the tenant cannot be concluded by a judgment as to matters which he could not litigate in the action in which the judgment was rendered. If the judgment in ejectment in favor of the landlord against the tenant is conclusive as to the title, equity, under proper pleadings, would certainly enable the tenant to formally admit the possession of the landlord and to assert that his title is in fact paramount, thereby assuming the same burden that he would be required to assume and carry in a separate action. But in actions for rent and for use and occupation, the reason of the rule which estops the tenant from disputing the title of the landlord is plainly apparent. It is not apparent if the judgment in an action of ejectment by the landlord against the tenant is conclusive as to the title between the parties. Of course the tenant, in such an action, cannot set up want of title in the landlord, nor can he set up paramount title in another; but if the judgment is conclusive as to the title, or the suit against the tenant is so framed in any case as to adjudicate the question of title, the English rule, which permits the tenant to set up paramount title in himself, is sound in principle. Accident Ins. Co. v. Mackenzie, 5 Law T. (N. S.) 20, 10 C. B. N. S., Am. Reprint, 870. We are bound, under our decisions, to apply the estoppel in actions of ejectment, or of complaint for land, by the landlord against the tenant; but our conclusion is that the effect of the judgment against the tenant, unless the suit be so framed as to adjudicate the title, is to force the tenant to a separate action for the purpose of asserting his title.

In the case at bar we are not embarrassed in applying the estoppel for any of the reasons suggested above, because the petition, as finally amended, prayed only for the recovery of the possession of the land, together with the rents from the time of the filing of the petition. While some of the allegations in the petition may have been broad enough to call for an adjudication of the title, the landlord expressly alleged that the tenant's claim of title was "void as against plaintiff," and upon the trial she relied only upon the privity existing between the parties. The evidence, without dispute, shows that Sapp had acquired the possession of the premises from the plaintiff under and by virtue of the lease. Sapp's possession, thus acquired, passed by successive assignments into the Vada Naval Stores Company. The possession of Sapp and of those who held under him, including the possession of that company, was therefore the possession of the original lessor. Her possession was notice, under our Code, of whatever rights she had in the premises. It is this possession that must be restored before the tenant can assert title adverse to the landlord.

[8] In our opinion the most that can be said in favor of a vendee of a tenant, who has an apparent legal title, and from whom the purchase was made without notice of the tenancy, is that as between such vendee and the lessor the equities are equal. In such case the landlord, having the prior equity, should prevail. We deem it unnecessary to say that the letter from Peebles & Co. to Mrs. Sapp, conceding that it was received by Mrs. Sapp, did not amount to a surrender of the premises to Mrs. Sapp. We also think it unimportant that only a small part of the half lot of land involved was actually used by Sapp and those holding under him as a site for the manufacture of turpentine. The whole tract was leased for that purpose, and, so far as the record discloses, there was no restriction, express or implied, in the lease as to the quantity of land that might be so used. The possession of the whole tract was therefore acquired under and by virtue of the lease, and the possession thereof must be restored to the lessor.

In view of the ruling made upon the controlling question in this case, it is unnecessary to decide whether the suit for trespass brought by Mrs. Sapp against Autry & Son, which was pending at the time of the sale by Autry & Son to the Vada Naval Stores Company, was lis pendens, and whether this doctrine is to be applied in this case. We call attention, in passing, to the New York case of Halley v. Ano, 136 N. Y. 569, 32 N. E. 1038, 32 Am. St. Rep. 764, where it was ruled that in such an action, the land itself not being the subject-matter of the suit, and there being nothing in the pleadings to show that title thereto is involved, the purchaser of the land pendente lite is not bound by the judgment in a subsequent action involving title to the same land.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(148 Ga. 635)

CITY OF ATLANTA v. GEORGIA R. & BANKING CO. (No. 762.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)*1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 648, 654 — PRESCRIPTION—RIGHT OF WAY OVER RAILROAD TRACKS.

Although for a period of time longer than 20 years a crossing over the tracks of a railroad company is used by persons and vehicles, the public will not acquire an easement by prescription unless the use has been adverse, exclusive, and under a claim of right, and not by permission of the owner. Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. Standard Fuel Supply Co., 140 Ga. 353, 358, 78 S. E. 906, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 469, and authorities cited. Under the facts of this case, the use of the crossing was neither exclusive nor adverse.

2. DEDICATION \S 15, 31, 44—PUBLIC STREET—INTENT.

"Dedication to the public of a use of land for a street rests upon the intent of the owner to make such dedication. Where the dedication is not express, the acts of the owner relied upon to imply a dedication must be such as to clearly indicate an intent to exclusively devote the property to use as a street." Swift v. Lithonia, 101 Ga. 706, 29 S. E. 12; Savannah v. Fuel Co., supra. There must also be an acceptance. The facts of this case are not sufficient to show a dedication for public use.

3. DEDICATION \S 44—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 654—RAILROAD PROPERTY—PUBLIC RIGHTS—VERDICT—EVIDENCE.

Whether or not the charge of the court on the subject of equitable estoppel was a correct statement of the law, and whether that doctrine was applicable to the issues on trial, the charge was not error requiring the grant of a new trial. The verdict was demanded by the evidence. None of the assignments of error show cause for the grant of a new trial.

*(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)*4. EASEMENTS \S 36(1)—PRESCRIPTION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Title by prescription rests upon strict law, and the burden of proof is upon the prescriber to show affirmatively his right to maintain his adverse possession, and this is true when the prescription claimed is only an easement.

5. DEDICATION \S 15—DEDICATION BY RAILROAD—REQUISITES.

In view of limitations on railroad's disposition of its lands, so that it may not interfere with its public duties, the facts as to its intention necessary to imply dedication must be clear and unequivocal, and, if intention is determined by acts, they must be inconsistent and irreconcilable with any construction, except its assent to dedication.

6. DEDICATION \S 13—RAILROAD CROSSING—POWER OF RAILROAD COMPANY.

A railroad may by express dedication create an easement in the nature of the crossing, where it is not prohibited by its charter, and will not materially interfere with the proper performance of its charter duties.

Atkinson and George, JJ., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Petition by the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company against the City of Atlanta to have title to certain land decreed to be in it and for an injunction, with cross-bill by defendant. Verdict for plaintiff, motion for new trial overruled, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Georgia Railroad & Banking Company brought a petition against the city of Atlanta, in which it was alleged that the railroad company owned a right of way from the eastern boundary of the city to Pryor street, and across the particular strip of land lying between the point at which Yonge street opens into Decatur street and the boundary line between the right of way of the railroad company and what is known as Oakland Cemetery; that it was entitled to the exclusive use of this strip of land; and that this use was being interfered with by reason of the fact that the city was claiming the location in question to be a street, was prosecuting and threatening to prosecute its employes for failure to maintain an opening across its tracks at said point, and had passed an ordinance requiring the keeping of a watchman at said crossing. It prayed that title to the strip of land named be decreed to be in it, and for injunction against the prosecution of its employes and against the enforcement of the ordinance requiring the keeping of a watchman. The defendant filed a cross-bill setting up its claim to the crossing based on dedication and prescription, and prayed for injunction against the railroad. The case has had the attention of this court on two previous occasions. 131 Ga. 94, 61 S. E. 1035; 134 Ga. 871, 68 S. E. 703. The final trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. A motion for new trial was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

J. L. Mayson and S. D. Hewlett, both of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

McDaniel & Black, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

GILBERT, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] 1, 2. The first and second headnotes require no discussion. The authorities cited are sufficiently elaborate upon the rulings therein made.

[3-6] 3. The railroad company showed title to the land by deed, and there was no evidence to show any reservation or qualification in the grant. The city set up an affirmative equitable plea based both upon prescription and dedication. These two principles are closely analogous, but not identical. For a discussion, see 8 R. C. L. 904, § 30.

The city of Atlanta makes no claim that it has obtained the right to keep open the contested crossing by deed from the railroad company, or by express dedication and acceptance. It is not contended that the right has been acquired by condemnation under legislative authority, nor is it suggested that a street was laid out in pursuance of a municipal ordinance. Title by prescription rests upon strict law, and the burden of proof rests upon the prescriber to show affirmatively his right to maintain his adverse possession. And this is true when the prescription claimed is only to an easement. McCullough v. East Tenn., etc., Ry. Co., 97 Ga. 373, 23 S. E. 838. This is especially true when the land is already used for public purposes, acquired under legislative authority. The power of disposition by a railroad company of its lands is limited, so that it may not disable itself from performing its public duties. It is a well-established rule that the requirements are much more stringent in the case of railroads than in the case of property not used for public purposes. In the case of railroads the facts in regard to intention, necessary to imply dedication, must be clear and unequivocal. 8 R. C. L. 890, § 14. Mr. Jones, in his work on Easements (section 425), says that the intention to dedicate must be made clearly to appear, and, if determined by acts, "they must be such acts as are inconsistent and irreconcilable with any construction except the assent of the owner of such dedication." Of course, no such easement can be acquired, either by prescription or by dedication, where possession is exercised by the express or implied permission, or by the passive acquiescence or mere nonaction of the owner. A railroad may, by grant or express dedication, create an easement in the nature of a crossing across its tracks, where it is not prohibited by its charter, and where such action will not materially interfere with the proper performance of its charter duties, and the second use may be reasonably consistent with the first. A municipality may acquire such an easement by condemnation where the law has conferred express or implied authority. In the case of City Council of Augusta v. Ga. R., etc., Co., 98 Ga. 161, 166, 26 S. E. 499, 500, it is said:

"A different result follows, however, when the enjoyment of the second use involves the practical extinguishment of the former, or renders its exercise so extremely inconvenient and hazardous as practically to destroy its value. In such a case, the right to enjoy the second use must rest upon express legislative authority, and will not be implied. The exercise of the second use, under such circumstances, would amount to a forfeiture of the first. Forfeitures, as a general rule, are not favored, will never be implied, and least of all where the effect would be to deprive one of a substantial right which he enjoyed under a valid subsisting legislative enactment."

See, also, Central Railroad v. Brinson, 70 Ga. 207, 240; Town of Poulan v. Atlantic R. Co., 123 Ga. 611, 51 S. E. 657; Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Louisville, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1215, 1219, notes; 9 R. C. L. 773, note 19. Surely the easement could not be acquired indirectly by prescription or implied dedication under circumstances which would not permit acquirement directly by condemnation. A railroad company cannot do, or permit to be done, by nonaction that which cannot be done expressly.

In the present case it is sought to establish a crossing over a right of way 110 feet in width, every available inch of which is occupied by railroad tracks, including two main-line tracks, constituting a part of the "railroad yard" constantly used for the passage of trains and engines. Prescription or implied dedication in such a case could only be established where the right is clear and unequivocal, under a rule no less strict than that stated in the authority last cited. It appears from the evidence that a system of "railroad yards" begins at Central avenue at the end of the old Union Station and extends to the roundhouse at or near Inman Park. The yard system as a whole is composed of several units, each connected with and dependent upon the others. There is evidence showing that these tracks are connected with all of the yards and were so constructed as to make use of every available inch of ground. To maintain the crossing would cripple the yards about one-third, and would require a total reconstruction of the yards, costing several hundreds of thousands of dollars. It would diminish the car room, interfere with the building and arranging of trains, continuously add to the expense thereof, and cause delay. The impairment would be substantial and for all time. The railroad has, from its inception, continuously exercised control and use of the right of way inconsistent with the intent to dedicate a street to permanent public use. The city introduced evidence sufficient to show that for many years the public did cross at the point in question, that at times a watchman was stationed there to protect the public from accident, that at one time accommodation trains stopped there to discharge passengers, and other facts of similar character. The evidence of the city as a whole was not sufficient to measure up to the rule above stated, as to prescription, or as to a clear and unequivocal intention to dedicate, and to negative the theory of permission or passive acquiescence on the part of the railroad. Taken altogether, the evidence demanded a verdict for the plaintiff.

In a populous city, near its center, through a railroad yard where trains are constantly moving and shifting, where the entire width of the right of way is covered with tracks, a grade crossing must grossly impair the efficient use of the property as a railroad, and is necessarily dangerous and inconvenient to the public. Courts, as well as all persons of ordinary powers of observation, are obliged to take cognizance of these self-evident facts.

From a casual reading the decision in B. & W. R. Co. v. Waycross, 91 Ga. 573, 17 S. E. 674, might appear to conflict somewhat with the views above stated. In that case the railroad filed a petition for injunction, very much as in the present case. The city of Waycross also filed a cross-petition asking for an injunction against the railroad. It appears in that case that the railroad was built prior to the building of the city, and the roadway crossed a single track. The city, after its incorporation, laid out one of its principal streets across the track at the point occupied by the crossing. The railroad desired to build one additional track on its right of way, and the city, through its officers, interfered. Injunction was sought to prevent this interference. The injunction sought by the city was to prevent the building of the additional track. This court reversed the judgment, holding that the two uses were inconsistent. A reference to the pleadings will show that the petition filed by the railroad specifically alleged that its purpose and intention was not to obstruct the passage of persons and vehicles and property, nor to block up the avenue with cars, but was solely to furnish a connection for the passage of cars and engines running from its yards to the main line of the railway; and that the city was entitled to an easement across the railroad for a street, because it had laid out at that point a street according to the plans of the city, and that the public actually had a right of crossing the tracks by an acquiescence amounting to a dedication. Thus it is obvious that the decision proceeded from the premise of an established easement, and was not concerned with whether such an easement could be established under the pleadings and evidence in that case.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON and GEORGE, JJ., dissenting.

BECK, P. J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance.

ATKINSON and GEORGE, JJ. (dissenting). Applying the principles in B. & W. R. Co. v. Waycross, 91 Ga. 573, 17 S. E. 674, and Southern Ry. Co. v. Combs, 124 Ga. 1004, 53 S. E. 508, to the facts in this case, the judgment should be reversed.

HARRIS v. TAYLOR et al. (No. 938.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. PROCESS \S 153—DEFECT IN COPY—SIGNATURE OF CLERK.

The failure of the clerk to attach his signature to the copy process, regular in other respects, served upon the defendant in an equitable suit, is not cause for abatement of the suit; the original process attached to the original petition of file in the office of the clerk being regular in all respects, and the copy petition served upon the defendant, as required by statute, along with the defective process, being a true copy of the original petition, including entry of filing thereon under the signature of the clerk.

2. BANKS AND BANKING \S 77(4)—INSOLVENCY—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS.

Under the ruling in Lamar v. Taylor, 141 Ga. 227, 80 S. E. 1085 (3), the individual liability of stockholders of the Exchange Bank of Macon, under its charter, to depositors for all moneys deposited by them therein, is, upon its insolvency, an asset of the bank and enforceable in a suit or suits brought by its receivers. Civ. Code 1910, \S 2249.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW \S 169, 191—CORPORATIONS \S 217—INSOLVENCY—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDER—RETROACTIVE LAW—IMPAIRMENT OF OBLIGATION OF CONTRACT.

Section 2249 of the Civil Code 1910 (Acts 1894, p. 76), which makes the statutory individual liability of a stockholder in an insolvent corporation an asset of such corporation, "to be enforced by the assignee, receiver, or other officer having the legal right to collect, marshal, and distribute the assets of such failed corporation," is not unconstitutional because, as applied to the Exchange Bank of Macon, chartered before the passage of the act of 1894, supra, it is retroactive and impairs the obligation of contracts. The act is purely remedial, by it, and the statutory liability of the stockholder is neither extended nor restricted, increased nor diminished. Moore v. Ripley, 106 Ga. 556, 32 S. E. 647(2); Lamar v. Taylor, supra.

4. BANKS AND BANKING \S 49(6)—INSOLVENCY—ACTION BY RECEIVER—MISJOINDER OF ACTION—MISJOINDER OF PARTIES.

Where a banking corporation has been shown to be insolvent and its assets placed in the hands of receivers, and in pursuance of an order of court the receivers undertake to enforce by suit in equity the individual liability of the stockholders as fixed by the charter in favor of depositors in such corporation, all the stockholders so liable may be joined in one action. There is no misjoinder of causes of action or of parties defendant. Moore v. Ripley, supra.

5. BANKS AND BANKING \S 47(1, 2)—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS \S 34(5)—INSOLVENCY—RECEIVERS' SUIT AGAINST STOCKHOLDERS.

In a suit of the character just indicated: (a) No demand by depositors as a condition precedent to suit is necessary; (b) the liability of the stockholder need not be actually fixed and determined; (c) the assets, legal and equitable, of the corporation, need not have been first completely exhausted; and (d) the action to enforce the statutory liability of the stockholder may be brought at any time within 20 years after the right of action accrues. Civ. Code 1910, \S 4360; Wheatley v. Glover, 125 Ga. 719, 54 S. E. 626 (19).

6. BANKS AND BANKING \S 48(1/2)—INSOLVENCY—RECEIVERS' ACTION AGAINST STOCKHOLDERS—STATUTES.

In such action, the receiver may sue the stockholder in whose name the capital stock stands upon the books of the corporation at the time of its failure (Civ. Code 1910, \S 2248), or he may sue the real owner of the shares of the capital stock in such failed corporation, although such shares stand on the books of the bank in the name of another who in fact has no interest therein.

7. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS \S 127(3)—AMENDMENT—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

The amendment to the petition did not set forth a new cause of action.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Suit by R. J. Taylor and others, receivers of the Exchange Bank of Macon, against E. G. Harris and others. Demurrer of defendant Harris to petition overruled and his traverse to return of service and his plea in abatement stricken, and he excepts and brings error. Affirmed.

On July 8, 1907, upon the petition of a majority of its directors, the Exchange Bank of Macon was placed in the hands of receivers. The petition was against the bank, the stockholders thereof, and certain creditors. As to the creditors the prayers were for injunctive relief only. As to the bank and its stockholders, the prayers were for the general equitable winding up of the affairs of the bank, the distributing of its assets, etc. The Exchange Bank was chartered by a special act of the Legislature. Its charter provided:

"That said corporation shall be responsible to its creditors to the extent of its capital and its assets, and each stockholder shall be individually liable for all the debts of said corporation to the extent of his or her unpaid shares of stock, and said stockholder shall be further and additionally individually liable equally and ratably, and not one for another, as sureties, to depositors of said corporation for all moneys deposited therein, in an amount equal to the face value of their respective shares of stock; it being the true intent and purpose of this section of this act, that, as to depositors, for all moneys deposited with said corporation, there shall be an individual liability upon such stockholder in such corporation over and beyond the par value of his or her original shares of stock, equal in amount to the face value of said share of stock; provided, that said liability of the stockholders shall not prevent depositors from having equal rank with all other creditors upon the capital property and assets of said bank." Acts 1890-91, vol. 2, p. 130.

The receivers claimed the right to enforce the statutory liability of the stockholders under the charter for the benefit of the depositors. On June 29, 1912, the receivers were, by order of the court, authorized and directed to prosecute this suit to enforce such statutory liability of the stockholders and to collect from the stockholders an amount sufficient to pay the depositors for all moneys deposited in said bank, "not heretofore paid out of the other assets of said bank." The petition alleged that the undistributed assets amounted to $21,498.58; the unpaid deposits, according to the books of the bank, amounted to $146,832.60, besides interest. A list of the stockholders and of the number of shares owned by each was set out; and the petition prayed, among other things, for judgment and decree against the "said stockholders of said bank whose names have been set forth herein as defendants in this case, and against such other stockholders as may hereafter, by proper order of the court, be made parties defendant hereto, according to their several liabilities under the terms of the charter of said bank for such amounts as may be ascertained, upon the final accounting herein, to be necessary to pay the depositors of said bank as set forth herein in full." Among the stockholders named as defendants were E. G. Harris, plaintiff in error, who was alleged to be the owner of eleven shares, and W. G. Solomon, trading as W. G. Solomon & Co., who was alleged to be the owner of 106 shares. The petition was filed in Bibb superior court on August 28, 1912, and made returnable to the November term, 1912, of said court. Certain of the stockholders were duly served, and filed pleas to the suit; among other defenses, they prayed that the suit against them be enjoined for the reasons set out in the report of the case of Lamar v. Taylor, 141 Ga. 227, 80 S. E. 1085. Certain of the defendant stockholders were not served 15 days before the return term. Among these was the plaintiff in error. Such stockholders moved that the suit, for the reasons stated, be dismissed as to them. The court denied this prayer, and allowed the plaintiffs to amend the process by making it returnable to the February term, 1913, of the court. This ruling was affirmed by the Supreme Court in the case of Turpin v. Taylor, 143 Ga. 224, 84 S. E. 547, but with the direction that the court provide for service anew of the suit with the amended process attached.

Accordingly, the plaintiffs, on January 11, 1916, filed and had allowed an amendment to the original suit, requiring service anew on said defendant stockholders. In this amendment it was set out that Harris had settled his liability on the eleven shares of stock standing in his name; but that 100 of the 106 shares, alleged in the original petition to be owned by W. G. Solomon trading as W. G. Solomon & Co., and standing on the books of the bank in the name of Solomon & Company, were in fact owned by Harris; and that Solomon merely purchased said shares for E. G. Harris, the actual owner thereof. It was also alleged that 6 of said shares standing in the name of Solomon & Co. were in fact the property of another named person; and the amendment asked for the right to strike Solomon as a defendant, and to make Harris and the other alleged stockholder parties defendants; and prayed judgment against each of them. Harris was served, as directed by order of the court, with copy of the original petition and all amendments allowed, including the amendment of January 11, 1916; but the copy of the amended process attached, regular in all other respects, was not signed by the clerk or other officer of the court. Harris traversed the return of service made by the sheriff, and filed a plea in abatement to the suit as to him, upon the grounds stated. He also demurred to the petition as amended, upon the grounds: That no cause of action is set out; there is a misjoinder of causes of action and parties defendant; the receivers are not proper parties to bring the suit; the statute under which the suit is brought (Civ. Code, § 2249) is unconstitutional; particularly, the receivers are not authorized to sue thereunder, the bank having been chartered prior to that act; the petition fails to allege a demand by depositors; the stockholders' liability is not fixed and determined; the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations; as to the 100 shares of stock standing in the name of Solomon, trading in the name of W. G. Solomon & Co., only Solomon is liable to the plaintiffs; as to the 106 shares of stock, the amendment to the petition set up a new cause of action, and Harris, having settled his liability on the 11 shares originally alleged to stand in his name on the books of the bank, is entitled to be discharged. The court overruled the demurrer, and upon motion struck the traverse to the return of service and the plea in abatement. Harris excepted.

Harris, Harris & Witman, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Miller & Jones and Hardeman, Jones, Park & Johnston, all of Macon, for defendants in error.

GEORGE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. It is conceded that the copy process served upon the plaintiff in error was not signed by the clerk. The motion, in the nature of a general demurrer, to strike the plea in abatement, admits this. The original process was in all respects regular, and was signed by the clerk. True and correct copies of the original petition and the amendment of January 11, 1916, to which was attached a copy of the judge's order allowing the amendment, making Harris a party defendant to the suit, and requiring the clerk to issue process directed to him, "returnable to the next term of this court" (February term, 1916), and providing for service upon him of the petition and process as amended, were served upon the plaintiff in error, along with the unsigned copy process. Both the petition and the amendment, according to the copy entries of the clerk appearing upon the copy petition and copy amendment served upon plaintiff in error, were regularly filed in the office of the clerk of the court. The plaintiff in error appeared at the court and at the term thereafter at which he was required by the original process to appear and plead. He was therefore not actually misled. The amended petition was addressed to the court; it set out in detail the demand or cause of action, named the plaintiff and the defendant, and prayed for process and judgment against the latter. Under these circumstances, was the plea in abatement properly stricken? The question appears not to have been directly passed on by this court. In Cochran v. Davis, 20 Ga. 581, the question was directly made, and the decision in that case apparently rules that defects in the copy are immaterial if the original is correct. However, the decision was controlled by the failure of the defendant in that case to except in time to an order of the court allowing the copy process to be amended by affixing the signature of the clerk thereto. In Ga. So. & Fla. Ry. Co. v. Pritchard, 123 Ga. 320, 323, 51 S. E. 424, the statement in the opinion of Lumpkin, J., in Cochran v. Davis, supra, was declared to be obiter. In Myers v. Griner, 120 Ga. 723, 48 S. E. 113, the original process, which had not been signed by the clerk, was allowed to be amended nunc pro tunc by adding the clerk's signature. It was there said, obiter, that if the copy served upon the defendant had not been signed by the clerk or his deputy, or if neither the copy nor the original had been signed by the clerk, a different question would have been presented to the court. Section 5551 of the Civil Code requires the clerk to indorse the date of filing in office upon every petition. Section 5552 is as follows:

"To every petition the clerk shall annex a process (unless the same be waived), signed by the clerk or his deputy, and bearing test in the name of a judge of the court, and directed to the sheriff or his deputy, requiring the appearance of the defendant at the return term of the court."

Section 5563 requires the clerk to deliver the original petition, with process annexed, together with a copy of the petition and process for each defendant, to the sheriff or his deputy, who shall serve "such copy" upon each defendant residing in the county.

Under section 5572:

"No technical or formal objections shall invalidate any petition or process; but if the same substantially conforms to the requisitions of this Code, and the defendant has had notice of the pendency of the cause, all other objections shall be disregarded."

Our Code is liberal in the allowance of amendments, both as to pleadings and process, and section 5709 provides that—

"The mistake or misprision of a clerk or other ministerial officer shall in no case work to the injury of a party, where by amendment justice may be promoted."

Cases from outside jurisdictions on the point presented are few in number. Owing to the variety of statutes and rules of procedure, such cases are of little service beyond the jurisdiction where they were decided. However, it has been held that the omission in a copy of a copy of the court clerk's signature to the original writ is not material. Clutterbuck v. Wildman, 2 Tyrw. (Eng.) 276; Lyon v. Baldwin, 194 Mich. 118, 160 N. W. 428, L. R. A. 1917C, 148. In Lyon v. Baldwin, supra, it was held:

"The service of a writ of garnishment" is not void "because the copy delivered to the garnishee" is not dated and does not contain "the signature of the clerk."

The omission from the copy delivered of a copy of the judge's signature does not render the service insufficient. Greenleaf v. Mumford, 30 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 30 (warrant of attachment). In Collins v. Merriam, 81 Vt. 622, the defendant was sued in a justice's court. He moved to set aside the judgment rendered against him, upon the ground that the copy writ served upon him was not signed by a justice or other officer. The decision was against him, and, while other reasons may have required the decision, it was said, in the course of the opinion in the case:

"Suppose there was an omission to annex the name of the magistrate who signed the writ to the copy. I apprehend this would not defeat the effect of the service as a notice, and under our decisions would not constitute matter of abatement."

However, the contrary view of the question was taken by the New Jersey Supreme Court in Steedle v. Woolston, 83 N. J. Law, 91, 85 Atl. 737. It is to be noted that the New Jersey case arose in a "small cause court," and the statute, so far as appears from the decision, did not require a copy of the petition or declaration to be served upon the defendant along with the writ. It has been noticed that our statute requires service on the defendant of a copy of the petition or declaration. This copy should in reason be considered as a "part of the notice" to him. We are disposed to agree with the line of decisions to the effect that the copy petition served upon the defendant may aid the defective process served with it. First National Bank v. Rusk, 64 Or. 35, 127 Pac. 780, 129 Pac. 121, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 138, 145; Harvey v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 148 Wis. 391, 134 N. W. 839; Lee v. Clark, 53 Minn. 315, 55 N. W. 127; Messervy v. Beckwith, 41 Ill. 452. See, also, Williams v. Buchanan, 75 Ga. 789. The defect in the copy process did not wholly defeat the effect of the service as a notice, and the plea in abatement was properly dismissed.

[2-5] 2-5. The rulings made in the second, third, fourth, and fifth headnotes require no elaboration.

[6] 6. As to the 100 shares of stock standing in the name of Solomon & Co., it is insisted that there was no contractual relation between the bank and plaintiff in error. To this we are not prepared to assent. It is said that section 2248 of the Civil Code, which in part provides that "the stockholder in whose name the capital stock stands upon the books of such corporation at the date of its failure shall be primarily liable to respond upon such individual liability," fixes the liability under the charter of the Exchange Bank upon Solomon. Solomon is liable to the bank. His liability does not depend upon section 2248, supra. That section did not create such liability as to him. One who knowingly allows his name to appear upon the books of a corporation as the owner of capital stock therein, with the right to receive dividends, vote the stock, and to have the advantage of the apparent ownership, is estopped to deny that he is also subject to the burdens, statutory or contractual, imposed upon him as a stockholder in the corporation. He deals with the corporation as a stockholder. He holds himself out to the public as a stockholder. As to the former he is estopped to deny, and as to the latter it would be inequitable to permit him to deny, the existence of the apparent relationship. This is according to all the authorities. Section 2248, supra, merely prescribes the statutory rule for locating the burden of liability among the successive owners of stock. It is not applicable here. Solomon is liable to the receivers in this case. It by no means follows that the actual owner of the stock is not also liable and primarily liable in the suit. The decided cases seem to support this view. Welles v. Larrabee (C. C. Iowa) 36 Fed. 868, 2 L. R. A. 471; Foster v. Brow, 120 Mich. 1, 79 N. W. 696, 701, 702, 77 Am. St. Rep. 565; Hubbell v. Houghton (C. C. Mass.) 86 Fed. 547, affirmed 91 Fed. 453, 33 C. C. A. 574; Dunn v. Howe (1 C. C. A.) 107 Fed. 849, 47 C. C. A. 13; Ohio Valley Bank v. Hullitt, 204 U. S. 167, 168, 27 Sup. Ct. 179, 51 L. Ed. 427. See, also, 1 Michie on Banks and Banking, 170.

[7] 7. If we are correct in the foregoing, we do not think it can be said that the amendment set up a new cause of action. Relatively to the plaintiff in error he never became a party defendant to the suit, and the suit never became a live action as to him, until the service upon him of the amended petition. It is therefore not a question of adding a new cause of action by amendment. The suit as to him stands just as if in the original action it had been charged that he was the owner of 11 shares of the capital stock which stood in his own name upon the books of the bank, and 100 shares of the capital stock which stood in the name of Solomon & Co., but that Solomon & Co. were mere brokers or agents for him and had no interest in said 100 shares. But the amendment to the petition, treating it as such, did not set out a new and different cause of action. The cause of action as to the 11 shares of stock standing in the name of the plaintiff in error, and the 100 shares in fact owned by him (according to the allegations of the amendment) but standing on the books of the bank in the name of Solomon & Co., is the same, ultimately one—the individual liability of the plaintiff in error as a stockholder in the Exchange Bank of Macon under its charter.

The judgment of the court below, dismissing the plea in abatement and overruling the demurrer to the petition is affirmed.

BAILEY v. STATE. (No. 10135.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Jan. 9, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW §768(1) — REMINDING JURY OF OATH—STATEMENT OF COURT.

It was not error for the judge in his charge to remind the jury of the oath they had taken, that they would well and truly try the case, and to read the oath to them. The statement of the court, in this connection, that the jury had "sworn to try the case 'according to the opinion you entertain of the evidence as adduced on the trial of the case,'" while slightly inaccurate, was not materially erroneous.

2. CHARGE OF COURT.

Under the facts of the case, there was no error in the charge of the court as complained of in the second special ground of the motion for a new trial.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §922(2)—OFFENSE—BURDEN OF PROOF—CHARGE.

The venue was properly laid in the indictment, and clearly and undisputedly proved by the evidence, and the court instructed the jury that the burden was on the state to prove every material fact alleged in the indictment. There was no contention whatever as to the venue during the trial of the case. Under such circumstances, it affords no ground for a new trial that the judge failed to charge the jury specifically that it was incumbent on the state to prove that the defendant had the whisky in his possession, custody, or control in the county of Cherokee.

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Cherokee County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Hardy Bailey was convicted of an offense under the liquor law, his motion for new trial was overruled, and he brings error. Affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW §1110(2, 9)—TRANSCRIPT OF EVIDENCE—DIRECTION TO CLERK—ALTERATION OF BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

In a case where it appears that the transcript of the brief of evidence sent to this court is not a correct copy of the brief of evidence approved by the trial judge and of file in the office of the clerk of the court below, this court will order the clerk to send up a correct copy of such record. Smith v. State, 118 Ga. 83, 44 S. E. 827. Where, however, it appears that the brief of evidence sent to this court in the transcript of the record is a correct copy of the brief of evidence approved by the trial judge, and where it further appears that he has signed the bill of exceptions, it will be held that he has exhausted his powers with respect to the testimony, and cannot subsequently alter the brief of evidence. Jones v. State, 64 Ga. 698; Minhinnett v. State, 106 Ga. 141, 32 S. E. 19; Milton v. City of Savannah, 121 Ga. 89, 48 S. E. 684.

2. CORRECTION OF BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

Under the ruling in the preceding note, and the facts of the instant case, the trial judge was without authority to correct the brief of evidence, and this court will not order the corrected brief of evidence sent up.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §934—COMMISSION OF OFFENSE BEFORE PRESENTMENT—CONVICTION.

It appearing from the brief of evidence in the record transmitted to this court that if any offense was committed by the accused, it was subsequent to the finding of the presentment upon which he was tried, his conviction was contrary to law (Minhinnett v. State, supra), and the court erred in overruling his motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Forsyth County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

ATLANTA, B. & A. RY. CO. v. SMITH.
(No. 9777.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. Jan. 14, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT §258(20), 265(12) —SELECTION OF SERVANTS — PRESUMPTION OF ORDINARY CARE.

Even if the injury to the plaintiff resulted from the carelessness and negligence of inexperienced and incompetent servants, the petition was nevertheless subject to general demurrer, since the law presumes that the master exercised ordinary care in the selection of his servants (Georgia Railroad Co. v. Nelms, 83 Ga. 70, 74, 9 S. E. 1049, 20 Am. St. Rep. 308; Baxley v. Satilla Mfg. Co., 114 Ga. 720, 40 S. E. 730; Gunn v. Willingham, 111 Ga. 427, 434, 36 S. E. 804; Kilgo v. Rome Soil Pipe Mfg. Co., 16 Ga. App. 737, 86 S. E. 82 [2]), and nowhere is it therein alleged that the master knew of such incompetency, or that by the exercise of due diligence could or should have known of their incompetency at the time of employment; or else that it negligently retained such servants with knowledge of their incompetency (Gunn v. Willingham, supra).

2. MASTER AND SERVANT §217(3)—INCOMPETENCY OF FELLOW SERVANTS—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

The petition was likewise subject to general demurrer for the reason that it affirmatively appears therefrom that the plaintiff was at the time of his injury a foreman in charge of a gang of laborers, whose negligence he alleges caused his injury, and he had at least equal opportunity with the master of discovering, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, their negligent propensities. "A servant cannot recover for injuries resulting from a fellow servant's incompetency, if he had equal opportunity with the master of discovering it, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known of it." Kilgo v. Rome Soil Pipe Mfg. Co., supra. See, also, Civ. Code 1910, § 3131; R. & D. Railroad Co. v. Worley, 92 Ga. 84, 18 S. E. 361; Crown Cotton Mills v. McNally, 123 Ga. 35, 38, 51 S. E. 13.

2. PLEADING — §214(1) — DEMURRER — CONSTRUCTION OF PETITION.

As against a general demurrer to a petition, the Court of Appeals must necessarily take the allegations of the petition to be true.

Error from Superior Court, Warren County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Suit by O. M. Smith, Jr., by next friend, C. M. Smith, Sr., against the City of Warrenton. Demurrers to petition overruled, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

E. P. Davis, of Warrenton, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. Shurley, of Warrenton, and Horace & Frank Holden, of Athens, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. O. M. Smith, Jr., by next friend, O. M. Smith, Sr., brought suit for damages against the city of Warrenton, alleging in substance that the plaintiff, who was four years of age, was injured by the fall of an iron shaft, round in shape, 2 inches in diameter, and about 20 feet long, one end of which was lying on a slab at the edge of the courthouse steps, and the other on a pier made of brick, covered with cement plaster, located at the edge of a public street in the city of Warrenton; that the plaintiff and other boys were playing on it, when it fell to the ground, injuring him severely; that by the slightest movement it was liable to fall; that it was placed there by the authorities of the city of Warrenton, who, by the consent of the county commissioners, had charge of the courthouse square; that many people, including adults and children, for many years frequented the courthouse square at the place where the injury occurred; that the city of Warrenton had both actual and constructive notice of the dangerousness of the said iron shaft, and had actual notice that children played upon and around it, and had notice for many years that children frequented the place, and played at and near the place where the plaintiff was injured. The defendant demurred, upon the ground that the petition disclosed that the injury occurred on the courthouse property, belonging to the county, and not on one of the streets or sidewalks of the city, but at a place over which the city of Warrenton had no jurisdiction, and further upon the ground that the dangerous bar of iron, which fell upon the plaintiff, causing his injury, could be reached by him only upon his voluntarily going upon the courthouse property, etc. The court overruled the demurrers to the petition, and the defendant excepts to that judgment.

[1, 2] The petition alleges that the city of Warrenton had charge of the courthouse square for many years, and had a walk across the courthouse square from one public street to another, and that the shaft of iron which injured the plaintiff was placed there by the city, in order to stop travel over a certain walkway. The petition is clear that the city of Warrenton maintained this agency, which, because of its unsafeness, was liable to injure children who played upon or around it. As against the demurrer, this court, of necessity, must take the allegations of the petition to be true. Under the rulings of the Supreme Court in American Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Murden, 141 Ga. 208, 80 S. E. 788, and Mayor, etc., of Umadilla v. Felder, 145 Ga. 440, 89 S. E. 423, and cases there cited, the petition sets forth a cause of action. The court did not err in overruling the demurrers.

Judgment affirmed.

COOK v. BROWN et al. (No. 9670.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 16, 1919. Rehearing Denied Jan.
28, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EVIDENCE — 265(15) — LANDLORD AND TENANT — 330(1), 332 — DAMAGE FROM FIRE SET BY CROPPER—LIABILITY OF LANDLORD—PETITION—RATIFICATION.

The petition as amended alleged that "the relation of master and servant existed between Ida Brown and Gus King, in that the former had employed the latter as a cropper to work the farm on which fire started, * * * the former to furnish the land and stock, and the latter was to furnish himself and his family to work the crop on said place [italics ours]; said work was to be done under the direction and control of the former; such contract and relation existed at the time said fire occurred." The petition further alleged that the fire, which destroyed property belonging to the plaintiff for, which damages were sought against the cropper, King, and his landlord, Ida Brown, "was put out by defendant Gus King and his children, and the putting out of same was under authority of Gus King"; and that, "after said tortious act complained of, it was ratified by defendant Ida Brown, in not repudiating said acts and discharging defendant Gus King and his children, and further in admitting liability for same and offering to pay damages." Held:

(a) Notwithstanding the allegations that in preparing the land for cultivation it became necessary to burn off certain rubbish and trash, and that said King in carrying out his farming operations "put out" fire at different points on the lands of his master, and that these acts were within the scope of the business which King was employed to do, no cause of action was set forth against the landlord, since it did not appear that the fire was set out under her express direction, and the allegation that the acts of the cropper were within the scope of his employment is expressly negatived by the precise stipulations of the contract itself, which provides that the cropper was to "furnish himself and his family to work the crop on said place," and this work "was to be done under the direction and control" of the landlord. By the terms of the contract, the acts complained of were excluded from within the scope of the cropper's or servant's authority and duties.

(b) The allegations that the landlord failed to discharge the servant, Gus King, and admitted liability for the injury caused by King, and offered to pay damages, did not show ratification of the unauthorized acts of the cropper. Generally, an admission of liability where none in fact exists, and an offer to adjust a demand not legally enforceable, could not of itself create legal liability.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT — 332—INJURY FROM FIRE SET BY CROPPER—NONSUIT.

The questions as to negligence was peculiarly a question for the jury (International Cotton Mills v. Webb, 22 Ga. App. 309, 96 S. E. 16 [4]), and there being sufficient evidence to authorize the jury to find for the plaintiff, though it may not require such a verdict, the court erred in granting a nonsuit as to the defendant cropper (Moore v. Dixie Fire Insurance Co., 19 Ga. App. 804, 92 S. E. 302).

HEATH v. SANDERSVILLE R. CO.
SANDERSVILLE R. CO. v. HEATH.

(Nos. 9781, 9782.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 15, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CARRIERS — 227(1) — PLEADING — 35 — SURPLUSAGE — LIVE STOCK — ACTION FOR DAMAGES—PETITION.

In an action instituted against a common carrier for a failure to safely transport and deliver live stock committed to it in good order by a shipper, particular acts of negligence need not be alleged, and when alleged may be treated as surplusage. Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Warfield, 129 Ga. 473, 59 S. E. 234; Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. McHan, 144 Ga. 683, 87 S. E. 889 (1); Southern Express Co. v. Bailey, 7 Ga. App. 331, 66 S. E. 960; Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Stamps, 17 Ga. App. 453, 87 S. E. 702 (1).

2. CARRIERS — 215(1)—LIVE STOCK—NEGLECT—LIABILITY.

"When a carrier fails to deliver the goods intrusted to his care, or delivers them in a damaged condition, no excuse avails him, unless it was occasioned by the act of God, the public enemy, an inherent vice or natural deterioration of the object carried, or, in case of live stock, the viciousness of the animals, or that he is excused by special contract made with the shipper, by statute, or by negligence of the shipper." Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Warfield, supra.

3. CARRIERS — 218(11) — INTRASTATE SHIPMENT OF LIVE STOCK—CONTRACTS—NOTICE OF CLAIM FOR DAMAGES.

This being an intrastate shipment (the principle here announced being apparently different in interstate shipments, G. & A. Ry. v. Blish Milling Co., 241 U. S. 191, 38 Sup. Ct. 541, 60 L. Ed. 948), a stipulation in the contract of affreightment for the transportation of live stock, that before the animals are removed from the place of destination and mingled with other animals, written notice of claim for damage shall be given to the agent of the carrier, may be waived by the carrier. Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Tharpe, 11 Ga. App. 485, 75 S. E. 677 (3). "The agent was not bound to recognize an oral demand. But if he did so, making no objection to it on the ground that it was not in writing, we think it was sufficient." Hill v. Telegraph Co., 85 Ga. 425, 430, 11 S. E. 874, 875 (21 Am. St. Rep. 166). The allegations of the petition under consideration were sufficient to show oral notice to the agent of the delivering carrier of the damaged condition of the cattle, and that written notice was waived.

4. CARRIERS ⇐227(1)—LIVE STOCK—NOTICE OF DAMAGE—SUFFICIENCY.

The allegation that notice of the damaged condition of the cattle was given to the agent of the delivering carrier was not subject to special demurrer raising the objection that his name was not set forth in the petition. See, in this connection, Angusta Ry. Co. v. Andrews, 92 Ga. 706, 710, 712, 19 S. E. 713; Pierce v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 122 Ga. 664, 50 S. E. 468; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Burroughs, 20 Ga. App. 197, 92 S. E. 1010 (1); Haynie v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 20 Ga. App. 599, 93 S. E. 258 (1).

5. CARRIERS ⇐219(8) — INTRASTATE SHIPMENT OF LIVE STOCK—LIABILITY OF INITIAL CARRIER—STATUTE.

Prior to the enactment of the Georgia law (Acts 1906, p. 102) relative to intrastate shipments, in conformity to what is known as the Carmack Amendment to the Hepburn Interstate Commerce Act (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, § 7, pars. 11, 12, 84 Stat. 595 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa]), it was the rule that a common carrier was not bound to issue a bill of lading for transportation of freight beyond its own terminus, and, if it did so, it might stipulate, as a condition to the undertaking, that its liability should extend only to injuries occurring on its own line (Central R. Co. v. Avant, 80 Ga. 195, 5 S. E. 78; R. & D. R. Co. v. Shomo, 90 Ga. 496, 500, 18 S. E. 220; Kavanaugh v. Southern Ry. Co., 120 Ga. 62 [2], 65, 47 S. E. 526, 1 Ann. Cas. 705); but since the passage of that act (codified as section 2777 of the Civil Code of 1910) the initial carrier is liable for loss occasioned anywhere en route, whether on its own lines or not, where it voluntarily receives the shipment, notwithstanding an agreement or stipulation in a bill of lading limiting liability to loss, damage, or injury occurring on its own lines. See, in this connection, Atlanta & West Point R. Co. v. Fairburn Marble Co., 145 Ga. 706, 89 S. E. 817.

6. ACTION FOR DAMAGE TO SHIPMENT OF LIVE STOCK—PETITION.

Applying the foregoing rulings, the petition as amended was not subject to any of the demurrers interposed, and the cross-bill of exception raising the several points made by the demurrers is affirmed.

7. CARRIERS ⇐218(3), 227(3) — INTRASTATE SHIPMENT OF LIVE STOCK—NOTICE OF CLAIM FOR DAMAGES—VALIDITY.

The special live stock contract having been signed by both the shipper and the carrier, and this being an intrastate shipment, the stipulation in the contract of affreightment requiring that written notice of a claim for damages be given before the animals were removed or mingled with other stock is reasonable and valid, and is a condition precedent to the right of recovery. Southern Ry. Co. v. Adams, 115 Ga. 705, 42 S. E. 85; Southern Ry. Co. v. Toller-son, 129 Ga. 647, 59 S. E. 799; Roberts v. G. S. & F. Ry., 10 Ga. App. 100, 72 S. E. 942; Mitchell & Co. v. A. C. L., 15 Ga. App. 797, 84 S. E. 227. Such contract stipulation, being a condition precedent to a recovery, must not only be averred, but proved; and although it is held above (paragraph 3) that the averments as to notice were sufficient to meet the demurrer interposed, there is a total lack of proof that any notice, either oral or written, was given before the stock were removed from the car, nor was there any proof whatever to support a waiver of written notice as set out in the petition. The nonsuit was therefore proper.

WATKINS et al. v. STULB & VORHAUER.
(No. 9603.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 14, 1919.)

1. INSANE PERSONS ⇐66, 67, 72, 73—CONTRACTS—CONTRACT BY GUARDIAN.

A person actually insane has no power to contract so as to bind himself or his personal representative merely by virtue of the obligation imposed by the agreement. Contracts on his behalf, in order to be binding as such, must be entered into by his guardian legally appointed after commission sued out. If one who is actually insane, but who has not been legally so adjudged, proceeds to execute a contract, the agreement thus made, when taken by itself alone, while not absolutely void, becomes voidable at the option of his personal representative upon such state of insanity being shown. The mere fact that the other party to the contract was ignorant that the person with whom he was dealing was in fact insane, or even that the existence of such insanity could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable prudence, will not of itself operate to prevent the exercise of such option and privilege on the part of the personal representative. But the contract of one who was insane at the time of the agreement, but who had never been legally so adjudged, ceases to be voidable, and becomes valid and binding whenever it is shown that the obligation has been subsequently ratified, either by the words or the conduct of the contracting party himself during a lucid interval, or by virtue of what amounts to a confirmation on the part of his personal representative. Civ. Code 1910, § 4237; Bunn v. Postell, 107 Ga. 490, 33 S. E. 707; Orr v. Equitable Mortgage Co., 107 Ga. 499, 33 S. E. 706; Weeks v. Reliance Fertilizer Co., 20 Ga. App. 498, 93 S. E. 152 (2). And even where there has been no such actual ratification of a contract thus made, but where there had not only been no adjudication of such fact of insanity, but where the opposite party to the contract was ignorant of the other's disability, and had no reasonable cause to suspect it; and where it is also shown that the contract, fair and reasonable in its terms, was entered upon in all good faith, without fraud or undue influence, and was founded upon a valuable and adequate consideration; and where it is shown that the insane party has actually received the full benefit of the contract, and that the parties cannot be restored to the status quo —the liability under the contract will be upheld, not so much upon the theory of enforcing the promise because it was made in the agreement as upon the idea that the insane party ought not to enjoy the full, adequate, and irrestorable benefit of a contract ordinarily merely voidable, without himself complying with the terms thereof. Wooley v. Gaines, 114 Ga. 122, 124, 39 S. E. 892, 88 Am. St. Rep. 22; 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 625; Flach v. Gottschalk Co., 88 Md. 363, 41 Atl. 908, 42 L. R. A. 745, 71 Am. St. Rep. 418; Memphis National Bank v. Sneed, 97 Tenn. 120, 36 S. W. 716, 34 L. R. A. 274, 56 Am. St. Rep. 788; National Metal Edge Box Co. v. Vanderveer, 85 Vt. 488, 82 Atl. 837, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 343, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 865.

2. QUESTION OF FACT—INSANITY.

Under the evidence submitted, it was an issue of fact whether the defendant was sane or insane at the time he entered upon the original lease, as well as whether he was sane or insane at the time of its subsequent ratification. And under the additional proof submitted and the rulings made in the first headnote, the court did not err in charging the jury as complained of in the fifth ground of the motion for a new trial, nor in refusing the written requests to charge set out in the tenth and fourteenth grounds.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇐127, 185—IMPLIED WARRANTY.

In a lease contract, where there is no stipulation to the contrary, the lessor impliedly warrants that the leased premises shall be open to entry by the lessee at the time fixed for taking possession; and, while the lease takes effect upon its execution, and the right of possession and enjoyment of the leased property is a condition precedent to the right of the lessor to recover the rent, yet, before the lessee can repudiate the contract on the ground that possession was wrongfully withheld from him, he must do something to show that he desires possession. He cannot remain wholly inactive in reference to possession and justly claim that he is wrongfully excluded therefrom by the lessor. The law does not impose upon the lessor the duty of putting the lessee in possession of the leased premises. It demands only that the possession shall not be withheld when the lessee seeks it under the contract. Browder-Manget Co. v. Edmondson, 7 Ga. App. 843, 68 S. E. 453.

4. TRIAL ⇐192—INSTRUCTION—ASSUMPTION OF FACT.

Where in a civil case the undisputed evidence clearly establishes a particular fact, it is not error for the judge, in his charge to the jury, to assume or indicate that the fact has been proved. To do so is not a violation of section 4863 of the Civil Code of 1910. Georgia Railway & Electric Co. v. Cole, 1 Ga. App. 33, 57 S. E. 1028; Dexter Banking Co. v. McCook, 7 Ga. App. 436, 67 S. E. 113; Jones v. Wall, 22 Ga. App. 513, 93 S. E. 344.

5. CHARGE OF COURT.

Under the rulings made in the third and fourth headnotes, the court did not err in charging the jury as complained of in the fourth, sixth, and seventh grounds of the motion for a new trial, for any of the reasons therein stated; nor did the court err in refusing the written requests to charge set out in the ninth, eleventh, and twelfth grounds.

6. TRIAL \Leftrightarrow 260(1)—REQUESTED CHARGES—GIVEN CHARGES.

The thirteenth ground of the motion for a new trial, assigning error upon the alleged refusal of the written request to charge set out in that ground, is without merit, since the principle of law stated therein was given in charge to the jury in almost the identical language of the request. The request to charge set out in the eighth ground was sufficiently covered by the charge of the court.

7. CHARGE OF COURT—APPLICABILITY.

Nor did the court err in refusing the written requests to charge set out in the fifteenth to eighteenth grounds, inclusive, of the motion for a new trial, since the principles of law contained in sections 3576, 4301, 4302, 4303, Civil Code 1910, are not applicable to the facts in this case.

8. WITNESSES \Leftrightarrow 158—COMPETENCY.

The evidence act does not provide that when a suit is defended by the personal representative of a deceased person, the opposite party is an incompetent witness as to independent facts, knowledge of which was not derived from transactions or communications with the deceased. The admission of the testimony objected to in the nineteenth to twenty-fourth grounds, inclusive, of the motion for a new trial was therefore without error. Gomez v. Johnson, 106 Ga. 513, 515, 32 S. E. 600; Parker v. Salmons, 113 Ga. 1167, 39 S. E. 475; Hall v. Hilley, 139 Ga. 13, 76 S. E. 566; Nugent v. Watkins, 129 Ga. 882, 58 S. E. 888; Cato v. Hunt, 112 Ga. 139, 37 S. E. 183.

9. CONTRACTS \Leftrightarrow 11—CAPACITY—STANDARD.

Complaint is made because the court permitted the plaintiffs to introduce in evidence the will of the defendants' decedent, over the objection that it was irrelevant and was not admissible to show mental capacity to contract. Held, the standard of intelligence required to constitute mental capacity to make a will and the amount of mental capacity required to make a contract are not the same, since "an incapacity to contract may coexist with a capacity to make a will." Civil Code 1910, § 3842. But since the judge in his charge explained such distinction by giving in charge this section of the Code, the admission of the evidence, if error, will be treated as harmless. See Neel v. Powell, 130 Ga. 756, 61 S. E. 729.

10. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There was sufficient evidence to support the verdict, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from City Court of Richmond County; J. C. O. Black, Jr., Judge.

Action by Stulb & Vorhauer against Bryan Lawrence, continued after his death, against J. S. Watkins and others, executors.

Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs, motion for new trial overruled, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Sam L. Olive and J. S. Watkins, both of Augusta, for plaintiffs in error.

Callaway & Howard, of Augusta, for defendants in error.

JENKINS, J. Stulb & Vorhauer, plaintiffs in the court below, were the holders of a lease contract from the Glenn Springs Company, of Spartanburg, S. C., of the Glenn Springs Hotel property (which was a summer hotel) for the season of 1915, at a rental of $3,500. On April 1, 1915, this lease was transferred to Bryan Lawrence by a written contract signed by the plaintiffs and by Lawrence, which provided that the lease was to begin on that date and end November 1, 1915. About May 20, 1915, J. H. Milligan, who testified that he had been requested by Bryan Lawrence, prior to April 1st, to operate the hotel for him during the season of 1915, went with Watkins, attorney for Bryan Lawrence, to Glenn Springs, and went over the hotel to ascertain its condition, for the purpose of opening the hotel in June. On their return to Augusta, they notified the plaintiffs that the president of the Glenn Springs Company informed them that the company had never consented to the transfer of the lease to Bryan Lawrence. Thereupon Vorhauer, one of the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs' attorney, went to Glenn Springs, and on May 28, 1915, obtained the written consent of the Glenn Springs Company, for Bryan Lawrence to operate the hotel during the season of 1915, without releasing the plaintiffs from their liability to pay the rent, and on the next day copies of this written consent were delivered to Watkins, the attorney, and Milligan, the agent, of Bryan Lawrence, and about June 1, 1915, Milligan went to Glenn Springs, took charge of the hotel as the agent of Lawrence, and opened and operated it during the summer season of 1915. On June 2, 1915, Bryan Lawrence executed a power of attorney to his son, E. L. Lawrence, empowering him to do any and all things necessary for the operation of the Glenn Springs Hotel during the season of 1915. Bryan Lawrence went to the hospital some time during the month of April, 1915, and was in the hospital most of the time until his death in March, 1916. He died testate, leaving as the executors of his will Joseph S. Watkins, his attorney, and T. J. Morrow. On September 27, 1915, during the lifetime of Bryan Lawrence, the plaintiffs brought suit against him to recover the rental of the hotel, whereupon lunacy proceedings were instituted, and his son, E. L. Lawrence, was appointed as guardian, and filed the defense in this case, setting up:

(1) That Bryan Lawrence was insane at the time of the execution of the alleged contract, and therefore not bound by its terms; and (2) that the plaintiffs failed to deliver the hotel property to Bryan Lawrence, or his agents, at the time specified in the contract, and that this failure to so deliver said hotel relieved Bryan Lawrence of the contract, or, if it did not wholly relieve him of the contract, he was entitled to have credit for whatever damages he suffered by reason of such delayed delivery. Upon the death of Bryan Lawrence his executors were made parties defendant, and upon the trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the full amount sued for. The defendants made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and to this ruling the defendants excepted.

Upon the question as to the plaintiffs' rights under a contract where a plea of insanity had been interposed in behalf of the defendant, the judge charged the jury in substantial accord with the principles of law set forth in the first headnote of this opinion. On each of the issues of fact as made by the evidence upon the several questions thus involved, the jury was authorized to find in favor of the plaintiffs.

[1-10] The rulings made in the headnotes do not require elaboration.

This case is controlled by the ruling made by this court in McAnally v. Bank of Abbeville, 22 Ga. App. 178, 95 S. E. 737, where the facts were similar. It was not error to refuse the grant of a new trial on the ground of the movant's absence on account of sickness at the time the case was tried; it appearing that, even though the movant was represented at the trial, no motion for continuance was then made, and it not being made to appear that the movant was at that time unable, by the exercise of due diligence, to communicate the fact of his illness to the court or his attorney. In this case it appears that the movant had ample opportunity to inform the court or his attorney of his sickness, and failed to do so merely because he was under the impression that the case would not be called. In an ordinary claim case, the claimant is entitled to a verdict in his favor if he shows title in himself, and the question whether or not he is liable to pay the debt on which the execution is founded is not properly triable in the case. The question is not as to the claimant's liability for the debt, but as to his title to the property levied on. He asserts, by filing his claim, merely that the property is not subject to sale under the execution. In such a case, in the absence of a suitable amendment or of proper equitable pleas, the plaintiff in fi. fa. cannot introduce evidence which merely tends to show that in good conscience and equity the claimant is liable for the debt. The defendant in error sued out in the municipal court of Atlanta a possessory warrant against the plaintiffs in error for a certain motor truck, and the judge of the municipal court, on the hearing before him, awarded the possession to the plaintiff, whereupon the defendants, by petition for certiorari, took the case to the superior court, and the certiorari was by that court denied, to which ruling defendants excepted. Held, "in a possessory warrant proceeding there is no question as to the title or as to the right of possession of the property in controversy; the sole question is as to the manner in which the possession was acquired by the defendant." Oaks v. Jenkins, 2 Ga. App. 475, 478, 58 S. E. 897); but where the vendee defaults as to some of the payments, the vendor, as between himself and the vendee, nevertheless has the right, under the contract, so far as mere possession of the property is concerned, to remove it without any legal process (Wilmerding v. Rhodes-Haverty Furniture Co., 122 Ga. 312, 50 S. E. 100); yet where a third person, in good faith and without any notice of such conditional sale contract, has acquired the property from the vendee, and is in possession of it in a quiet, peaceable, and lawful manner, and such possession is taken from him by the vendor, without any legal process and without his consent and against his will, he is entitled to a judgment in his favor in a possessory warrant proceeding instituted by him against the vendor, since the scope of such a proceeding is limited as indicated above. WADE, C. J., and LUKE, J., concur.

On Motion for Rehearing.

JENKINS, J. The defendant in error in this case was the lessee in possession under the vendee when the motor truck was seized without legal process by the original vendor. Under the terms of the lease by which the defendant in error had gone into possession of the truck, mention was made in general terms of certain remaining unpaid purchase-money notes, maturing monthly, due by the vendee to his vendor, and it was agreed as between the lessee and his lessor, the vendee, that these notes should be first satisfied out of any future rental profits derived from the use of the truck, before any portion of such profits should be applied upon a pre-existing debt owing by the vendee to the lessee.

It is urged by counsel for plaintiff in error, the original vendor, that the lessee at that time, and because of such reference, must necessarily have been charged with legal notice, or put upon sufficient inquiry, as to what constituted the terms, stipulations, and conditions of the original sale. It is not contended by plaintiff in error that the lessee, at the time he went into possession of the truck, had any other or different notice of these terms than such as might in this way be implied. The lease contract itself in no way refers to the terms, conditions, and reservations of the original sale; and while the lease makes general reference to the outstanding purchase-money notes as indicated, even the notes themselves in no way purport to state such terms. It is only in still another and different instrument, referred to, not by the lease, but only by the notes, that the terms and conditions of sale are actually set forth.

[4-6] It is the general rule that, where instruments are executed at the same time, for the same purpose, and in the course of the same transaction, they are to be read and construed together; and where a note recites that it is given in pursuance of a specified contract, such recital is sufficient to charge even a purchaser of the note with knowledge of the contract to which such reference is made. Turner Lumber Co. v. Henderson Co., 20 Ga. App. 682 (2), 688, 93 S. E. 301; Glover v. Wesley, 20 Ga. App. 814, 93 S. E. 513. Thus, were it here a question between the original vendor and vendee, or between the maker of the note and a purchaser thereof, as to what constituted the consideration and purport of that obligation, it would manifestly be true that the reference made in the notes to the contemporaneous agreement would be sufficient to require that it, together with the notes themselves, be considered as one instrument, and that they be construed together.

But the issue which is here involved is not one of construction as to what constituted the terms and conditions of the sale as between the original parties to the sale, or as to a party made by the purchase of the notes given under the sale, but the sole and only issue here presented is one of notice to a third party holding possession under an independent lease. The lessee of the truck was neither party nor privy to the original contract of purchase and sale, nor did he ever become such. So far as we are able to say from the record, the lessee had a right to believe that the notes referred to by the lease, and which he had never seen, were ordinary, plain purchase-money notes, without reservation, restriction, special rights, or conditions therein contained. There was no sort of effort to effect a substitution of parties as to the original contract of sale. Even so far as the lessor himself was concerned, the lessee did not undertake to assume that contract or bind himself in regard to its terms and obligations. All that he did do was merely to agree with his lessor that the first rental profits derived from the use of the leased truck should be held back for the benefit of the lessor in an amount sufficient to satisfy the maturing obligations of the lessor.

It would not seem that, merely because he had entered into such a limited and independent agreement with the vendee, and with him alone, that he should be charged with notice, on behalf of the original vendor, of the terms, stipulations, and conditions relative to the original sale, though in nowise stated or referred to in the lease, nor even set forth in the notes to which general reference was made by the lease, and where the reference to the notes by the lease was only for a purpose restricted by the agreement. The lease in no wise attempted, by reference or otherwise, nor for its own purpose was it in any way necessary, to ingraft within itself the independent terms and conditions imposed by the provisions of the anterior sale, and to which the lessee was neither party nor privy, and we cannot say as a matter of law that, simply because he had thus agreed with the vendee to hold back for his benefit certain profits as indicated, diligence required of him, not only to run down the terms of the notes referred to, but also the terms of the separate and independent instrument to which reference was made by the notes, in order to ascertain if perchance the vendor, in his contract made with another party, had seen proper to enter and reserve the extraordinary right, on default of any payment, to seize and possess the property without process at law.

The other cases cited by movant pertain to the right of possession, and this question, as already stated in the first headnote, is not here involved.

Rehearing denied.

GAINESVILLE BUGGY & WAGON CO. v. MORROW et al.MORROW et al. v. GAINESVILLE BUGGY & WAGON CO.

(Nos. 9874, 9875.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 15, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. JUDGES ⇨25(1)—SPECIAL JUDGE—POWERS.

As to the case for which he is chosen, a judge pro hac vice has all the powers and duties which, but for the disqualification, would devolve upon the regular presiding judge of the court, not only with respect to the jury trial of the case, but also with respect to matters of review and appeal and to all other matters therein subsequent to the verdict and judgment. Civ. Code 1910, § 4856; Henderson v. Pope, 39 Ga. 361; Clayton v. Wallace, 41 Ga. 288.

2. NEW TRIAL ⇨113 — MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—TIME—STATUTE.

All applications for a new trial, except in extraordinary cases, must be made during the term at which the trial was had, and within the time prescribed by law. Civ. Code 1910, § 6089. But the clerk is not required to enter such motions upon the minutes of the court, or to treat them otherwise than as pleadings regularly filed in vacation. Civ. Code 1910, § 6080. The presentation and approval of such a motion, together with the rule nisi issued thereon, is an ex parte proceeding. There is no statute prescribing that such steps shall be taken while the trial judge is upon the bench presiding in the same or another case; nor is there any reason known to the law why a motion for a new trial may not be presented, approved, served, and filed, or why any one or more of such steps may not be taken, during a temporary recess of the court, or away from the courthouse as well as at it. King v. Sears, 91 Ga. 577, 18 S. E. 830.

3. CASES DISTINGUISHED.

In view of what is said above, the refusal to dismiss the motion for a new trial was not error. The decision in the case of Norris v. Pollard, 75 Ga. 358(3) is not in point here, because that decision does not relate to the case in which a judge pro hac vice presided, but to a separate and distinct case. Nor is the case of Pendergrass v. Duke, 140 Ga. 550, 79 S. E. 129, here in point, because in that case the judge who was presiding at the time the motion for a new trial was presented, and to whom the motion should have been presented, had also presided at the time the verdict therein complained of was received, and had actually entered the final decree in the case, and his qualification to entertain the motion for a new trial and to issue the rule nisi thereon was unquestioned.

4. RULING ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The evidence authorized the verdict, which has the approval of the trial judge. The charge of the court was, as a whole, full and fair, and for no reason assigned does this court see error requiring a reversal of the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial.

Jan. 15, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⇨94, 99—APPARENT AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

Where one holds another out as his special agent, the principal is bound by the agent's apparent authority to do the particular thing thus authorized, as well as to do any and all things usual and necessary, and to employ all usual and necessary means that may be reasonably required, in the due, proper, and ordinary performance of the particular purpose of the appointment (Civ. Code 1910, § 3595; Bass Co. v. Granite City Co., 119 Ga. 124, 45 S. E. 980 [1]; Raleigh Railroad Co. v. Pullman Co., 122 Ga. 700, 705, 50 S. E. 1008); but a person dealing with such an agent takes the risk as to any extension of the agent's authority beyond that which is thus authorized, and the burden rests upon him to show authority from the principal for any act of the agent which exceeds or transgresses the usual and ordinary acts, such as are reasonably necessary to a due performance of the particular purpose of the agency. Napier v. Strong, 19 Ga. App. 401, 408, 91 S. E. 579 (3).

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⇨101(3), 169(3)—COLLATERAL CONTRACT BY AGENT.

As it was not shown that the collateral contract made by the purchaser with the traveling salesman was a usual and necessary incident to the sale, or that the salesman had authority to make such a contract, it had no binding effect upon the principal; nor would the fact that the seller, after the buyer had apprised him of such unauthorized agreement, proceeded to sell and furnish to the buyer another consignment of the articles of merchandise, have the effect of ratifying the terms of the original unauthorized agreement; it appearing also that, at the time the subsequent sale was made, the seller repudiated the agreement in question, and made shipment of the additional articles without any agreement or understanding, expressed or implied, that the repudiated promise of his agent would be recognized.

1. MOTION TO DISMISS—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

This was a suit for damages growing out of an alleged slander and libel. The petition alleged that, while the plaintiff was a candidate for re-election to a certain municipal office, the defendant caused to be written, printed, and circulated certain false and slanderous statements charging petitioner with having previously cheated, robbed, and defrauded the defendant of certain money which the plaintiff, as the attorney of defendant, had collected for him on a claim growing out of a damage suit. The defendant admitted the publication and circulation of the charge, and pleaded the truth of the charge as justification, and this is the only defense relied upon. Held, the motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions is without merit. Civ. Code 1910, § 6182; Barfield Music House v. Harris, 20 Ga. App. 42, 92 S. E. 402.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐1001(1)—VERDICT—REVIEW.

The verdict, though not demanded, was supported by evidence sufficient to authorize it, and will not be disturbed on the general grounds of the motion for a new trial.

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER ⇐50 — NEW TRIAL ⇐41(3) — CANDIDATE FOR OFFICE — PRIVILEGE—MISLEADING CHARGE.

The fourth ground of the motion for a new trial, as amended, assigns error because the court gave in charge to the jury section 4436 of the Civil Code 1910, except subsection 4. It is contended that, one of these subsections being applicable, it is not cause for a new trial that the judge read in charge to the jury such other parts of the section; it not appearing that the reading of the inapplicable part was calculated to mislead the jury or erroneously affect their verdict, to the prejudice of the complaining party. See Eagle & Phenix Mills v. Herron, 119 Ga. 389, 46 S. E. 405(3). Subsection 6, which is the only portion of the section which it is contended was applicable in the present suit, provides that "comments upon the acts of public men, in their public capacity, and with reference thereto," are privileged communications. Since the defendant could not justify the publication of the alleged libel if it were in fact untrue, on the ground that it was made bona fide and related to the acts of the plaintiff as a public man and in his public capacity, the contention as to the applicability of this subsection, it being the only one thus relied upon, is without merit, and since the charge here complained of might have reasonably misled and confused the jury, to the prejudice of the plaintiff, a new trial must follow as a consequence.

4. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The exception taken in the fifth ground of the motion for a new trial is without substantial merit.

5. LIBEL AND SLANDER ⇐2—GOOD FAITH.

The charge complained of in the sixth ground of the motion for a new trial was not an accurate statement of the law, since the rule is that, unless the communication be a privileged one, the bona fides of the motive, purpose, and intent of the person publishing the libel is not involved. In other and different portions of the charge, the correct rule seems to have been clearly indicated, without, however, undertaking to correct the inaccuracy here referred to. See, in this connection, Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Deas, 22 Ga. App. 425, 96 S. E. 267.

6. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The exception taken in the seventh ground of the motion for a new trial is without merit.

Where a purchaser of a promissory note has actual notice that the note was given for the purchase of stock in an incorporated company, and sold by an agent, traveling salesman, or promoter, such notice is just as effective to put the purchaser of the note on notice that he is taking it subject to the equities existing between the original parties thereto as if the consideration of the note had been expressed in the face of the note. SHAPLEIGH HARDWARE CO. v. MCCOY & SON. (No. 9840.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 15, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)PARTNERSHIP \S 34—LIABILITY—ESTOPPEL.

One who tacitly permits himself to be held out to the public as a partner, though he in fact has no interest in the partnership, will be estopped from denying his connection with the firm, and will be bound, where the opposite party was misled by the putative status and acted thereon. Civ. Code 1910, § 3157; Bowie v. Maddox, 29 Ga. 285, 74 Am. Dec. 61; Am. Cotton College v. Newspaper Union, 138 Ga. 147, 74 S. E. 1084 (4); Mims v. Brook, 3 Ga. App. 247, 59 S. E. 711; Meinhard v. Bedingfield, 4 Ga. App. 176, 61 S. E. 34. Thus, where a person knows that his name is being used as that of a member of a firm, and that he is being held out as a partner in a particular business, he is not only under the duty to prohibit such use, but it is also incumbent upon him to take such steps as an ordinarily prudent person would take in the circumstances to notify the public, as well as individuals to whom he knows that he has been so held out as a partner, that he is not a partner. 30 Cyc. 393, 394.

Suit by the Shapleigh Hardware Company against McCoy & Son, composed of R. L. McCoy and B. L. McCoy. Verdict against defendant B. L. McCoy, and in favor of R. L. McCoy. Plaintiff's motion for a new trial was overruled, and it brings error. Reversed.

Wm. Woodrum, of Millen, for plaintiff in error.

Jas. A. Dixon, of Millen, for defendants in error.

JENKINS, J. Suit on an account for goods furnished was brought against McCoy & Son, as a partnership composed of R. L. McCoy and B. L. McCoy. B. L. McCoy filed no answer. R. L. McCoy filed an answer, wherein he denied the indebtedness, and set up a plea of no partnership. Upon the trial of the case the jury returned a verdict against B. L. McCoy, and in favor of R. L. McCoy. The plaintiff made a motion for new trial on the usual general grounds only, which was overruled, and exception was taken.

While the evidence adduced upon the trial of the case was sufficient to authorize a finding that the defendant R. L. McCoy had no interest in the partnership, he admitted and testified that he learned in January, 1916, that his son, B. L. McCoy, was using his name and holding him out as a member of the firm of McCoy & Son, and that he burned all the bill heads he could find with the name of McCoy & Son on them, and instructed his son not to use his name. He further testified, however:

"I never made any effort to publish in any newspaper that I was not a member of that firm. I never made any effort to find out who were the creditors of the firm. * * * I never made any effort to notify any one."

The traveling salesman of the plaintiff testified:

"Before I sold these goods to McCoy & Son, I saw a sign on the front of their place there, 'McCoy & Son.' * * * I have never received any notice that R. L. McCoy was not a partner. I never did receive any written notice of a dissolution of the firm of McCoy & Son. I sold the goods upon the faith of R. L. McCoy being a partner. * * * As soon as I saw this dissolution notice in the paper, I wired the company—we had a shipment ready for them then—I wired the company to hold shipment back; they did, and paid the freight back on it to St. Louis."

This testimony in behalf of the plaintiff was undisputed. The evidence does show that the following notice was published in the official organ of the county by the defendant, B. L. McCoy:

"Dissolution Notice. Notice is hereby given that the firm of McCoy & Son, heretofore engaged in the business of general automobile service station and electrical supplies and wiring, in the city of Millen, state of Georgia, is this day dissolved by mutual consent; R. L. McCoy retiring therefrom. The business will be conducted in the same place as the Ford Service station, with B. L. McCoy, manager, who will settle all firm liabilities and receipt for all debts due the firm. This the first day of June, 1916. [Signed] R. L. McCoy, B. L. McCoy."

The notice thus published is dated June 1, 1916, but the evidence shows that the goods furnished to defendants, for the purchase price of which the present suit was instituted, were furnished during the months of March, April, and May, 1916.

Applying to the facts above stated the principles of law stated in the headnote, we think the evidence demanded a finding in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant R. L. McCoy, and that the court therefore erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

1. REFUSAL OF CONTINUANCE.

It does not appear from the record that the trial judge abused his broad discretion in refusing a continuance or a postponement of the case.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §1178—GROUND OF MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—ABANDONMENT.

The second special ground of the motion for a new trial, complaining of the exclusion of certain testimony, not having been argued in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, is treated as abandoned.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §1178—GROUND OF MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—ABANDONMENT.

While several excerpts from the charge of the court are excepted to in the amendment to the motion for a new trial, these excerpts are not referred to in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, but the only complaint in their brief, so far as the charge is concerned, is that the entire charge was erroneous; and there is no such exception in the amendment to the motion for a new trial. Under such circumstances the grounds of the motion for a new trial complaining of such excerpts will be treated as abandoned, and the correctness of the charge as a whole will not be passed upon.

The grounds of the motion for a new trial which have the approval of the trial judge do not show material error in the admission of testimony. The charge of the court is subject to some slight criticism, because of inapt expressions, but, upon the whole, was full, and submitted the issues to the jury, and could not have misled the jury in such a way as to work injury to the plaintiff. The evidence, though conflicting, authorized the verdict, which has the approval of the trial judge. There is no error or harm shown to the plaintiff by reason of the rulings upon the demurrers to the answer of the defendant. For none of the reasons assigned did the court err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

FANNIN COUNTY v. DAVES. (No. 9935.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 14, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)COUNTIES ~~vs~~ 98(1) — COUNTY TREASURERS —LIABILITY OF SURETY.

This case was tried by the judge without a jury upon the following agreed statement of fact: "Fannin county, by its ordinary, G. A. Curtis, and J. M. Daves, by his attorneys of record, agree that the following statement of facts are true: That M. K. McKinney was elected county treasurer of Fannin county, Ga., for the years 1913 and 1914; that on January 1, 1913, he entered upon the discharge of the duties of such, and discharged the duties of said office of county treasurer of said county for said years, going out of office on the 31st day of December, 1914. That he was succeeded on the 1st day of January, 1915, by R. H. Wheeler as county treasurer. That J. M. Daves signed the bond of the said M. K. McKinney along with certain other persons as securities, and said bond was signed by the said M. K. McKinney as principal. Said bond was made payable to A. S. J. Hall, ordinary of said county, and his successors in office, and was sealed by both principal and securities as required by law, and dated November 9, 1912, and was attested and approved by A. S. J. Hall, ordinary, on November 14, 1912, and was recorded in the office of the ordinary of said county, together with his oath of office as required by law. Said bond recited that said M. K. McKinney was elected county treasurer for the years 1913 and 1914, and further recited as follows: 'Now, the condition of the above obligation is such that if the said M. K. McKinney shall faithfully discharge all and singular the duties required of him by virtue of his said office as county treasurer of said county, as aforesaid, during the time he continues therein, or discharges any of the duties thereof, then the above obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and virtue.' And that said bond was a legal bond required by law of county treasurers. That on the 11th day of January, 1915, after the said M. K. McKinney had retired from office, and while R. H. Wheeler was county treasurer, the said R. H. Wheeler as such county treasurer made and signed and delivered to M. K. McKinney the following check: 'The North Georgia National Bank, Blue Ridge, Ga., January 11, 1915. Pay to the order of M. K. McKinney retiring treasurer, $338.08, three hundred thirty-six and 08/100 dollars, balance on commissions for 1914. R. H. Wheeler, County Treasurer. No. 1.' On the back of said check there appears the indorsement of the said M. K. McKinney. And that the said M. K. McKinney received the amount of said check out of county money collected for county purposes for the year 1914 and due and owing to said county. And that the said M. K. McKinney thus received out of such county funds collected for county for said year the sum of $156.75 in excess of the legal fees and commissions due him as such county treasurer for the year 1914. It is further agreed that no order was issued by the ordinary of said county authorizing the issuance of said check and the receiving of said county money, and that there does not appear upon the records or minutes of court in the office of the ordinary of said county any order, writing, or statement which shows any final settlement between the county of Fannin and the said M. K. McKinney as required by sections 586 and 587 of the Civil Code of 1910. It is therefore agreed between the parties in the above-stated case that the said entitled case be submitted upon the agreed statement of facts to his honor, N. A. Morris, judge of the superior court of said county, for determination upon the law and the facts without the intervention of a jury, and that either party shall have the right to except to the judgment of the court rendered therein and to carry said case to the Court of Appeals by a direct bill of exceptions. It is further agreed that in the event said court has not sufficient time to consider and dispose of said case on this day, he may take the same under advisement and render his judgment later, to which neither party shall take exception."

Held, the court did not err in sustaining the affidavit of illegality. The agreed statement of facts shows that the money received by McKinney was not received by him as and while treasurer of the county, but was received after his term of office had expired and when his successor was discharging the duties of that office. The payment to him was the voluntary act of the county treasurer who succeeded him. The surety on the bond, Daves, is not by reason of any obligation in the bond, liable to the county for the money thus received by his principal, McKinney. See McDonald v. Bradshaw, 2 Ga. 248, 46 Am. Dec. 385; Civ. Code 1910, § 3540.

1. NEW TRIAL \Leftrightarrow 68—RAILROADS \Leftrightarrow 350(5)—GROUND—VERDICT CONTRARY TO EVIDENCE—INJURY AT CROSSING.

The following facts made out a case peculiarly for determination by the jury, and their verdict is conclusive, so far as the general grounds of the motion for a new trial are concerned: Plaintiff was, on the day of the injury, driving an automobile on the highway in the city of Macon, and in the direction of a public crossing intersected by several lines of track, where the defendant company had stationed a flagman to warn travelers of approaching trains, etc., and, just as plaintiff drove up to and upon said crossing the said flagman ordered him to stop, which he did as quickly as possible, causing his machine to come to a standstill upon and across one of the defendant's lines of track. After so stopping his machine in obedience to said order, the flagman ordered him to go back, but before he was able to move his car he was again ordered to go forward, and in this state of confusion, upon observing a train in close proximity and running upon the track on which his automobile was standing, he speedily removed himself from the car, in order to save his life, but the train continued on its way, and struck his car, and completely destroyed it.

ARMOUR FERTILIZER WORKS v. DASHER. (No. 9675.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. Jan. 14, 1919.)

1. TRIAL \Leftrightarrow 251(5)—INSTRUCTIONS—ISSUES.

Plaintiff in error complains that the court erred in not confining his charge to the issues made by the pleadings, in that the court injected into the case an issue as to whether or not the defendant paid the purchase price of the fertilizer in question to one J. F. Stapler as the agent of the plaintiff, whereas the only issues between the parties, according to the pleadings, were whether the defendant purchased the same amount and brand of fertilizer described in the petition from said Stapler as an individual, and whether he had paid Stapler therefor—no plea having been filed by defendant alleging that he had made any payment to Stapler as the agent of the plaintiff. Although the pleadings do not raise the issue of agency (it being merely alleged that the fertilizer was purchased from and payment made to Stapler in his individual capacity), nevertheless the charge of the court on this subject was not erroneous, in view of the admission in open court by the defendant that the fertilizer in controversy was bought from Stapler as the agent of the plaintiff corporation, and that payment therefor was made to him in that capacity. It was not incumbent upon defendant to recast his plea in this particular.

2. CHARGE OF COURT.

The complaint that the charge of the court is too indefinite to make it clear whether the defendant admitted that he purchased the fertilizer from Stapler as agent of the plaintiff or as an individual is without merit.

3. SUBMISSION OF ISSUES—FINDINGS.

The several assignments of error complaining that the identity of the fertilizer alleged to have been paid for by the defendant was not established are without merit. This issue was fairly submitted to the jury, and there was evidence to sustain their finding that the payment made was for the particular fertilizer involved.

4. TRIAL \S 85—OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE—PARTIAL ADMISSIBILITY.

Certain testimony of the witness Jones was objected to as a whole, and since upon examination it appears that a part of it at least was admissible, under the repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court, the action of the trial judge in overruling the objection thereto will not be controlled. Birmingham Lumber Co. v. Brinson, 94 Ga. 517, 20 S. E. 437 (1); Sweeney v. Sweeney, 119 Ga. 76, 46 S. E. 76, 100 Am. St. Rep. 159(3); Southern Ry. Co. v. Hill, 139 Ga. 549, 77 S. E. 803; Strickland v. Sturtevant, 20 Ga. App. 474, 93 S. E. 155(3).

5. WITNESSES \S 158, 159(3)—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT—STATUTE.

The assignments of error objecting to portions of defendant's testimony as being inhibited by Civ. Code 1910, § 5858, are without merit. The destruction, after its payment of the note, given to the First National Bank, was not a transaction with the deceased agent. See Puryear v. Foster, 91 Ga. 444, 448, 18 S. E. 316. And the other circumstances testified to by the defendant were independent facts, not involving any communication or transaction with the deceased agent.

6. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—CHARGE.

There was evidence to support the verdict returned, the charge of the court fairly submitted all issues to the jury, and the numerous special assignments of error are without such substantial merit as to require a reversal.

1. CARRIERS \S 84(1½)—FAILURE TO DELIVER GOODS—VENUE.

The petition as amended showed an action ex contractu against the defendant railway company for its failure to deliver property at Toccoa, Ga., the property having been delivered to the railway company at Macon, Ga., for shipment; and the courts of Bibb county had jurisdiction of the suit. Central Railroad Co. v. Co., 7 Ga. App. 542, 67 S. E. 272.

2. DEMURRER TO PETITION.

The petition as amended was not subject to any ground of the demurrer interposed.

3. CARRIERS \S 83 — DELIVERY OF GOODS — SURRENDER OF BILL OF LADING.

A provision in a bill of lading requiring the surrender of the original order bill of lading, properly indorsed, before the delivery of the shipment, does not operate solely for the protection of the carrier. This provision is likewise for the protection of the shipper, and prohibits the carrier from delivering the property until the bill of lading is properly indorsed. First National Bank v. Oregon-Washington R. R. & Nav. Co., 25 Idaho, 58, 136 Pac. 798; Judson v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. R. Co., 131 Minn. 5, 154 N. W. 506.

4. CARRIERS \S 82, 83—DELIVERY OF GOODS—INDORSEMENT OF BILL OF LADING.

Where an "order notify" bill of lading contains a provision requiring the surrender of the original order bill of lading, properly indorsed, the fact that the shipper, by mistake, sends the original bill of lading (instead of the memorandum bill of lading) direct to the order notify party, but sends it undorsed, does not relieve the carrier from requiring it to be properly indorsed before it delivers the shipment to the order notify party; and where, under such circumstances, the carrier so delivers the property, without requiring such indorsement, and the "order notify" party obtains the shipment, and subsequently becomes insolvent, without having paid the purchase price of the property, the principle of law that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer for the act of a third person, he who puts it in the power of the third person to inflict the injury must bear the loss, is not applicable. The antecedent error of the shipper in sending the original bill of lading to the order notify party did not put it in the power of that party to inflict the injury, as its possession of the undorsed bill of lading did not vest it with any apparent right to the property. The loss resulted from the negligence of the carrier in failing to require the proper indorsement of the bill of lading. Wey- and v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Ry. Co., 75 Iowa, 573, 39 N. W. 899, 1 L. R. A. 650, 9 Am. St. Rep. 504.

5. CARRIERS — 83—DELIVERY OF GOODS—INDORSEMENT OF BILL OF LADING—LIABILITY.

The Massee & Felton Lumber Company, at Macon, Ga., delivered to the defendant railway company a car of lumber consigned to the order of the shipper at Toccoa, Ga., with instruction to notify the Georgia Furniture Company, at the latter place. An "order notify" bill of lading was executed in triplicate, and signed by both the shipper and the railway company, and contained the following provision: "The surrender of this original order bill of lading properly indorsed shall be required before the delivery of the property." The three copies of the bill of lading were practically the same, with the exception that one was headed "Order Bill of Lading—Original," another was headed "Memorandum Bill of Lading," and the third was headed "Shipping Order." The original and memorandum bills of lading were delivered by the railway company to the shipper, and the shipping order was retained by the railway company. Through an error of a clerk in the office of the lumber company, the original bill of lading, unindorsed, was mailed direct to the Georgia Furniture Company at Toccoa (the "notify party" in the bill of lading), and the memorandum bill of lading, indorsed on the back thereof by the lumber company, was attached to a draft by that company on the furniture company, for the purchase price of the car of lumber, and the draft with the memorandum bill of lading, so indorsed, was deposited by the lumber company in a bank at Macon, Ga., and transmitted by that bank to the Bank of Toccoa, Ga., the residence of the furniture company. The defendant railway company had no actual knowledge of the drawing or forwarding of this draft. The Georgia Furniture Company, upon receiving the original bill of lading, carried it to the agent of the Southern Railway Company at Toccoa, and on the demand of the furniture company upon the agent and the presentation and surrender of the original bill of lading, unindorsed, the lumber was delivered by the railway company to the furniture company. The furniture company was put in bankruptcy subsequent to the delivery of the lumber to it by the railway company. The draft attached to the memorandum bill of lading was never paid, and, together with this memorandum bill of lading, was returned to the lumber company, which has never been paid anything by the Georgia Furniture Company for the lumber. Held, that the railway company, in delivering the lumber to the furniture company, upon its presentation of the original bill of lading, unindorsed, breached its contract with the shipper and became liable to it in damages for the value of the lumber. American National Bank v. Lee, 124 Ga. 863, 53 S. E. 268; Southern Railway Co. v. Strozler, 10 Ga. App. 157, 73 S. E. 42; Weyand v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Ry. Co., 75 Iowa, 573, 39 N. W. 899, 1 L. R. A. 650, 9 Am. LYNCHBURG SHOE CO. v. DANIEL
(No. 9612.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 14, 1918.)

1. EVIDENCE — 432, 437—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONTRACT.

As between the original parties, the consideration of a contract is ordinarily open to inquiry for the purpose of showing, either that the consideration was originally illegal, and for this reason the promise so predicated was void, or that the consideration has subsequently failed in whole or in part, so as no longer to support the promise as made. If such be the real purport and intent of the plea, there results no infringement of the rule which forbids the variance by parol of the expressed terms of a written instrument. It is only when a defendant, under the guise of seeking to inquire into the consideration, is in fact using such privilege merely as a pretext, for the purpose of varying the written terms of the promise itself, that the inhibition of the parol evidence rule becomes applicable. Rheney v. Anderson, 96 S. E. 217.

2. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — 89—DEFENSES—MISREPRESENTATIONS.

Thus, in a suit against a surety on a promissory note, his plea, setting up that he was induced to sign the note by the false and fraudulent representations of the plaintiff's agent that, in consideration of the defendant signing as surety, the plaintiff would proceed to furnish to the principal, a mercantile business, additional goods in a named amount, which promise the plaintiff had failed and refused to perform, and which failure resulted in injury, and increased the risk and hazard to defendant, was not subject to general demurrer. Marchman v. Robertson, 77 Ga. 40. What was said by this court in the case of McKee v. Hurst, 21 Ga. App. 571. 94 S. E. 886, is not in conflict with the holding here made, since that ruling was based upon the idea that the surety in subsequently renewing the notes waived any such defense, he being estopped by reason of his knowledge then had of the facts, or by his negligence in failing to know them.

3. NEW TRIAL ⇨70 — GROUNDS — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There was evidence sustaining the defendant's plea, and the judgment of the trial court, overruling the motion for a new trial, cannot be disturbed on the theory that the verdict was contrary to the evidence.

APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨979(3)—ABUSE OF DISCRETION IN OVERRULING MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—REVERSAL.

Where a trial judge, in overruling a motion for a new trial based on the general grounds only, fails to exercise that discretion with which he is charged by law, on proper exception, this court is compelled to reverse the judgment, unless the evidence demanded the verdict.

Error from City Court of Macon; Du Pont Guerrey, Judge.

Suit by the Cotton States Seed & Fertilizer Company against the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company. Verdict for defendant, plaintiff's motion for new trial overruled, plaintiff excepts, and defendant takes a cross-bill of exceptions. Reversed on main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on the cross-bill of exceptions.

Miller & Jones and Warren Grice, all of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Jesse Harris, Minter Wimberly, and Chas. Akerman, all of Macon, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. The Cotton States Seed & Fertilizer Company sued the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company for damages alleged to have been occasioned by the negligence of the defendant. The petition alleged that the plaintiff was a fertilizer factory on the outskirts of the city of Macon, with its plant located on the low lands of the Ocmulgee river, upstream from the defendant's railroad embankment, over which its tracks approach and cross the Ocmulgee river below the plant of the plaintiff. Around the property of the plaintiff there had been erected a levee sufficient to keep out the water in ordinary freshets. The railroad embankment filled up the natural drains and outlets of the river in times of freshet, and, by impeding and preventing the overflow waters, backed them up on the plaintiff's property, and caused them to overflow its levee, and occasioned the damage sued for. The water which inundated the plaintiff's plant was an ordinary freshet, and, had it not been for the impounding of the water by the defendant, the damage would not have been done. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial, based on general grounds. The court overruled the motion, and, as a part of such order overruling and denying the motion, filed an opinion. To this order the plaintiff excepts upon the ground that the evidence demanded a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and upon the ground that the court, in the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial, did not exercise that discretion with which the trial judge is charged by law.

1. The order of the trial judge in overruling the motion for a new trial is as follows:

"The movant alleges in its petition that the freshet, the waters of which it says were obstructed by the defendant's embankment, so as to cause the overflow and injury of its property, was an ordinary freshet. The defendant denied this allegation in its answer, and pleaded that the freshet was extraordinary and unprecedented. There was evidence strongly supporting each contention, and the court, in its instructions on this issue, gave the petitioner the full benefit of its contention, and the court cannot say that the finding of the jury thereon is without sufficient evidence to support it, or strongly and decidedly against the weight of the evidence. While, under the pleadings and issues thereby made, the court may not have been authorized to do so, it instructed the jury in this connection as follows: 'If the freshet was extraordinary and unprecedented, but would not for this reason have overflowed and damaged the plaintiff's property without being obstructed by defendant's embankment, and defendant's embankment did obstruct such freshet, and thereby caused it to overflow and damage the plaintiff's property when it would not have been otherwise damaged, the defendant is liable.' The court believed during the trial, and now believes, that the petitioner's right of recovery on this theory was shown by a preponderance of the evidence, but the court cannot say that the verdict of the jury to the contrary is without sufficient evidence to support it, or strongly and decidedly against the weight of the evidence. The court was during the trial, and is now, of the opinion, from the evidence, that while the waters of the freshet were detained by the defendant's embankment, and were thereby finally ponded around three sides of petitioner's levee, so that they rose to the point where some of them ran over its western levee and over the gate in the switchway through its southern or front levee, and must have increased the depth of submergence and the extent of the damages, the breaking through of the waters at these points was not chiefly the result of the pressure of ponded water, but of the violence of the waters flowing from the river through the crevasses of the city's levee which they made, and through the trestle of the old Macon & Augusta (or Central) Railroad embankment against the western levee of petitioner, where it broke at a point much in the line of said waters after they rose high enough to reach said levee, and against the gate, sandbags and abutments at the switch entrance in the southern levee of petitioner, while the waters in that vicinity were passing violently through what must have been a gorge between the petitioner's levee and the defendant's embankment. Possibly the court should have instructed the jury on this theory of increased overflow and damages, and in doing so have charged them on the subject of nominal and general damages, but there was no request or claim or contention on the subject, the petitioner asking the special damages sued for only, and it did not occur to the court to give instructions in relation thereto.

"Petitioner, in paragraph 11 of the petition, avers 'that the entire injury and damage it has suffered by reason of said freshet was caused solely by the faulty construction and maintenance of the defendant's roadway embankment, and that petitioner was wholly without fault in regard thereto, and could not have avoided, even by the exercise of extraordinary diligence, the result of the wrongdoing on the part of the defendant.' This paragraph the defendant denied in its answer, and the court cannot say that the verdict of the jury in its favor was without evidence to support it, or strongly and decidedly against the weight of the evidence. The two great causes of the catastrophe were the breaks through the city's levee by the waters of the freshet, and their subsequent detention by the defendant's embankment. The court cannot say, as a matter of law or fact, the latter was the proximate cause. The waters overflowed the gate in the switchway, but never overflowed the petitioner's southern levee through which the switchway entered, and which was higher than the gate, and the petitioner was at least equally responsible for the existence of the switchway. Whether the switchway precipitated or increased the overflow of petitioner's property, or did both, or whether, if the switchway had not been there, the overflow of the petitioner's western levee at the break therein or elsewhere would have increased or diminished the overflow of petitioner's property, are questions that are very problematical. Although there was much discussion thereof during the trial, there was not in the pleadings any reference to the evident fact that the great mass of the waters of the freshet which overflowed petitioner's property and vicinity escaped from the river through the two crevasses in the city's levee, which, together with the petitioner's river levee and the river levees of other owners below, and a portion of the Macon & Augusta embankment, extended from the front of the city's park to the defendant's embankment, and constituted one continuous river levee. While it is true that, prior to the construction of this levee many years ago, the waters of the river in times of ordinary freshet, as well as in times of extraordinary freshet, must have overflowed the lowlands described, and had established drains through the same, it did not appear that such had been the case since 1900, or definitely so since the construction of the river levee, except in 1916, when the alleged freshet occurred, and in 1913, during another freshet, and on both of these occasions the overflow occurred by means of breaks through the river levee, when, according to the record of highwater marks of the river kept at Macon by the United States government, covering the period from 1900 to 1916, inclusive, that of 1916 reached 23.1 feet, and that of 1913 23.6 feet, the lowest stage in the record being 18 feet in 1906. It appears from the evidence that the freshet in dispute, that of 1916, was larger and more violent and destructive than that of 1913, at and upon the property of petitioner and vicinity, although its high-water mark at Macon was five-tenths of a foot lower. The defendant constructed its embankment in 1912, and the question of its negligence should be determined in the light of the conditions at that time and in view of the notice it may have then had of the dangers of the situation with reference to the petitioner's property and its own. The defendant, probably relying upon the existing system of river levees as safe for all concerned, apparently provided culverts in its embankment for surface water only; whereas it is also apparent that the petitioner did not rely upon the river levees only, as it had additional levees of its own for the further or ultimate protection of its property, and the defendant had notice of this fact through the obvious presence of the same.

"Did the defendant under all the circumstances, have the right, when it built its embankment, to rely upon the river levees and the levees of the petitioner so far as the property of the petitioner was concerned? If it did not have such right, and it nevertheless did so, and such security proved inadequate, and the disaster occurred partly for this reason and partly for the reason that the waters could not escape through the culverts of defendant's embankment, because they were inadequate for the purpose, was the defendant thereby guilty of negligence, making it liable for the damages that ensued? Georgia Railroad Co. v. Bohler, 98 Ga. 188, 26 S. E. 739. If conditions and structures partly natural and partly artificial are safe for adjoining and neighboring landowners while operative, and some person should contribute another structure, and the then existing conditions and structures should cause damage to one of such owners, which would not have occurred without the co-operation of the added structure, such person would be liable. In this case, however, if the existing conditions and structures on which defendant relied had all remained operative, the overflow and damage to the petitioner's property would not have occurred by means of the defendant's embankment or otherwise; that is to say, if the river levee had performed its function. This being true, which was the proximate cause—the breaking of the freshet through the river levee, or its inability to break through the defendant's embankment? While the continuation of the river levees, including a part of the Macon & Augusta Railroad and the river levees of the petitioner and the owners below, as well as that of the city, may have been a system as to the petitioner, it may not have been as to the city. The petitioner was evidently enjoying the protection of it as a system, but the city had connected its levee, not with petitioner's levee, or any other levee, but with the Macon & Augusta embankment, and was not concerned beyond that, and may not have been responsible to landowners below and outside the city limits, for that or other reasons, for a failure, if any, to properly maintain its levee and the consequent injury. Savannah, Florida & Western Railway Co. v. Lawton, 75 Ga. 192. According to the verdict the defendant is not liable, and according to the preceding view the city is not liable, or may not be liable, because it is a municipal corporation. It therefore seems that the petitioner, notwithstanding the fact that it has suffered serious damages, without any fault on its part, and without responsibility on the part of others, because of the absence of wrong intent and culpable negligence on their part, is without remedy and right against any one whomsoever. The jury probably believed that the freshet was extraordinary and unprecedented, an act of God, and left the parties where the freshet left them, the petitioner with its damaged levees, machinery and material, and the defendant with its broken embankment; and the court cannot say that their verdict is without sufficient evidence to support it, or strongly and decidedly against the weight of the evidence. The court is not presuming to enlighten the court of review, but is seeking to take its judgment refusing a new trial away from the general principles and presumptions in its favor, by exposing its controlling error or errors, if any, so that it or they may be detected and corrected by reversal. The motion to set aside the verdict and judgment and grant a new trial is refused."

In view of the statement of the trial judge in his order, we are constrained to hold that there is no such unqualified approval of the finding of the jury by the court as convinces us that the trial judge exercised that discretion with which he is by law charged, in passing upon the motion for a new trial in this case. As was said by Judge Powell in Walters v. State, 6 Ga. App. 565, 65 S. E. 357:

"If the judge meant to say that the verdict of the jury had convinced his mind and conscience of the defendant's guilt, the approval is sufficient; but if he meant to say that he did not have the power to set it aside, or that there was no duty upon him to set it aside if his mind and conscience were not convinced of the defendant's guilt, then the approval is insufficient. Before the verdict of the jury becomes final it should, where the defendant requires it by a motion for a new trial, receive the approval of the mind and conscience of one more man—the trial judge. Until all 13, the 12 jurors and the judge, agree upon the prisoner's guilt, his conviction is not legally final. The finding of the jury is not binding on the judge. It may be, and for the most part should be, highly persuasive upon him; but he is authorized to set it aside, and indeed is under the duty of doing so if he does not approve of it as a finding of fact."

See, also, Livingston v. Taylor, 132 Ga. 7, 9, 61 S. E. 694; Thompson v. Warren, 118 Ga. 644, 45 S. E. 912; McIntyre v. McIntyre, 120 Ga. 67, 47 S. E. 501, 102 Am. St. Rep. 71, 1 Ann. Cas. 169.

2. We have carefully examined the crossbill of exceptions, and are of the opinion that the trial court committed no error in any of the rulings complained of therein.

3. The defendant in error in its brief requests that, if this court should be of the opinion that the trial judge did not exercise his discretion in passing upon the motion for a new trial, the judgment be not unqualifiedly reversed, but that the case be returned to the court below, with direction that the judge pass upon the motion in the exercise of his legal discretion. The defendant in error relies upon the decision in Central Railway Co. v. O'Kelly, 16 Ga. App. 594, 85 S. E. 938 (3). We do not think that the O'Kelly Case is precedent for the request. In the O'Kelly case a motion for a new trial had been overruled, and the judgment was affirmed by the appellate court, and after such affirmance a motion for a new trial was made, upon extraordinary grounds, and the trial court determined that it had no jurisdiction to pass upon the motion. This court simply held that the trial court did have jurisdiction, and the motion was returned to the trial court with direction that it pass upon the case in the exercise of that discretion with which it was charged by law.

4. We do not mean to intimate that the verdict in this case was wrong, or that there was not evidence upon which it might stand. The reversal of the order of the trial judge, overruling and denying the motion for a new trial, is solely upon the ground that in his order and opinion, taken altogether, he did not unqualifiedly approve the finding of the jury.

Judgment reversed on the main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on the cross-bill.

1. EVIDENCE \S 71, 89—PARTNERSHIP \S 296
(3)—DISSOLUTION NOTICE—PRESUMPTION OF RECEIPT.

The testimony was sufficient to authorize the finding that a notice of dissolution of partnership, such as would relieve the defendant from liability on the claim sued on, had been sent to and was received by the plaintiff. While the mailing of such a notice, properly stamped and directed, raises only a presumption of its receipt (Bush v. McCarty Co., 127 Ga. 308, 311, 312, 56 S. E. 430, 9 Ann. Cas. 240), and while this presumption may be entirely overcome by the undisputed evidence of the addressee that the letter was never received (Hamilton v. Stewart, 108 Ga. 472, 476, 34 S. E. 123; Cassel v. Randall, 10 Ga. App. 587, 73 S. E. 858), still, in this case, proof to the effect that the plaintiff had subsequently proceeded against the other partner in bankruptcy by proving the claim in dispute as an individual liability of that partner for goods "sold and delivered to the bankrupt [that is the other partner] at his special instance and request," together with other corroborative testimony as to the conduct of the plaintiff tending to indicate such notice, furnished sufficient corroboration to sustain the finding in accordance with the presumption raised by the defendant's testimony as to the sending of the notice. Strauss v. Pearlman, 15 Ga. App. 86, 87, 82 S. E. 578; Parker v. Southern Ruralist Co., 15 Ga. App. 334, 337, 83 S. E. 158.

2. CERTIORARI \S 57, 64(1)—PETITION—REQUISITES.

A petition for certiorari "shall plainly and distinctly set forth the errors complained of." Civ. Code 1910, \S 5183; Callaway v. Atlanta, 6 Ga. App. 354, 64 S. E. 1105. "No ground of error shall be insisted upon, on the hearing, which is not distinctly set forth in the petition" (Civ. Code 1910, \S 5199), and questions not referred to in the petition cannot be considered by either the superior court or by this court (Fouche v. Morris, 112 Ga. 143, 37 S. E. 182; Perry v. Brunswick Railway Co., 119 Ga. 819, 47 S. E. 172). Thus the assignment of error that, "after the introduction of the evidence as related heretofore the court took this case under advisement, and did thereafter render judgment in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff, without announcing the said judgment in open court as provided by section 224 [Act 1913, p. 167, \S 42 (a)] of the act creating the municipal court of Atlanta," does not present the question as to whether or not the court failed to notify the parties or their counsel of the time when such judgment would be rendered; and since the answer of the trial judge does not verify the assignment as actually made, but, to the contrary, says that he did announce said judgment in open court, this assignment of error cannot be considered. Shirling v. Kennon, 119 Ga. 501, 46 S. E. 630; Stephens v. Barnes, 11 Ga. App. 491, 75 S. E. 827. See, also, in this connection, Hays v. Philadelphia, etc., Railroad Co., 99 Md. 413, 58 Atl. 439.

1. BILLS AND NOTES §370 — RIGHTS OF PAYEE OF ACCEPTED BILL.

"The payee of an accepted bill, who has paid value to the drawer before maturity, is not concerned with the consideration as between drawer and acceptor. He holds the bill unaffected by equities in favor of the acceptor against the drawer." Flournoy v. First National Bank, 79 Ga. 810, 2 S. E. 547 (2).

2. EVIDENCE §420(7)—PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING TERMS OF ACCEPTANCE.

In the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake being set up, parol evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of an acceptance which is absolute and unconditional on its face, by showing that it was in fact intended to be based upon a condition. Heaverin v. Donnell, 7 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 244, 45 Am. Dec. 302; Ray v. Morgan, 112 Ga. 923, 38 S. E. 335; Rheney v. Anderson, 22 Ga. App. 417, 96 S. E. 217.

3. ASSIGNMENTS §49—BANKS AND BANKING §140(1) — UNACCEPTED CHECK — EFFECT—NONPAYMENT—RIGHT OF ACTION.

"An unaccepted check, drawn in the ordinary form, not describing any particular fund or using words of transfer of the whole or any part of any amount standing to the credit of the drawer, does not amount to an assignment at law or in equity of the money to the credit of the drawer;" and the nonpayment of such a check does not give the payee a right of action against the drawee. Reviere v. Chambliss, 120 Ga. 714, 48 S. E. 122.

4. BANKS AND BANKING §105(3)—PROMISE BY CASHIER TO CUSTOMERS—ENFORCEMENT.

"A promise by the cashier of a bank, made without consideration to the drawer of a draft, to pay the same out of funds of a customer on whom the draft is drawn and who has been credited with the proceeds of negotiable paper which he as owner transferred to the bank, is not enforceable against the bank, unless the customer assents that the bank shall make such an application of the funds so placed to his credit." Bullard v. Bank of Madison, 121 Ga. 527, 49 S. E. 615.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Quitman against J. M. Dixon & Company, with counterclaim by defendants. Judgment for plaintiff and defendants except and bring error, and plaintiff takes a cross-bill of exceptions. Affirmed on main bill of exceptions.

Suit was instituted by the Bank of Quitman as payee and holder of a draft drawn by Thompson in the sum of $1,250 on the defendants, Dixon & Co., who unconditionally accepted it in writing before it was discounted by the plaintiff. The acceptance sued on was the last of a series of similar transactions. The defendants contend that they should not be held liable on their acceptance, for several reasons, in substance as follows: (1) Because the acceptance was merely one of accommodation on their part, and without any benefit flowing to them, which fact was known to the plaintiff when it discounted the draft. This ground of defense is not, however, relied upon by counsel, who state that it was made only by way of inducement, in order to show the relationship between the parties. (2) Because when Thompson deposited the proceeds of the draft with the plaintiff, the plaintiff knew, both by virtue of the previous course of dealings and by the statement then made to it by Thompson, that it was with the understanding and agreement that the amount of the draft was to be applied in part payment of a check for $1,500 which Thompson was to draw in favor of the defendants, to cover their acceptance and payment of a previous draft in the latter amount, and yet, despite such knowledge and understanding, the plaintiff applied these funds and other sufficient funds, later deposited by Thompson for the same understood and stated purpose, to the payment of other checks drawn by Thompson. (3) Because the plaintiff failed to pay off the said $1,500 check drawn on it by Thompson in favor of the defendants, although it had sufficient funds of Thompson for that purpose at the time of its presentation. (4) Because the plaintiff failed to pay a draft drawn on Thompson by defendants with the said check attached, although the plaintiff had promised and agreed so to do in writing, but applied the funds of Thompson held by it, and which were sufficient for that purpose, to the payment of other claims against Thompson.

The evidence shows that Thompson had been engaged for a number of years in the sawmill business, and that he had shipped a large part of his lumber to the defendants; and that during this period an arrangement between Thompson and the defendants, and for the accommodation of Thompson, was in operation, whereby Thompson was accustomed to draw 60 and 90 day drafts upon the defendants, which would be accepted by them, and that Thompson would then discount these accepted drafts with the plaintiff. The evidence further shows that when one of these drafts would become due, it would be paid by the acceptors, Dixon & Co., giving their check therefor, and that Thompson, for the purpose of settling the obligation thus raised in the defendants' favor, would send to them his check on the Bank of Quitman for a like amount; that Thompson, in order to take care of the check thus sent to defendants, would draw another draft upon them, but for a less amount, which would also be accepted by them, and which would in turn be discounted by Thompson with the plaintiff bank, and the proceeds thereof placed in the said bank to the credit of Thompson's general account; and that Thompson would then have on deposit, or else would place on deposit, a sufficient amount to cover the difference between the amount of his check and the proceeds of the second draft.

There was no direct testimony from either the defendants or Thompson that the plaintiff in point of fact had knowledge that the last acceptance made by the defendants, and on which the suit is entered, was for the purpose of providing a portion of the funds whereby Thompson would be enabled to discharge his previous indebtedness to the defendants; while, on the other hand, the cashier of the plaintiff bank testified positively and unequivocally that neither he nor the bank had any such knowledge, and the judge, sitting as both court and jury, was therefore authorized to find that such was the case, and that, so far as the bank knew or was informed, each of these transactions was a separate and distinct transaction, and bore no relation to each other.

There was no evidence to sustain the allegations of the defendants' answer that the drafts on other persons deposited by Thompson with the plaintiff bank were deposited with the agreement, direction, or understanding that the proceeds should be applied to the payment of the $1,500 check drawn by Thompson in favor of the defendants and upon the plaintiff bank; nor was there any evidence that Thompson ever subsequently directed the bank to pay this check or the defendants' draft out of these or any other funds. The evidence fails to disclose that there was on deposit with the said bank, to the credit of Thompson, sufficient funds to pay the check or the draft at the time of their several presentations. The letter and telegram relied upon by the defendants to show a promise upon the part of the bank to pay the draft drawn by them on Thompson, out of these funds, are as follows:

Telegram:

"Quitman, Ga. October 13th.

"J. M. Dixon & Co., Savannah, Ga. John P. Thompson has deposited enough items here for collection to make your draft for fifteen hundred good. Think can remit in few days, as soon as returns are had.

"The Bank of Quitman."

The letter was dated October 21, 1914, addressed to the Exchange Bank of Savannah, and was as follows:

"I have yours of the 20th relative to draft of J. M. Dixon & Co. on Jno. P. Thompson for $1,500.00. I have been holding this draft here trying to collect it. Mr. Thompson has been depositing items for collection and we put them through with some paid and a good many of them being returned unpaid. We have worked the collected balance up to within a few hundred dollars of having enough to take up the draft. We may get enough to-day to finish it, and if so will remit it this week, possibly to-day or to-morrow, depending upon just what we get from him to-day. We are protecting balance collected against anything else. We hope this is satisfactory.

"[Signed] H. M. Stubbs, Cashier."

Upon the trial of the case, the court rendered the following judgment:

"The above cause was submitted to the court for its determination, without the intervention of a jury, of the law and the facts. The objections to testimony are all overruled. I think the testimony shows that the paper sued on was an accommodation paper. I think also that it shows that plaintiff was not advised of this fact at the time it was discounted. But these facts do not affect the respective rights of the parties involved here. Some of the questions propounded to Thompson were leading, but, notwithstanding this, I think the objections on that ground were properly overruled. In my judgment the defense and counterclaim of James M. Dixon & Co. are not sustained by the record. An agreement, to which the bank was a party, as contended for by the defendant is not established by the evidence. It is therefore considered, ordered, and adjudged that the plaintiffs above named do recover from the defendants above named the principal sum of $1,250 principal, with interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from December 11, 1914, and also $1.50 protest fees, 25 cents revenue stamp affixed to certificate of protest, and also all costs of court, without offset or deduction on account of the defensive matter and counterclaim set up by defendants."

Osborne, Lawrence & Abrahams, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Wm. L. Clay, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-4] Under an application of the different principles of law as stated in the syllabus, there was no error in the judgment rendered in the court below. In point of fact it does not appear, and the judge so held, that there was ever any express or implied agreement that the unconditional written acceptance as made by the defendant was based upon a parol condition that the proceeds derived therefrom should only be applied in part payment of a previous indebtedness owing to defendants by Thompson; but, under our view of the law, even had this been made to appear, it would not have been competent, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake being set up, to thus vary the terms of the absolute and unconditional written acceptance by showing that it was in fact based upon a condition.

It furthermore does not appear that there were ever sufficient funds in the bank to pay either the $1,500 check drawn by Thompson or the draft upon him drawn by the defendants, upon their respective presentations; but, even had such been the case, under the authority cited in the third headnote, we do not think that the failure on the part of the drawee to pay an unaccepted check would give to the payee thereof a right of action against him since there ordinarily exists no privity of contract between the payee and the person on whom the check is drawn.

Under the authority cited in the fourth headnote, even had the promise to the defendants by the bank to pay the defendants' draft been absolute and unconditional, it still would not have been a binding agreement upon its part, unless it had been made to appear that the drawee had contemporaneously assented that the bank might accumulate and hold for such specific purpose the funds of Thompson then accruing on deposit in said bank. In the instant case, however, it does not appear, either that the promise by the bank was absolute or unconditional, or that any such direction or authority for such specific application had been given it.

Judgment affirmed on main bill of exceptions; cross-bill dismissed.

CHICKAMAUGA MFG. CO. v. AUGUSTA GROCERY CO. (No. 9547.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. Jan. 14, 1919.)

1. SALES \S 377 — ACTION FOR BUYER'S BREACH OF CONTRACT—MUTUALITY.

This suit was for damages on account of a breach of an alleged contract. The defendant signed an order, directed to the plaintiff, for 250 gross of a certain commodity therein described, to be delivered by freight, and "to be used as ordered within 12 months from date." The petition alleges that this commodity was to be manufactured by the plaintiff, "and put up under their particular brand in a special package for the defendant, in accordance with defendant's instructions," and that plaintiff "was at all times prepared to deliver said 250 gross of Honest John bluing to defendant at Augusta, Ga., under the terms of said contract, at any time during the 12 months between the 12th day of March, 1912 [the date of the order], and the 12th day of March, 1913." It is not, however, anywhere expressly alleged that this order was ever in fact accepted by the plaintiff at any time, either orally or in writing, or that the goods were ever manufactured in accordance with the terms of the order, or were ever tendered or delivered by the plaintiff, and it does not appear that the plaintiff ever expressly bound itself to manufacture and deliver the total quantity of 250 gross of the commodity ordered, in exact conformity with all the terms of the order as to price, time of shipment, etc. The unaccepted order did not itself constitute a valid contract, as it was wanting in mutuality, orally or in writing, or by the conduct of the parties, so accepted as to bind both the prospective vendor and the vendee.

2. SALES \S 23(3) — SHIPMENT OF PART OF GOODS—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT.

It is alleged that the "defendant ordered out 45 gross of said 250 gross of bluing during the time specified in said order, but refused to accept the remainder of said contract of 205 gross," and "notified your petitioner that it would not accept the 205 gross of Honest John bluing." The statute of frauds was not involved in this case, and the mere fact that the plaintiff actually shipped some of the commodity specified in the order, before the defendant directed that no further shipments be made, did not amount to such an acceptance of the entire order as would legally bind the plaintiff to ship the remainder of the quantity therein specified and at the price, etc., therein named, it not even being alleged that the plaintiff advised the defendant, or indicated to it in any manner, at the time this particular shipment was made or before the order for the remainder of the commodity was revoked, that the shipment was so made under the terms of the order. The shipment of some of the commodity ordered, without reference to its terms, could not of itself convert the mere order into a valid and binding mutual agreement between the parties. See, in this connection, Morrow v. Southern Express Co., 101 Ga. 810, 28 S. E. 998; Waycross R. Co. v. Southern Pine Co., 115 Ga. 7, 41 S. E. 271; *McCaw Mfg. Co. v. SMITH v. STATE. (No. 9950.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Jan. 9, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ATTEMPT TO MANUFACTURE WHISKY.

The defendant was charged with manufacturing whisky in 1916 (which offense was then a misdemeanor), and convicted of an attempt to manufacture the same. The question of law raised by the fourth, sixth, eighth, and ninth grounds of the motion for a new trial was decided adversely to the contentions of the plaintiff in error in Leverett v. State, 20 Ga. App. 748, 93 S. E. 232, upon a state of facts substantially identical with those sub judice, and growing out of the same transaction.

2. CRIMINAL LAW \S 59(5), 61½, 64—"PRINCIPAL"—MISDEMEANOR.

The excerpt from the charge of the court, complained of in the fifth ground of the motion for a new trial, upon the subject of principals in the first and second degrees, was not technically accurate, since all persons aiding and abetting in the commission of a misdemeanor are principals, and in misdemeanors there are no principals in the "first" or "second" degree. Under the facts of the case, however, this inaccuracy affords no cause for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Principal.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW \S 828 — REQUEST FOR CHARGE—DEFINING OFFENSE.

In the absence of a timely written request, the trial judge in his charge to the jury did not err in not describing or defining "the nature and character of the acts essential and necessary for this movant to commit in order to render him guilty of an attempt to manufacture whisky illegally as distinguished from the nature and character of those acts which were merely preparatory and would not authorize the jury to find the movant guilty of any offense."

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Jasper County; Jas. B. Park, Judge.

Shep Smith was convicted of an attempt to manufacture whisky, his motion for new trial was overruled, and he brings error. Affirmed.

LEVERETT v. STATE. (No. 9949.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Jan. 9, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COMPANION CASE.

The defendant was charged with manufacturing whisky in 1916, which offense was then a misdemeanor, and convicted of an attempt to manufacture the same. The offense charged being substantially the same as the offense charged in the case of Smith v. State, 98 S. E. 115, this day decided, and growing out of the same transaction, the assignments of error raised in the fifth, sixth, seventh, eleventh, and twelfth grounds of the motion for new trial are disposed of in the first and second headnotes of that case. See, also, Leverett v. State, 20 Ga. App. 748, 93 S. E. 232.

2. CRIMINAL LAW \S 781(2) — CHARGE ON CONFESSIONS—EVIDENCE.

There being evidence tending to show a confession on the part of the defendant, it was not error for the court to charge the law relative to confessions, and the assignment of error set out in the fourth ground of the motion for new trial is therefore without merit.

3. EXCEPTIONS TO CHARGE OF COURT.

There is no merit in the exceptions taken to the charge of the court as set out in the eighth and tenth grounds of the amendment to the motion for new trial, nor is there any merit in the exception taken to the failure of the court to charge as set out in the ninth ground of said motion.

4. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—REFUSAL.

The charge of the court fairly submitted the case to the jury; and, there being evidence to support the verdict, the court did not err in overruling the motion for new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Jasper County; Jas. B. Park, Judge.

B. Leverett was convicted of an offense under the liquor law, his motion for new trial was denied, and he brings error. Affirmed.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. et al.
v. OWENS. (No. 9574.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 14, 1919. Motion for Rehearing Denied Jan. 28, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RULINGS ON DEMURRERS.

The meritorious special demurrers to the petition were sufficiently cured by amendments, and the petition as amended was not subject to the general demurrers interposed by the three defendants. There was no misjoinder of parties, under the allegations made.

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES ¶20(5) — PERSONAL INJURY—LIABILITY—EVIDENCE.

The evidence disclosed liability on the part of the Georgia Northern Railway Company and the Western Union Telegraph Company, but failed to fix liability against the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1067—ACTION FOR PERSONAL INJURIES—LIABILITY—INSTRUCTION.

There was no harmful error in the failure of the court to instruct the jury that they might find one or more, or all, of the defendants liable.

4. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES ¶20(7) — NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether or not the plaintiff failed to exercise ordinary care was a question for determination by the jury.

5. TRIAL ¶261—REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS—REVERSAL.

Where a series of propositions are presented en bloc in a single request to charge, the court is not required to give them, or any part of them, if any one of them is erroneous, or inapplicable to the case on trial.

6. RULING ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial made by the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company, but the judgments overruling the motions for a new trial made by the Georgia Northern Railway Company and the Western Union Telegraph Company are affirmed.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; W. H. Hammond, Judge.

Action by A. T. Owens against the Western Union Telegraph Company, the Georgia Northern Railway Company, and the Southern Telephone & Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed as to the Western Union Telegraph Company and the Georgia Northern Railway Company, and reversed as to defendant Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company.

Branch & Snow, of Quitman, and H. J. MacIntyre, of Thomasville, for defendant in error.

WADE, C. J. [1] 1. The plaintiff's petition alleged that he was injured by stumbling over certain telegraph and telephone wires which had been precipitated to the ground by a violent wind, across a road in daily use by pedestrians and vehicles, because of the defective and rotten condition of the posts to which the wires were affixed, and that said posts and wires were maintained jointly by all three of the defendants named, for the transaction of their business, as was particularly set out, and that all of said defendants "did have and maintain" the line of posts from which were suspended the wires causing the injury; and it was further alleged that all of the defendants were negligent, in that they maintained, across and over said road, telegraph and telephone wires attached to posts which were rotten and insecure, and therefore liable to fall at any time across the road, and in allowing said posts to become rotten and unsafe, and in failing to replace or repair said posts, notwithstanding the defendants had long known of their insecure and unsafe condition, or could have had such knowledge by the exercise of ordinary care. Under the allegations made, there was no misjoinder of parties. The petition as amended was not subject to the general demurrers or to the various special demurrers separately interposed by the three defendants.

[2] 2. Upon the trial the evidence disclosed that the Georgia Northern Railway Company originally constructed a telegraph line along its right of way, which it thereafter sold absolutely to the Western Union Telegraph Company, making at the time a separate contract with said telegraph company that in consideration of the setting apart for the exclusive use of the railway company of one of the wires attached to the posts of the system, said railway company would "furnish at its own expense all the labor to maintain the telegraph company's line of poles and wires along the railway company's railroad * * * in good order and repair, and to reconstruct said line of poles and wires when required by the telegraph company," all poles, wires, insulation, and other material for such repairs and reconstruction to be furnished by the telegraph company. It was further shown that the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company purchased from the telegraph company, at an agreed price per annum, the privilege of attaching to said posts two lines of wire, which were to be exclusively owned, used, and maintained by said telephone company, but the evidence nowhere discloses which particular wires so attached to the posts of the telegraph company were the property of the telephone company, or which one of the two wires which belonged to the telegraph company was allotted to the use of the railroad company; nor did it appear which particular wire or wires caused the plaintiff to stumble, fall, and suffer the injuries sued for.

(a) The telegraph company, being the owner of the poles, the defective condition of which was the direct cause of the injury complained of, was liable therefor, and this regardless of what particular wires, attached to its poles by its consent, actually produced the injury. The fact that said telegraph company had employed the railway company to repair and maintain the posts and wires belonging to said telegraph company, could not in any wise relieve the owner of the posts from liability to third persons because of the failure of its servants or employees to carry out and perform the contract to repair, and the court did not err in declining to allow the amendment setting up the said maintenance contract as a matter of defense. Incidentally it appears that this contract provided that the line of poles and wires should be reconstructed by the railway company only "when required" by the telegraph company, and there was no proof that any such requirement had ever been made.

(b) The railway company parted absolutely with the title to the wires and poles of the telegraph system, and its failure to maintain them in safe condition, in accordance with its contract with the telegraph company, did not, therefore, render it primarily liable to third persons, suffering injury resulting from its breach of contract with the telegraph company. Nevertheless it must be inferred from the evidence (and it is conceded in the brief for the railway company) that the posts of the telegraph system, though owned, since the sale to the telegraph company on December 12, 1899, by the last-named company, were allowed and permitted by the railway company to remain upon its right of way, in a rotten and unsafe condition, with potentially dangerous wires attached thereto, crossing over a public way. Hence said railway company was liable for any injuries directly resulting to passers along said road, from contact with said wires, where such persons were at the time in the exercise of proper care, not because of any omission to perform its duty to maintain the wires and posts under its contract with the telegraph company, but for wrongdoing in permitting the dangerous instrumentality to exist on its property. The case of Southern Railway Co. v. Sewell, 18 Ga. App. 544, 90 S. E. 94, in so far as it relates to misfeasance and non-feasance, is not opposed to this ruling, but to the contrary. See 18 Ga. App. 552, 553, 90 S. E. 94.

(c) The telephone company, though having no title to the posts on which its wires were strung, nevertheless strung such wires over and across a public highway, where people constantly passed, and where injury to them was liable to result unless, in the exercise of proper diligence towards the public, the wires were safely attached to sound and stable posts or other objects on either side of such highway, and consequently liability attached to said company for any injuries resulting to a traveler on said highway, brought about by contact with its particular and individual wires. The telephone company would not, however, be liable for injuries resulting from the defective and rotten condition of the posts to which its lines were attached, by the consent of the actual owner of the posts, unless it was made to appear that the injuries were caused by its particular wires. If the wires of the telephone company did not in fact injure the plaintiff, it was, of course, immaterial whether they were attached to stable or unstable supports, or whether the supports fell or remained standing, so far as the creation of any liability against that company was concerned. The evidence failed altogether to indicate or even in any wise to suggest, which of the four wires attached to the rotten posts were the property of the telephone company, and there was no testimony from which it could be definitely inferred that the plaintiff stumbled against or came in contact with either or both of the wires of the telephone company in such a way as to produce or contribute to the injuries complained of, and hence the verdict as against the telephone company was unauthorized by the proof, as no injury was shown to have resulted from its negligence in properly supporting its wires.

[3] 3. Under the foregoing rulings the telegraph and railway companies were both liable for any injuries to travelers on the highway, shown to have resulted from the rotten and defective posts actually owned by the one company, and permitted by the other to remain on its right of way, to which the wires inflicting the injury were attached, and, the jury having found that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation for such injuries, no harm resulted to either of these defendants from the failure of the court to instruct the jury that a joint or several verdict might be returned—or a verdict against one or more of the three defendants or in favor of the remaining one or more. Likewise it is unnecessary to consider the several grounds of the motion for a new trial made by the telephone company, which are based upon the failure of the court to submit various contentions of that defendant, a new trial being granted to the last-named company because the evidence was insufficient to show that it was liable.

[4] 4. Whether or not the plaintiff failed to exercise ordinary care and diligence in running along a well-known road in the dark, with his hat partially over his eyes to protect them from the sand and trash carried by the high wind prevailing at the time, notwithstanding the degree of knowledge possessed by him as to the defective condition of one of the poles adjacent to the road, was a matter for the jury, and this court cannot arbitrarily usurp their province.

[8] 5. It is not error to refuse a request to give in charge to the jury a series of propositions presented en bloc, where any one or more of the propositions is unsound, notwithstanding the various propositions included in the one request are stated in separate paragraphs, more or less disconnected. In this case, among the propositions presented in the one request was the following:

"I charge you further that before the plaintiff is entitled to recover any amount in this case of the defendant, you must believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was free from fault."

This was not a correct statement of the law, and the court properly refused to comply with the request as presented. The legal principles embodied in the request which were applicable were in fact submitted to the jury. See, in this connection, Thompson v. O'Connor, 115 Ga. 120 (5), 123, 41 S. E. 242; Wallis v. Heard, 16 Ga. App. 802, 803, 86 S. E. 391; Shippey v. Owens, 17 Ga. App. 127, 86 S. E. 407 (3); Woodard v. State, 18 Ga. App. 59, 88 S. E. 825 (2); Conley v. State, 21 Ga. App. 135, 94 S. E. 261 (6). In Thompson v. O'Connor, supra, the request to charge not only comprehended various propositions of law presented in separate paragraphs, but the paragraphs were identified as "(a)," "(b)," "(c)," etc. In Shippey v. Owens, supra, the request held to be an en bloc request was introduced with the words, "The court is requested to charge," and following this appeared five different propositions, numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. In the case under consideration, not only does the presiding judge, in approving the grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial presented by the defendant, that preferred the request which was refused, certify that the several propositions included in the one request to charge "were not preferred separately, but were embodied in a single request," one of which was not the law, but the request itself, which appears in the bill of exceptions as an exhibit, is headed "Request to Charge Made by Bennet & Harrell, Attorneys of Record for the Western Union Telegraph Company," and each of the 14 paragraphs following commences, "I charge you further," except one, which commences, "You will determine," etc. Clearly this was, under the rulings cited, an en bloc request, and not a number of separate requests, and one, if not more, being erroneous, the court did not err in declining to comply with the request as preferred.

[8] 6. The evidence authorized the verdict returned against the Georgia Northern Railway Company and the Western Union Telegraph Company, and the judgment overruling their motions for a new trial is affirmed. But as the evidence does not authorize a recovery against the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company, the judgment in overruling its motion for a new trial is reversed. See, in this connection, Austin v. Appling, 88 Ga. 54, 13 S. E. 955 (6); Bonner v. Standard Oil Co., 22 Ga. App. 532, 96 S. E. 573.

BELLINGER v. MUTUAL BEN. INDUSTRIAL LIFE INS. ASS'N.
(No. 9761.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 15, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CERTIORARI \Leftrightarrow 64(1) — PETITION—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY.

Where, in his petition for certiorari, a plaintiff in fi. fa. in an illegality proceeding set forth the grounds of the affidavit of illegality filed by the defendant, and he alleged that "no facts were necessary to a determination of the issues involved, the questions presented being exclusively questions of law," and assigned error solely upon the following grounds, to wit: (1) Because the court overruled petitioner's motion to strike the several stated grounds of the affidavit of illegality, for the reason that they or none of them presented any matter of defense; and (2) because the court erred in sustaining said affidavit of illegality upon any or all of its grounds, for the reason that no one or all of them presented any legal reason why the fi. fa. should be quashed, the judge of the superior court in passing upon the only exceptions thus brought before him, was authorized to consider that the statements of fact contained in the several grounds of the affidavit of illegality were conceded to be true.

2. EXECUTION \Leftrightarrow 166 — AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—SUFFICIENCY.

Under the facts as thus considered, the affidavit of illegality was properly sustained. Lott v. Wood, 135 Ga. 821, 823, 70 S. E. 661; Freeman v. Gaither, 76 Ga. 741. See, also, Bedingfield v. First National Bank, 4 Ga. App. 197, 61 S. E. 30; Continental Fertilizer Co. v. Pass, 7 Ga. App. 721, 67 S. E. 1052; Hartsfield v. Morris, 89 Ga. 254, 15 S. E. 363.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Executory proceeding by Gilbert Bellinger against the Mutual Benefit Industrial Life Insurance Association, in which defendant filed an affidavit of illegality. Affidavit sustained, fi. fa. quashed, and levy dismissed. From the overruling of his certiorari, plaintiff in fi. fa. brings error. Affirmed.

The defendant in error filed an affidavit of illegality to the further proceeding of a justice court fi. fa. in which it was the defendant, upon numerous grounds, the substance of which were to the effect: (1) That the justice court was entirely without jurisdiction to render a money judgment in a proceeding which did not seek to obtain such, but which was merely an attempt in a justice court to obtain specific performance under an alleged contract; and (2) that the judgment was not rendered on the regular day fixed for the holding of said court, and, although he had filed with the justice a demurrer to the jurisdiction of the court, that he had no notice of the hearing, and did not waive notice. The illegality was heard in the municipal court of Savannah, the courts of the justices of the peace in Savannah having in the meantime been abolished, and the municipal court having superseded same. The judge of the municipal court sustained the illegality, quashed the fi. fa. and dismissed the levy made thereunder. The plaintiff in fi. fa. brought the case by certiorari to the superior court, setting forth in the petition the grounds of the illegality, and alleging that—

"No facts were necessary to a determination of the issues involved, the questions presented being exclusively questions of law."

Complaint was made in the petition for certiorari on the failure of the municipal court judge to sustain a motion made before him to strike the several grounds of illegality, for the reason that they failed to present "any sufficient matter in law why the execution should not proceed to satisfaction." The petition also complained of the judgment sustaining the illegality, dismissing the levy, and quashing the fi. fa., for the reason that—

"No one or all of the several grounds of illegality presented any legal reason why the fi. fa. should be quashed, and plaintiff therein denied satisfaction thereof."

The judge of the superior court sanctioned the certiorari, and the chief judge of the municipal court who had tried the case adopted for his answer "all the allegations of fact as contained in the petition." No evidence was embodied in the petition. The record sent up to the superior court in answer to the writ of certiorari consisted of the answer of the municipal court, the judgment of the municipal court, and the fi. fa. While a copy of what purports to have been the original summons was actually included with the record sent up, no reference was made thereto either by the petition for certiorari or the answer. Upon the hearing in the superior court, the judge thereof rendered the following judgment:

"Usually in certiorari cases the issues are clearly presented by the petition and answer, but in the instant case there is so much confusion that it is difficult to reach a satisfactory conclusion. It appears that a suit was commenced in the justice court of the Third district, G. M., that this court was abolished, and that its duties devolved upon the municipal court of Savannah. It further appears that the justice court had rendered a judgment in favor of Bellinger against the insurance company for $80, besides interest and costs. I say inferentially, because in the record before me there is no judgment, and I assume there was a judgment, because it is so recited in the execution. The execution was levied on April 7, 1917, and affidavit of illegality was interposed on April 13, 1917. The plaintiff in fi. fa. moved to dismiss the affidavit of illegality. It does not appear, except inferentially, what action was taken in the court on this motion to dismiss. As the illegality was sustained, I must assume that the motion to dismiss was overruled, although no order or judgment to that effect appears. His honor, Judge Rourke, on the 8th day of August, 1917, rendered a judgment sustaining the affidavit of illegality, dismissing the levy, and quashing the fi. fa. To this judgment plaintiff in fi. fa. excepted, and these exceptions form the grounds of the petition for certiorari. To the writ of certiorari the court below answers that 'all the allegations of fact contained in the petition are true.' There is no exception or traverse to the answer, and I am now compelled to dig out of the debris of the abolished court and 15 grounds of illegality the legal truth.

"I find among the papers what purports to be a copy of the original summons and exhibit. The order setting up the copy of the pleadings in lieu of the lost original is not signed by the judge, and it neither appears in the petition for certiorari nor in the answer thereto that this copy was ever established nor introduced in evidence. How it gets into the papers before me does not appear, and yet the first six grounds of illegality are based on the alleged illegality of the judgment. What that judgment was, or if any were rendered, only appears from the recital in the fi. fa., which fi. fa. is dated April 8, 1917, and recites that in the justice court for the Third district a judgment for $80 was rendered. No evidence whatever seems to have been introduced. The petition for certiorari avers: '(2) No facts were necessary to a determination of the issues involved, the questions presented being exclusively questions of law.'

"As illustrative of the almost inextricable confusion which exists, look at the seventh ground of illegality, which is: 'Said justice court was not in session at the time said alleged judgment was rendered.' This ground raises a great, big controlling issue of fact. The burden was on the defendant in fi. fa. to sustain by evidence this averment, and yet I am told by the plaintiff in fi. fa., in his petition for certiorari, 'that no facts were necessary to a determination of the issues involved.' I can only understand from this that it was conceded in the court below that the ground in the affidavit of illegality, 'that the justice court was not in session at the time said alleged judgment was rendered,' is true. It is too clear for argument that justice courts must be held at stated times and places, and, if the court rendering the judgment was not in session at the time when the judgment was rendered, then such judgment is void, and illegality is the proper defensive remedy.

"A consideration of the several grounds of illegality is not necessary. If the affidavit is good on any of the grounds, that is sufficient. The burden is on the plaintiff in certiorari to show affirmatively that the judgment of the court below should be reversed, and the error committed must be alleged in the petition. It has not been so made to appear. The certiorari is overruled and the judgment affirmed.

"Judge E. J. C. Ga.

"January 14, 1918."

To this judgment of the superior court, overruling the certiorari, the plaintiff in fi. fa. brings his exceptions to this court, setting forth numerous grounds, most of which are based upon the theory that the judgment itself shows that it was arrived at from a consideration of certain pleadings in the case, not a part of the record in the certiorari proceeding, and also that the judgment itself indicates that it rests upon a conception of the facts in the case likewise not supported by any evidence contained in the certiorari record, and, finally, that—

"No one or all of the several grounds of illegality constitute any legal reason why the fi. fa. should have been quashed."

Plaintiff in error specifies, as material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, the fi. fa., with all entries thereon, the affidavit of illegality, the petition for certiorari, with all entries, the answer thereto, the judgment of the court on the certiorari, and the alleged copy summons of the justice court, from which the fi. fa. issued.

Don H. Clark, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Osborne, Lawrence & Abrahams, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

COURTS ~~6~~188(8) — MUNICIPAL COURT OF CITY OF MACON—JURISDICTION—DISPOSSESSORY WARRANT.

Under the terms of the act creating the municipal court of Macon, jurisdiction is not given it to try and determine proceedings had under dispossessionary warrants against tenants holding over.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Dispossessionary proceedings between the E. Tris Napier Company and Julius Brown. From the judgment of the superior court sustaining a certiorari from the municipal court of Macon, the former brings error. Affirmed.

Chas. H. Garrett, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

J. P. Burnett and Napier & Maynard, all of Macon, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, J. The sole question in this case is whether, by the terms of the act of the General Assembly creating it, the municipal court of Macon is given jurisdiction to try and determine issues made under dispossessory warrants. The legal purpose and intent of the act in this respect will suffice to determine the only question involved in the case. The Supreme Court has held that an act giving to a city court concurrent jurisdiction to try an issue formed by a counter affidavit to dispossessory warrants is not unconstitutional as being a special law, where there is an existing general law. McDonald v. Vaughn, 130 Ga. 398, 60 S. E. 1060. Moreover, the municipal court of Macon was established under an act passed in pursuance of a constitutional amendment which had authorized the Legislature to confer upon such a court jurisdiction to try any case which was not under the Constitution within the exclusive jurisdiction of some other court. The Constitution itself does not give to any court exclusive jurisdiction in the matter of evicting tenants holding over. While section 5388 of the Civil Code (1910) provides that if the counter affidavit and bond provided for in such a proceeding shall be made by the alleged holding over tenant, and delivered by him to the sheriff or constable, the proceedings to evict shall be stayed, and the officer shall return the papers "to the next superior court of the county where the land lies, and the fact in issue shall be there tried by a special jury as in case of appeal," it is nevertheless true that this provision of the Code cannot be taken as giving to the superior court exclusive jurisdiction of such cases, since it is plainly modified by the provisions relative to the jurisdiction given to county courts (Park's Ann. Code, § 4775mm); and the Supreme Court ruled in Harper v. Tomblin, 127 Ga. 390, 56 S. E. 433, that a county court, by virtue of this section pertaining to its jurisdiction, has full authority to hear and determine such an issue. In the case just mentioned, the statement made in Stephenson v. Warren, 119 Ga. 504, 46 S. E. 647, to the effect that "exclusive jurisdiction over such a proceeding is, by statute, conferred upon the superior courts," is stated to be obiter, since the point in the Stephenson Case was not at all whether a county court had such jurisdiction, but pertained solely to the question as to whether or not such jurisdiction was in the city court of Moultrie. The ruling made in the Stephenson Case, however, to the effect that the city court of Moultrie was without such authority was in no wise overruled. By reference to the act of the Legislature creating the city court of Moultrie, and cited in the Stephenson Case (Ga. Laws 1901, p. 136, § 2), it will be seen that the jurisdiction of that court is at least fully as broad as that which is conferred upon the municipal court of Macon. The city court of Moultrie was given general and sweeping authority to "try and dispose of all cases of whatever nature, except cases over which exclusive jurisdiction is vested in other courts," whereas the jurisdiction given to the municipal court of Macon is defined (Ga. Laws 1913, p. 253, § 2) to be as follows:

"Said municipal court of Macon shall have jurisdiction within the incorporate limits of the city of Macon, as aforesaid, concurrent with the superior court to try and dispose of all civil causes or proceedings of whatever nature, whether arising ex contractu or ex delicto, under the common law or by statute, in which the principal sum sworn to or claimed to be due, or the value of the property in dispute, does not exceed five hundred dollars, and of which jurisdiction is not vested by the Constitution and laws of the state of Georgia exclusively in other courts." (Italics ours.)

Section 15 of this act is as follows:

"Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all warrants, summary processes and writs issuing out of said municipal court, in which the principal sum claimed to be due or the value of the property in dispute does not exceed five hundred dollars ($500.00), shall be returnable to said municipal court in the same manner and under the same rules as such writs are required to be returned to the superior courts or the justice courts of this state as the case may be."

While, as we have seen, the jurisdiction given by section 5388 of the Code to the superior courts is not exclusive, since the Code itself gives concurrent jurisdiction to the county courts, and since the provisions of various acts of the Legislature creating city and municipal courts have legally given and may legally continue to give concurrent jurisdiction in such cases, still, before any other court shall have such concurrent jurisdiction, it must first have been actually granted to it by the lawmaking body. In other words, all dispossessory warrant cases shall, in accordance with section 5388 of the Code, be returned to the superior court of the county in which the land lies, except in so far as concurrent jurisdiction may be or has been given, either under other provisions of the Code or under the special acts of the Legislature creating city and municipal courts.

Can the language of the act creating the municipal court of Macon be taken as giving to it such concurrent jurisdiction? The summary process by which claims for rent are to be collected is that of distress warrant. The primary purpose and intent of a dispossessory warrant against a tenant holding over is to obtain possession of the premises thus wrongfully withheld. Section 5386 of the Code provides that, when the affidavit provided for to be made by the owner of the property against tenants holding over has been made, he is entitled to a writ or process directed to the sheriff, or his deputy, or any lawful constable, commanding and requiring him to deliver to the owner possession of the land or tenements mentioned. When such possession has been thus obtained, there is an end to the matter, since, unless the tenant holding over sees proper to file a counter affidavit and bond, no issue has been raised for trial. Clark v. Lee, 80 Ga. 617, 6 S. E. 170. It is true that, if the tenant sees proper to arrest the proceeding and prevent the removal of himself and goods from the land, he may do so by declaring on oath any of the defenses specified by the Code, and at the same time furnishing a bond with good security payable to the landlord for the payment of such sum, with costs, as may be recovered against him on the trial of the case; and, if upon the trial of the case the issue should be determined against the tenant, then the person taking out the warrant shall not only be entitled to an enforcement of the writ of dispossession against the tenant, but shall also be entitled to a judgment against him for double the rent reserved or stipulated to be paid, or, if he should be a tenant at will or sufferance, then for double the amount of what the rent of the premises is shown to be worth. The purpose of such a proceeding is, however, to obtain possession of the premises, and not the incidental penalty which may or may not be imposed, according to whether the tenant may wrongfully seek to resist the proceeding of the writ. In a proceeding against a tenant holding over, it is not even necessary that any mention as to rent shall be made in the affidavit, in order for such penalty to be recovered. Pettis v. Brewster, 94 Ga. 527, 19 S. E. 755. It was held by this court, in the case of Tomlin v. Harper, 6 Ga. App. 808, 65 S. E. 1093, that, upon the trial of such an issue in the county court, certiorari, and not appeal from that court to the superior court, is the proper procedure, inasmuch as the purpose of the writ is merely to obtain possession of the premises, whereas an appeal is allowed only in a case where the principal sum or the damages claimed exceeds $50.

The municipal court of Macon is given very large and important powers and functions, but it is nevertheless a court of limited and not general jurisdiction, and thus can claim only such jurisdiction and authority as has been specifically granted to it. The provisions of the act by which it was created confers general power and authority to try and dispose of all civil cases or proceedings of whatever nature "in which the principal sum sworn to or claimed to be due, or the value of the property in dispute, does not exceed $500," and of which jurisdiction is not vested by the Constitution and laws of the state of Georgia exclusively in other courts. Since a dispossessionary warrant is not a proceeding in which a sum not exceeding $500 is sworn to or claimed to be due, and the property itself is not properly in dispute, and since the only questions involved and to be determined in such a proceeding are:

"Did the relation of landlord and tenant exist between the parties? And, if so, has the relation terminated in such a way that the landlord is entitled again to the possession of the premises?" Jordan v. Jordan, 103 Ga. 482, 30 S. E. 265.

—we do not think that the jurisdiction conferred by the act as above quoted can be properly taken as covering the subject-matter of a dispossessionary proceeding. The judgment of the superior court sustaining the certiorari from the municipal court is therefore affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §84—RULES OF ORGANIZATION—RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

"The First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States denies to Congress the power to make any law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. Civil Code 1910, § 6684. That instrument contains no limitations on the powers of the states in this particular, but every state in the Union has in its Constitution a provision denying to the civil authorities the right to control or interfere in any way in matters purely ecclesiastical. The people of no state in the Union, as a political entity, have any creed or religion. The people of the United States, as a political entity, have no creed or religion. Each individual within the jurisdiction of the United States, whether he be within the limits of a state or elsewhere, has a right to determine for himself all of those questions which relate to his relation to the Creator of the universe. No civil authority can coerce him to accept any religious doctrine or teaching, or restrain him from associating himself with any class or organization which promulgates religious teaching. Whether he shall adopt any religious views, or, if so, what shall be the character of those views, and the persons with whom he shall associate in carrying out the particular views, are all questions addressed to his individual conscience, which no human authority has the right, even in the slightest way, to interfere with, so long as his practices in carrying out his peculiar views are not inconsistent with the peace and good order of society." Mack v. Kime, 129 Ga. 1, 16, 58 S. E. 184, 191 (24 L. R. A. [N. S.] 675).

2. RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES §12(5)—RULES OF ORGANIZATION—DECISIONS OF ECCLESIASTICAL TRIBUNALS.

"When an individual becomes a member of a religious organization, his uniting with it is his voluntary act, and he becomes bound by the rules and usages of the organization. * * * As to all matters purely ecclesiastical, he is bound by the decisions of the tribunal fixed by the organization to which he belongs, as an arbitrator to determine the disputed questions relating to matters peculiarly within the province of the organization." Mack v. Kime, supra. Thus the courts of law must not and cannot seek to disturb, alter, or interfere with judgments thus rendered upon matters of church doctrine or discipline.

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER §45(3), 51(4)—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—DISCIPLINE OF CHURCH MEMBER—MALICE.

(a) The law recognizes the necessity and propriety of an investigation by a church of alleged misconduct on the part of its members; and charges which may be preferred either orally or in writing in the bona fide discharge of such a duty are to be taken as privileged communications, and will be thus accounted when made in good faith, even though they should in fact be entirely erroneous.

(b) But if such charges are actually known to be false at the time they are entered, and are maliciously and willfully made, with the purpose and intent of injuring another, they cannot be regarded as privileged, and the occasion and circumstances of their making will afford no protection. Etchison v. Pergerson, 88 Ga. 620, 15 S. E. 680; Civ. Code 1910, § 4437.

4. DEMURRER TO PETITION.

Under the foregoing rulings, it was error to sustain the defendants' demurrer and dismiss the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; A. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Suit by W. H. Swafford against W. R. Keaton and others. Demurrer to petition sustained and petition dismissed and plaintiff excepts and brings error. Reversed.

See, also, 147 Ga. 491, 94 S. E. 568.

W. H. Swafford sued W. R. Keaton, M. M. Daniel, D. W. Daniel, J. T. Lee, and Thomas Carnes in Douglas superior court, claiming damages in the sum of $10,000. Petitioner alleges:

That he had been a member in good standing of Cold Springs Primitive Baptist Church, located in said county, and that on the Saturday before the first Sunday in April, 1917, a regular preaching day for said church, Rev. Thomas Carnes announced the call of a church conference; whereupon, without any previous notice to petitioner, the clerk informed Rev. Carnes that a certain charge had been handed in against the said W. H. Swafford, and in the presence of the public assembly, including petitioner, his wife, their sons and daughters, neighbors, and friends, as well as many members of said church, proceeded to read said charge, in form as follows:

"After careful investigation of the report, we the undersigned brothering of the Primitive Baptist Church at Cold Springs deem it our duty to present a charge against Brother W. H. Swafford for making what we consider a false affidavit to avoid paying the sum of $1.75 court cost in making an appeal in a lawsuit between him and J. T. Duncan from the justice court to the superior court. This being what is usually termed a pauper oath. [Signed] W. R. Keaton. W. M. Daniel. D. W. Daniel."

That while the paper thus read was signed by only three of the defendants, its preparation and publication as aforesaid was the joint and several action of all five of the defendants named, who, it is alleged, had previously conspired together to write and publish the same. That although petitioner then and there arose and disclaimed any previous notice that the charge would be preferred, and though he attempted to be heard in explanation and defense, and sought to have the matter investigated before it came up for consideration, the said Thomas Carnes would not permit any discussion in his behalf, and made the announcement that the church was going to exclude petitioner, and that any member of the church who voted to retain him would be likewise excluded. That upon the vote being then and there taken 6 members voted to retain petitioner, and 28, acting under the intimidation of the said Rev. Carnes, voted to exclude him, whereupon the said Carnes announced that such 6 members would be given until the next regular meeting day, to make acknowledgment for having voted to retain petitioner, and that, in the event this was not done, they would be excluded. Petitioner alleges that the charge as prepared and read was knowingly and maliciously false, that it was intended by defendants to injure and damage petitioner, and that it resulted in the defamation of petitioner's character and standing, and exposed him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule, all to his injury and damage in the amount claimed.

The defendants entered a demurrer to the petition on the following grounds:

"1. This court has no jurisdiction of said cause, same being privilege matters growing out of and concerning the deliberations of a church body and tribunal, no property right being involved.

"2. The petition shows on its face that this question and all matters complained of transpired in an ecclesiastic court and tribunal, said tribunal being within its power, authority, and jurisdiction, and only a question of doctrines of a church and crime and discipline concerning and involving such questions, this court has no jurisdiction in such matters."

The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition, and the plaintiff excepted.

James & Bedgood, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

J. H. McLarty, J. R. Hutcheson, and Astor Merritt, all of Douglasville, for defendants in error.

JENKINS, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-4] The rules of law which in our opinion touch upon and govern this case are set forth in the headnotes. In a case of this particular character it may not, however, be amiss to state plainly that, the judgment of the court below having been based purely upon a question of law as raised on demurrer, neither the judgment of that court nor the judgment of this court either expresses or intimates any opinion whatever as to what is the truth as to any issue of fact involved.

Judgment reversed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES ¶150(1), 342, 343, 365
(1)—"NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENT"—RIGHTS OF HOLDER.

The note sued upon was by its terms payable to the order of the maker. It appears to have been simply indorsed by him, "H. J. Head," and to have been also and further indorsed as follows: "Pay to The Cosmopolitan Life Ins. Co. of Atlanta, Ga., or order, Cosmopolitan Life Insurance Company, by Wm. A. Wright, Ins. Com'r., State of Georgia, in charge." Cosmopolitan Life Insurance Company and The Cosmopolitan Life Insurance Company being entirely different and distinct corporations. Suit thereon was brought by The Cosmopolitan Life Insurance Company as holder. "A promissory note payable to the order of the maker thereof and properly indorsed by him is a negotiable instrument, and the holder is presumed to be such bona fide and for value, and is protected from any defense set up by the maker, acceptor, or indorser, except non est factum, gambling, or immoral and illegal consideration, or fraud in its procurement by the holder." Pryor v. American Trust, etc., Co., 15 Ga. App. 822, 84 S. E. 312. None of these defenses were pleaded in the instant case. Knowledge on the part of a bona fide holder of a negotiable note that it was given in consideration of an executory contract or agreement of the payee, even though the consideration may be expressed in the instrument itself, will not deprive the indorsee of the character of a bona fide holder, unless he had additional notice of the breach of such agreement by the payee; and it has been often held that such a transferee is not bound to make inquiry as to whether or not there has been such a failure. Bank of Commerce v. Barrett, 38 Ga. 126, 95 Am. Dec. 384; Post v. Abbeville & Waycross Railroad Co., 99 Ga. 232, 25 S. E. 405; Citizens' Bank of Vidalia v. Greene, 12 Ga. App. 49, 78 S. E. 795; Simmons v. Council, 5 Ga. App. 386, 63 S. E. 238; Brooks v. Floyd, 12 Ga. App. 530, 77 S. E. 877; Fryer v. State, 12 Ga. App. 533, 77 S. E. 830; McMillan v. First National Bank, 13 Ga. App. 23, 78 S. E. 734; Hudson v. Best, 104 Ga. 131, 30 S. E. 688; 3 R. O. L. 1067, § 273. Defendant, however, contends that the indorsement, "Cosmopolitan Life Ins. Co., by Wm. A. Wright, Ins. Com'r., State of Georgia, in charge," was a sufficient fact of itself to rebut the presumption that plaintiff was a bona fide purchaser without notice. This contention is without merit. In Wade v. Elliott, 11 Ga. App. 646, 75 S. E. 989, it is held that the law presumes that a holder of a negotiable paper bought it before maturity and for value, and that a transfer by a bankrupt court did not prevent the transferee from being a bona fide purchaser.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Negotiable Instrument.]

2. BILLS AND NOTES ¶369—EVIDENCE ¶370(4)—COLLATERAL AGREEMENT—NOTICE.

The following documentary evidence was inadmissible:

"Cosmopolitan Life Insurance Company of Atlanta, Ga. Series No. 2-A 39. No. Shares, 2. Receipt for Stock Settlement. Receipt. —. $400. Received of H. J. Head four hundred dollars (note) $400, in full payment for two shares of the capital stock of the Cosmopolitan Life Insurance Company, of Atlanta, Ga. It is understood that no person except an executive officer of the company has or shall have power to bind the company by the making of any contract for the acceptance of the subscription of the same number as this receipt. If the settlement is accepted, notice will be promptly mailed. If not accepted the settlement will be promptly returned. Not valid unless countersigned by the agent. Dated at Tunnel Hill, Ga., 6/28/1912. J. L. Holbrook, Agent, Cosmopolitan Life Insurance Company."

The transferee of a negotiable paper, who receives it before it is due, cannot be affected by an agreement between other parties thereto, in the absence of notice. Dorris v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Cummings, 22 Ga. App. 514, 96 S. E. 450. It will be noted that the receipt is signed by Cosmopolitan Life Insurance Company, an entirely different and distinct corporation from The Cosmopolitan Life Insurance Company which sued the note. No statement was made by counsel as to what evidence they proposed to offer in connection with the receipt, and no foundation was laid for its introduction, and the rejection thereof was therefore proper. See Hatcher & Co. v. Nat. Bank of Chambersburg, 79 Ga. 542 (2) 544, 5 S. E. 109.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 977(4)—BILLS AND NOTES \S 491—FIRST NEW TRIAL—BURDEN OF PROOF—REVIEW OF DISCRETION.

The defendant, having admitted a prima facie case, thereby assumed the onus of proving his defense, and, there being no evidence whatever introduced in his behalf, a verdict in favor of the plaintiff was demanded, and the trial judge's grant of a first new trial must be controlled.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; M. C. Tarver, Judge.

Suit by The Cosmopolitan Life Insurance Company against H. J. Head. Verdict for plaintiff, first new trial granted, and it brings error. Reversed.

SMILEY v. STATE. (No. 10118.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Jan. 23, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION \S 124(6)—RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS \S 5—PROSECUTION—PRIOR CONVICTION OF PRINCIPAL.

One charged with buying or receiving goods, knowing them to have been stolen, cannot be indicted and punished until after the conviction of the principal offender, or until it appears that the principal offender cannot be taken, so as to be prosecuted and convicted. It follows that the principal and the "accessory after the fact" cannot be jointly indicted, where the prosecution is under section 168 of the Penal Code of 1910.

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

Yank Smiley was convicted of being accessory after the fact to a burglary, in that he received the property obtained by the burglary. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and he brings error. Reversed.

A. S. Johnson, of Camilla, for plaintiff in error.

R. C. Bell, Sol. Gen., of Cairo, and F. A. Hooper, of Atlanta, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. The indictment in this case charges Leroy Winchester with burglary, and the plaintiff in error and others as accessories after the fact, alleging that they "did buy and receive all of the property from said Winchester which he obtained by the burglary." The indictment was demurred to on several grounds, among them that the indictment should be quashed because the person who is alleged to have committed the burglary was joined "in the same indictment and the same count thereof" with the plaintiff in error, who was charged with receiving stolen goods. The demurrer was overruled, and a bill of exceptions pendente lite was filed. The case proceeded to trial and resulted in a verdict of guilty. A motion for new trial was overruled, and this also is alleged as error.

The learned trial judge erred in overruling the demurrer to the indictment. He evidently acted upon the general proposition that the principal felon and the accessory may be indicted in the same bill. This is true when they are joint offenders, both concurring, at least in intent, in the commission of the same crime. While the statute law of our state designates one who receives stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, an "accessory after the fact," and he may be indicted as such, this is not strictly in accord with the definition of an accessory after the fact as given in our Code. The isolated fact that one receives stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, does not make the receiver guilty as an "accessory after the fact," under the Code definition thereof above quoted; but he would be such if, in addition to receiving the goods, and after full knowledge that a crime had been committed, he "conceals it from the magistrate, and harbors, assists, or protects the person charged with or convicted of the crime." Penal Code 1910, \S 47. In Lloyd v. State, 42 Ga. 221, Chief Justice Lochrane said:

"To receive stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, did not fall under any of the definitions of the common law, and did not constitute the receiver an accessory, but was, in itself, a distinct and separate offense. 1 Bishop, \S 493. The receiver of stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, is not an accessory, according to our definition, because he renders no aid to the principal felon. Nor, in speaking of the common law, do we overlook the statute, 8 and 4 W. & M., or of 1 and 5 Anne, but after a review of the whole subject, and in view of the provisions of our own Code, which makes this a distinct offense as accessory after the fact, we lay down the true test to be to consider whether what he did was done by way of personal help to his principal, with a view to enable the principal to elude punishment."

We have not overlooked the fact that in Bieber v. State, 45 Ga. 569, the headnote is as follows:

"One who buys or receives goods, chattels, money, or other effects that have been stolen, or feloniously taken from another, knowing the same to have been stolen, or feloniously taken, may be indicted as an 'accessory after the fact,' under the provisions of the 4420th section of the Code [section 168 of the Penal Code of 1910]; that section creates and defines a distinct offense."

It is true that under section 168 of the Penal Code of 1910 the indictment may properly designate one who receives stolen goods as an "accessory after the fact." However, Bieber was not indicted with the principal, and the indictment "set forth the plea of guilty of the principals to an indictment that had been found against them for simple larceny." In the case of Licette v. State, 75 Ga. 253, Mr. Justice Hall follows the Code, and designates one who receives stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, as an accessory after the fact; yet he distinctly rules that the statute requires the prosecution and conviction of the principal before the "accessory" can be tried. In Jordan v. State, 56 Ga. 92, the first headnote is as follows:

"An indictment for this offense, under section 4488 of the Code, should allege that the principal thief has been tried and convicted of the offense; if such principal cannot be taken so as to be prosecuted and convicted, then the accessory in receiving the stolen goods should be indicted under section 4489 for a misdemeanor." (Italics ours.)

Sections 4488 and 4489, referred to in the headnote quoted above, are sections 168 and 169 of the Penal Code of 1910. The third headnote in that case is in part as follows:

"The indictment should specify the particular offense of which the principal thief was convicted, whether larceny from the person or the house or simple larceny or burglary, so that the record of the court—the pleadings—shall show that the judgment or sentence is right according to the case made." (Italics ours.)

While Mr. Justice Lumpkin in Martin v. State, 95 Ga. 478, 20 S. E. 271, referred to the above ruling in the Jordan Case and said its correctness "admits of grave doubt," it has not been overruled, but the same principle was positively asserted in Rogers v. Brown, 138 Ga. 750, 75 S. E. 1131 (3), where Mr. Justice Atkinson ruled that an indictment was fatally defective which charged the accused with "being accessory after the fact by receiving stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, and the indictment failed to allege that the principal thief had been convicted (Penal Code, § 168), or that the principal thief could not be taken so as to be prosecuted and convicted (Penal Code, § 169)"—citing Jordan v. State, 56 Ga. 92. The ruling in the Jordan Case was also approved and followed in Butler v. State, 57 Ga. 610. In Roberts v. State, 18 Ga. App. 529, 89 S. E. 1055, will be found an interesting and lucid discussion of a question somewhat analogous to the one sub judice; Chief Judge Wade concluding the opinion thus:

"It is true the indictment in the case under consideration charged the defendant with receiving, harboring, and concealing a guilty person, knowing such person to be guilty. However, it cannot be reasonably contended that the defendant knew that the principal offender charged with the commission of a felony was legally guilty, since under our law every person accused of crime is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is established by legal proof, or, in other words, until he has been tried and convicted in a court of competent jurisdiction. It would certainly present an anomalous state of affairs, should one be indicted and convicted as an accessory after the fact, and thereafter the principal offender be tried and found not guilty. As in a great measure a safeguard against such results, the statute relative to accessories before or after the fact wisely provides in effect (as construed by the courts) that only after the conviction of the principal offender, or where such offender cannot be taken, so as to be prosecuted and punished, can an alleged accessory be indicted and tried."

It therefore appears settled, under the rulings of the courts of last resort in our state, that—

"Only after the conviction of the principal offender or, where such offender cannot be taken, so as to be prosecuted and punished, can an alleged accessory be indicted and tried."

An examination of all the cases cited by counsel for the state will show that they are not in conflict with what is here decided. Under the foregoing rulings, the person committing the burglary and the receiver of the stolen goods cannot be joined in the same indictment. It might be well for the Legislature to take some action in reference to the proposition under discussion, and provide for the indictment of an accessory before the trial of the principal. In the instant case, the court having erred in overruling the demurrer to the indictment, the further proceedings were nugatory.

Judgment reversed.

STATE v. HEARST et al. (No. 10131.)

CRIMINAL LAW §784(4)—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Instruction explaining difference between direct and circumstantial evidence, stating that state "relies upon certain circumstances from which it expects the jury to draw the inferences of guilt," was not objectionable on ground that state had no right to expect defendant to be found guilty.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Abbeville County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

John Hearst and George Carter were convicted of grand larceny, and they appeal. Affirmed.

J. Howard Moore, of Abbeville, for appellants.

H. S. Blackwell, Sol., of Laurens, for the State.

HYDRICK, J. Appellants were convicted of grand larceny, the theft of a bale of cotton. The state relied entirely upon circumstantial evidence. The court instructed the jury that the accused were presumed to be innocent until their guilt was established to the satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt. The court then explained the difference between direct and circumstantial evidence, and clearly and correctly stated the rules by which the jury should be guided in the consideration of circumstantial evidence. In the course of the charge the court said:

"There is no direct testimony here that the defendants stole this bale of cotton. No witness has gotten on the stand and sworn that he saw these defendants take the cotton and carry it away, but the state has relied upon circumstantial testimony; that is, it relies upon certain circumstances from which it expects the jury to draw the inference of guilt."

Appellants assign error in the last sentence quoted, to wit, that the state "relies upon certain circumstances from which it expects the jury to draw the inference of guilt." They argue that this was error, because, in no case, does the state expect the jury to find a defendant guilty, but it is the duty of the state merely to lay the facts and circumstances before the jury for their consideration. The objection is wholly unfounded. The instruction was neither erroneous nor prejudicial. To what purpose would the state introduce any evidence, if it did not expect the jury to draw from it an inference of guilt?

Judgment affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW §823(16)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction upon conspiracy in the trial of one of two defendants accused of using an automobile without owner's consent and malicious mischief to personal property, if error, was harmless, where the court instructed that there was no charge of conspiracy.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §1059(2)—APPEAL—EXCEPTIONS.

Exceptions which are too general will not be considered.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Greenville County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

B. B. Martin was convicted of using an automobile without the owner's consent and of malicious mischief to personal property, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. P. Burbage, of Greenville, for appellant. Solicitor J. Robert Martin, of Greenville, for the State.

WATTS, J. The defendant was tried alone on a joint indictment with one George Williams, alleging joint use of an automobile without owner's consent, and malicious mischief to personal property. The absent defendant was in the army. The defendant was tried before Judge Wilson and a jury at the court of general sessions for Greenville county. After conviction and sentence, defendant appeals and by thirteen exceptions imputes error and seeks reversal. The first six exceptions present the same question.

[1] Was it error to charge law with reference to conspiracy, under the circumstances as developed under the evidence in the case? We see no incorrectness in the law as charged by his honor. The court instructed the jury that there was no charge of conspiracy, and this, in any phase of the case, was harmless and not prejudicial, and the jury had the right to pass upon all the facts of the case and apply the facts applicable to the law as charged by his honor, and these exceptions cannot be sustained as the law charged was correct. These exceptions are overruled.

Exceptions 7, 10, and 11 complain of error in that the court charged upon the facts. The exceptions are overruled, being without merit.

Exception 8 is overruled, being without merit.

[2] Exceptions 9 and 12 are overruled. These exceptions are too general for consideration.

Exception 13 is overruled. There was suf-sufficient evidence to support the verdict. All exceptions overruled.

TRIAL \S 295(11) — CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

Where charge 17 pages long gave jury a broad correct rule as to measure of damages, the fact that an inconsistent and incorrect rule was also given will not justify reversal, where, considered in its entirety, it is not made to appear that such inconsistent rule was prejudicial to appellant.

Action by the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Company against the Glencoe Cotton Mills. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nettles & Tobias, of Columbia, for appellant.

GARY, C. J. The following statement appears in the argument of the appellant's attorneys:

"Owing to the fact that there is little difference between the testimony, at the first trial and the second, we and our colleagues have thought it well to relieve the court from reading the testimony anew; and to state to the court that the decision in the first case (108 S. C. 133 [90 S. E. 526]) together with the statement in the case and exceptions herein, correctly set forth the substance of the testimony necessary for the consideration of this appeal."

In discussing the exceptions, the appellant's attorneys say:

"The jury was given a broad correct rule as to the measure of damages, but they were also given an inconsistent and incorrect rule. We cannot say which they followed."

The charge, which was 17 pages in length, must be considered in its entirety. In a charge of such length, it is not surprising if expressions were used, which, standing alone, might be regarded as erroneous. This action was commenced in 1913, and there should be an end of litigation, unless there was prejudicial error.

None of the exceptions can be sustained, for, even conceding that there was error in the particulars therein specified, it has not been made to appear that it was prejudicial. Affirmed.

WATTS and GAGE, JJ., concur.

FRASER, J. (dissenting). I think exceptions 4 and 5 should be sustained.

I think the charge complained of is clearly erroneous. When there are two statements, one general and the other specific, the specific statement restricts the rule to the specific statement.

STATE v. MARTIN. (No. 10144.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 1, 1919.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT §333 — ABANDONMENT OF CONTRACT TO FARM LAND—CRIMINAL LIABILITY.

Defendant, who entered into contract whereby prosecutor was to pay him $7 a month and let him have five acres of land to cultivate as part payment of his wages, held not guilty of violating Cr. Code 1912, § 500, making violation of agreement to farm lands a misdemeanor, because he failed to work the five acres.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Clarendon County; Frank B. Gary, Judge.

Junius Martin was indicted and tried before a magistrate upon a charge of abandoning land rented. He was convicted and sentenced, and appealed to the circuit court, which dismissed the prosecution, and the State appeals. Exception overruled.

The exception is as follows:

The circuit judge erred, it is respectfully submitted, in deciding that section 500 of the Code applied only to cases in which the land was rented for a cash rental and could not apply in cases where the rent was to be paid in labor; it being respectfully submitted that it is immaterial for the purpose of the prosecution whether the plaintiff rented land for a money rental and failed to pay the rent and abandoned the land, or rented it upon a promise to perform labor as rent and failed to perform the labor and abandoned the land.

Frank A. McLeod, Sol., of Sumter, and Durant & Ellerbe, of Manning, for the State.
J. H. Lesesne, of Manning, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an appeal by the state. The whole case is summed up in this quotation from the order of the circuit judge. The appellant says:

"The prosecutor claims that he made a contract with the defendant by which he was to pay him $7 per month and let him have five acres of land as part payment of his wages, and that he also rented to him one acre of land, which one acre he abandoned without just cause or excuse. This prosecution cannot be maintained on account of defendant having abandoned the five acres mentioned in the contract for the reason that the defendant took the right to work this land as a part of his wages, and if he did not see fit to avail himself of the right to work it, such failure to work could not be regarded as an abandonment of farm land such as is contemplated in the statute."

"This involves a construction of section 500, Criminal Code 1912, which reads as follows: 'Sec. 500. Violating Agreement to Farm Lands Made a Misdemeanor—Penalty.—Any person or persons who shall hereafter go into possession of any farming land of another, or shall enter into a written agreement or contract to go into possession of the farming land of another, as a tenant or under a contract to farm and cultivate said land, and shall, without just cause or excuse, leave, desert or quit the lands so leased or contracted for, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not less than twenty-five dollars or more than one hundred dollars, or suffer imprisonment not less than five nor more than thirty days, in the discretion of the court. Any person who shall violate any of the contracts mentioned in this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not less than twenty-five dollars nor more than one hundred dollars, or suffer imprisonment not less than five nor more than thirty days, in the discretion of the court.'"

The statute under which the defendant was indicted, provides a punishment for "any person who shall violate any of the contracts mentioned in this section." The prosecuting witness testifies:

"This agreement between us was, I was to give Junius Martin (the defendant) $7.00 per month and five acres of land and the mule and plow one day out of each week, to plow said five acres of land only. Also 3 lbs. of meat and 1 peck of meal each week during this contract beginning the 8th day of January and to work for nine months."

So far as the record shows, it was no more a crime to fail to work the land than to receive the money, meat, or meal.

There is but one exception, and that is overruled.

an order referring cause to the master, the defendants named appeal. Affirmed.

B. B. Evans, of Columbia, for appellants.
Hunter A. Gibbs, of Columbia, for respondent.

WATTS, J. [1, 2] This is an appeal from an order of his honor Judge Townsend, resident judge of the Fifth circuit, referring the cause to the master made in term time while a presiding judge was holding the court of the Fifth circuit. Notice having been given that application would be made to the presiding judge for an order of reference, but this notice was withdrawn, and notice given that application would be made to the resident judge. The appeal raises the question whether the resident circuit judge at chambers has jurisdiction to grant after notice an order of reference to take testimony after notice of application for a similar order has been made that application would be made to the presiding judge holding court in the same county. There is no merit in the appeal. An order of this kind can be made either by the presiding or resident judge after proper notice. No substantial rights of the appellants have been violated, and the order appealed from is not appealable.

4. HOMICIDE — 331 — REVIEW — DISCRETION OF COURT.

Trial court's ruling that conditions under which deceased made alleged dying declarations were such as to make declarations admissible will not be reversed on appeal, unless clearly erroneous and prejudicial.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Lancaster County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Duff Marshall was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John T. Green, of Lancaster, for appellant.

J. K. Henry, Sol., of Chester, and C. N. Sapp, of Columbia, for the State.

HYDRICK, J. On indictment for murder, appellant was convicted of manslaughter. The only assignment of error is in the admission of the alleged dying declaration of deceased, who was shot about 10 o'clock at night, at the house of Betsy Massey. There were no eyewitnesses to the shooting. Appellant and deceased were outside of the house. A number of persons in the house testified that they heard a conversation between them and two shots, both of which struck deceased; and from the effect of one of them he died, about 6 o'clock the next afternoon.

Roy Taylor, a witness for the state, testified that he went to the house where deceased was shot, about 12 o'clock the same night, and carried him home, about 2½ miles, in a wagon; that after he got home he made the declaration in question—that appellant shot him for nothing. The foundation laid by the state was as follows:

"Q. What did he say about dying? A. He told me it was no use to send after a doctor; he was going to die. I didn't know who shot him, and asked him. Q. Wait a minute. How many times did he say that? Why did he say it was no use to send for a doctor? Anybody saying anything about sending for a doctor? A. Yes, sir. His wife told him to be quiet until the doctor came. Q. What did he say? A. He said, if he didn't make haste and come, it would do no good, for he was going to die. Q. That he was going to die? How long did he live after that? That was about what time of night? A. It was in the morning. It was about 5 o'clock in the morning. * * * Q. How long did he live? A. He lived until about 6 in the afternoon. * * * Q. About 12 hours afterward? A. Yes, sir. Q. He said it was no use to send for a doctor? A. Yes, sir. Q. That he was going to die? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, do you know whether he got any hope after that of getting better? A. No, sir; he didn't get any hope. Q. About getting better? A. No, sir."

Appellant contends that the declaration was inadmissible, because it did not appear that deceased had lost all hope of life. As evidence of that fact, appellant relies upon the statement of deceased that "if he (the doctor) didn't make haste and come, it would do no good, for he was going to die."

We do not think that the only inference of which that statement is susceptible is that the deceased thought that, if the doctor did make haste and come, he could save his life. The statement also warrants the inference that, deceased believed that death was imminent and certain, but that, if the doctor did not get to him pretty soon, he could do no good, in the way of relieving his pain and suffering; for, in connection with the use of the words "it would do no good," he added, "for he was going to die."

[1, 2] While it is true that, to make a dying declaration admissible, the deceased must have lost all hope of life, it does not follow necessarily that, because he sends for a physician, or asks that one be sent for, he has any hope of life from the timely aid of a physician. One may be so severely wounded that he may know that death is imminent and certain, and yet he may want a physician to relieve his suffering. See 2 Jones, Ev. § 332, and cases cited in the note.

[3, 4] The trial court must primarily decide whether the conditions exist under which such declarations are admissible, and its ruling will not be reversed, unless it is clearly made to appear that it was erroneous and prejudicial. State v. Smalls, 87 S. C. 550, 70 S. E. 300. Appellant has failed to satisfy the court of error in the ruling complained of.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 21, 1919.)

INJUNCTION — 136(3) — PENDING TRIAL ON MERITS — "IRREPARABLE INJURY."

A trial on the merits being necessary to determine ownership of land and timber in question, plaintiff is entitled to an injunction restraining defendant from cutting and removing timber pending trial on merits; it being "irreparable injury," to take one's property and put it into another's possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Irreparable Injury.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Colleton County; James E. Peurifoy, Judge.

M. P. Howell and Padgett & Moorer, all of Walterboro, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from an order of his honor, Judge Peurifoy, dissolving an interlocutory order of injunction granted by him. The primary question involved in the case as made by the exceptions is whether the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from cutting and removing timber on the land in question pending a trial on the merits. This point is raised by the first five exceptions of the appellant. These exceptions must be sustained. The allegations of the pleadings and evidence submitted at the hearing are such as necessitate a trial on the merits in order to determine the ownership of the land and timber in question, and it was the duty of the circuit court to preserve the status quo of the same until the true ownership can be determined by the proper judicial tribunal. Either party should be enjoined pending this determination.

The respondent had actual and constructive notice of appellant's title. It is irreparable injury to take one's property and put it into another's possession. All of the facts in this case show that it is a case for the court to interfere and grant injunction until the case can be tried on the merits. These exceptions are sustained; the other exceptions are not considered. The order of Judge Peurifoy is reversed, and order of supersedeas granted by a justice of this court is continued.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; T. S. Sease, Judge.

Action by Manning Richardson against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lucian W. McLemore, of Sumter, for appellant.

L. D. Jennings and A. S. Harby, both of Sumter, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff sued to recover actual and punitive damages for personal injuries sustained by falling into a hole left open in the floor in one of the toilet rooms in defendant's passenger station at Sumter. At the close of all the testimony, defendant requested an instruction that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the infliction of punitive damages, which was refused. The jury found a general verdict for plaintiff for $500 damages, without indicating whether it included punitive damages. The defendant appealed, and assigns error in the refusal of the instruction prayed for.

[1, 2] The litigants might have been saved the expense of this appeal, and this court might have been spared the necessity of hearing and deciding it, if the trial court had observed the frequent admonition of this court that, in cases like this, the jury should be instructed to indicate by their verdict whether they award only actual damages, or both actual and punitive damages. It is not improbable that actual damages alone were in fact awarded, since the amount found for plaintiff could not have been held to be excessive as an award of actual damages only. Defendant's passenger station was undergoing general repairs. The plumber found it necessary to have a hole cut in the floor of one of the toilet rooms to do some work on the pipes beneath. At his request, the carpenter in charge of the work cut the hole in the floor about 12 by 18 inches. It was some 3 or 4 feet deep; that is, from the floor to the ground. The hole was just inside the door leading from the waiting room into the toilet room. The door was hung on spring hinges which kept it shut, unless it was propped open. It was darker in the toilet room than in the waiting room, so that the hole could not be very easily seen by one going from the waiting room into the toilet room. When the plumber had finished his work, he left a work bench across the door, so that no one could go into the toilet room without removing or stepping over it. He went to the carpenter and notified him that he had finished, and told him to close the hole. While it was open, some one (the evidence does not disclose who) removed the bench, and plaintiff, desiring to go into the toilet room, opened the door and stepped into the hole. He fell and sustained the injuries complained of. It was only a short time—probably not more than half an hour—after the plumber had notified the carpenter to close the hole, before plaintiff fell into it. Plaintiff was not a passenger, but only a licensee upon the premises, having gone there with a friend, who was going off on a train, and therefore defendant owed him only the duty of exercising ordinary care for his safety.

[3] The decision of this case is controlled by the case of Ruddell v. Ry., 75 S. C. 290, 55 S. E. 528. In that case, plaintiff was injured by falling into a hole which defendant had dug on its right of way within a few feet of a path which was one of the main thoroughfares of the town of Fairfax, and along which plaintiff was walking in the nighttime, in ignorance of the existence of the hole. On the question of plaintiff's right to have the issue as to punitive damages submitted to the jury, the court said:

"It was for the jury to say on this issue also whether in view of all the circumstances the hole was so left open and insufficiently lighted, in close proximity to a frequented path, as to indicate reckless or wanton disregard of the safety of those who might use the path without notice of the danger. We do not say there was wantonness or recklessness on the part of the defendant, but there was evidence from which the jury might infer it, and therefore it was not error of law for the circuit judge to refuse a new trial on this ground."

Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. AYOUB. (No. 10129.)

1. LARCENY \Leftrightarrow 23—GRAND LARCENY—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

If accused stole a number of automobile tire cases and tubes ranging in value from $2.50 to $6 each, and stole all of them at one time, he was guilty of grand larceny, but if they were stolen at different times, he was guilty of repetitions of the offense of petit larceny.

2. LARCENY \Leftrightarrow 68(1)—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—"GRAND LARCENY."

In prosecution for stealing a number of automobile tire casings and tubes, whose several value was less than, but whose aggregate value exceeded, the minimum value constituting the offense of grand larceny, where there was evidence warranting inference that all the goods were stolen at one time, there was no error in submitting to the jury the issue whether accused was guilty of "grand larceny."

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Richland County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Alex Ayoub was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. Hughes Cooper, of Columbia, for appellant.

W. H. Cobb, Sol., of Columbia, for the State.

HYDRICK, J. [1] Appellant was indicted for housebreaking and grand larceny, and convicted of grand larceny. The theft alleged was of a number of inner tubes and casings for automobile tires, which ranged in value from $2.50 to $6 each. If the several articles were stolen at different times, the thief was guilty of only so many cases of petit larceny, but if they were all taken at the same time, the aggregate value was enough to make a case of grand larceny.

[2] At the close of all the evidence, appellant moved for a directed verdict of not guilty of grand larceny, on the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain a conviction of that offense. He concedes that, if the evidence was susceptible of the inference that the goods were all stolen at the same time, there was no error in refusing his motion. We think the evidence clearly warranted the inference that the goods were all stolen at one time, and hence that there was no error in submitting that issue to the jury.

The case was tried before Judge Townsend and a jury at the May term of court, 1918, for Richland county. The defendant by its answer alleged payment, and the sole question involved in the case was: Was there any evidence of payment? At the close of the testimony in the case, his honor, on motion of plaintiff, directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, on the ground that defendant had failed to show payment. After entry of judgment, defendant appealed, and by exception challenges the correctness of his honor in directing the verdict.

An examination of all the testimony in the case convinces us that the only reasonable inference to be drawn was that there was no payment, and his honor was correct in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

Benet, Shand & McGowan, of Columbia, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from an order of nonsuit as to the first cause of action set out in the complaint herein by County Judge Whaley upon trial in Richland county court in July, 1918. The injury plaintiff complained of in the action arose from paint getting into his eyes, at the mill of defendant, in the city of Columbia. The plaintiff alleged two specifications of negligence: (1) In failing to furnish him with safe, suitable, and proper tools and appliances to do the work required of him, in that the paintbrush was old, worn, and stubby, and unfit for the purpose for which plaintiff was required to use it. (2) The paint was dangerous and poisonous. The element of negligence raised by exceptions and involved in this appeal is the one as to the defective paintbrush.

[1-3] On the day of the accident Stevens gave the plaintiff a key, and told him to unlock the house where the creosote was kept, and to get some creosote and a brush and paint some rafters. Plaintiff did so, and proceeded to paint rafters, and while doing so some creosote splashed from the brush into his eyes. He did not stop work then, and did not lose a day until he left employment of defendant, in February, 1917. Plaintiff selected the brush himself; the condition was obvious and potent; nothing hid about its condition. There was no reason for the defendant to warn him that paint might splash into his eyes. Defendant had the right to assume that a man of ordinary intelligence and full age, and with experience as a workman, would know the condition of the paintbrush and the risk of using it, and, by having selected the brush and used it, with full knowledge of its condition, he assumed the risk attendant on its use. The paintbrush was an instrumentality of simple character different in character with complicated machinery, and the duties of the master in regard thereto are not so strict. The plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care and intelligence on making his selection of the paintbrush and voluntarily using the same, with such knowledge, assumed the risk of the use of the brush, and should not be allowed to recover.

Exceptions overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

SCHIRMER v. CHARLESTON & W. C. RY. CO. (No. 10133.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 25, 1919.)

CARRIERS ⇨277(5) — PASSENGERS — REFUSAL TO ACCEPT MILEAGE BOOK COUPON—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Where conductor refused to accept mileage book coupon and required passenger to pay cash fare, but thereafter discovered mistake and on following day tendered passenger difference between cash fare and coupon, passenger, refusing such difference and suing railroad for refusal to accept coupon, was not entitled to punitive damages.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Hampton County; James E. Peurifoy, Judge.

Action originating in magistrate's court by T. B. Schirmer against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. From a judgment giving him insufficient relief, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

J. W. Vincent, of Hampton, for appellant.

J. W. Manuel, of Hampton, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action for damages for the refusal of defendant's ticket collector to accept the coupons from a mileage book in payment of plaintiff's fare from Brunson to Hampton, a distance of six miles.

The collector thought the book was not good on defendant's road, and demanded cash fare—15 cents—which was paid. Afterwards on the same day, he discovered that he was in error; and on the next day, when plaintiff got aboard his train and tendered the same book, he accepted the coupon from it, told plaintiff that he had made a mistake, and tendered him 3 cents—the difference between the cash fare paid and the value of the coupons which he should have accepted the day before. Plaintiff declined the tender and sued for $100 damages. The magistrate found that plaintiff's actual damage was 3 cents, that the circumstances did not warrant the finding of punitive damages, and gave judgment accordingly, which was affirmed on appeal to the circuit court.

There was no error. The case and this appeal are both without merit.

Appeal dismissed.

FAIREY v. STRANGE et ux. (No. 10137.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 27, 1919.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE §=25—POWER OF COURTS—CONTRACTS.

Courts can only require the performance of contracts the parties have made themselves, and cannot make contracts for them.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER §=55—CONSTRUCTION—DESCRIPTION—NUMBER OF TRACTS.

A contract to convey tract of land, giving the acreage and boundaries as a whole, also the names of two tracts composing it, was an agreement to convey one tract, and not two tracts.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER §=349—BREACH—ANSWER—OFFER.

Allegation, in an answer in action for damages for breach of contract to convey land, alleging willingness to comply in part, held a statement intended in mitigation of damages, and not an offer to convey part of the land at a proportionate price which would authorize a judgment on the pleadings directing such a conveyance.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Fairfield County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Thomas A. Fairey against C. E. Strange and wife. From a judgment directing a conveyance of land, the defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. D. Douglas and G. W. Ragsdale, both of Winnsboro, for appellants.

W. C. Wolfe, of Orangeburg, T. M. Lyles, of Spartanburg, and J. W. Hanahan and Mc-Donald & McDonald, all of Winnsboro, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action for damages for the failure of the defendants to perform on their part the following contract:

"State of South Carolina, County of Fairfield.

"This indenture made this the 14th of July, A. D. 1917, by and between C. E. Strange and Louise Strange and Thomas A. Fairey, witnesseseth:

"That the said C. E. Strange and Louise Strange hereby agree to sell unto the said Thomas A. Fairey: 'All that certain tract of land lying, being and situate in the county of Fairfield and state aforesaid, containing three hundred and ninety acres, more or less, situate about two miles south of Winnsboro, bounded by lands of Winnsboro Mills, J. G. McCants, W. L. Kirkpatrick, Joe Davis, and right of way of Southern Railway Company, being the Rabb tract and McCants tract.'

"And the said Thomas A. Fairey agrees to pay for the said land twenty-three thousand four hundred dollars on the 10th day of December next.

"The said C. E. Strange and Louise Strange hereby reserve the right of possession of said land until the 10th day of December next and all crops on said tract of land for the current year to belong to the said C. E. Strange and Louise Strange, and the said sellers are also to have the right to use and the possession of the ginnyery until the 30th day of December next.

"Upon the payment of the purchase money a good and sufficient deed of conveyance to be made and delivered to said tract of land.

"It is further agreed that in the event of the destruction of any building insured, then any amount collected on the policy of insurance by the sellers shall be deducted from the purchase money hereinbefore mentioned.

"And we hereby bind ourselves, our heirs, executors and administrators by these presents.

"Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of: W. D. Douglas, S. D. Ellison.

"Louise Strange.

"C. E. Strange.

"Thomas A. Fairey."

The answer of the defendants is as follows:

"The defendants above named, by W. D. Douglas and G. W. Ragsdale, their attorneys, answering the complaint herein, for a first defense:

"(1) Deny each and every allegation therein contained, except as may be hereinafter specifically admitted or qualified.

"(2) The defendants admit that they did sign the instrument of writing which is annexed as an exhibit to the plaintiff's complaint, but they allege that as to the defendant Louise Strange she did not sign the same voluntarily and willingly, but on the contrary was unduly urged to do so, after she had repeatedly stated her unwillingness to sign.

"(3) Further answering the said complaint, the defendants allege that it was distinctly understood by and between the plaintiff and the defendants, at the time of the signing of the said writing and before it was signed, that the price of the said lands to be paid to the defendants by the plaintiff was sixty ($60.00) dollars per acre, and that as to the McCants tract, that the defendants were not the exclusive owners thereof, but, on the contrary, that the minor children of the defendants were seized and possessed of a remainder in the said tract, which was entirely beyond control of the defendants and which could only be conveyed to the plaintiff by the direction and approval of the court upon showing first made, that such conveyance would be advantageous to said minors.

"(4) That after signing the said writing annexed to said complaint and after full consideration, the defendants became convinced that the interests of their minor children would be greatly prejudiced by the terms, conditions, and stipulations contained in the said agreement, and thereupon at once notified the plaintiff that while they were ready and willing to carry out the same, in so far as their personal interests was concerned, that they had been advised by counsel to take no steps, so far as the interests of their said minor children should be involved, which would result to the prejudice of the rights and interests of said minors.

"(5) That prior to the commencement of this action the defendants have offered to convey to the plaintiff, pursuant to the said writing as above stated, all right, title, and interest of the defendants in the premises described in said writing and in the complaint, but, upon learning that a conveyance of the interests of the minor children of the defendants pursuant to the said agreement would certainly result to the great prejudice of their interests, defendants notified plaintiff that the said agreement must be construed to relate only to such interests as defendants possessed in the said premises and as plaintiff well knew at all times was the limit of their right to convey.

"(6) That the defendants have at all times been willing and ready to convey to the plaintiff the tract which is referred to in the said agreement as the 'Rabb tract,' which is owned exclusively by the defendants, or to convey all such interests as they own in both of said tracts, but the defendants' offer to so convey have been peremptorily rejected and declined by the plaintiff, who has made the unreasonable demand of the defendants that they proceed to obtain an order of court requiring the conveyance to him under the power and authority of this court of all the interests of the minor children of the defendants in the 'McCants tract,' which the defendants repeat would be to order the sacrifice of said interests, and defendants specifically deny that they have refused to carry out or have breached any agreement which was made by or between them and the plaintiff.

"Wherefore, the defendants demand judgment that the complaint be dismissed with costs."

The plaintiff construed this to be an offer of the defendants to convey the Rabb tract alone. The case was put on Calendar No. 1 for trial by a jury. When the case was called for trial, the plaintiff submitted an offer to accept a conveyance of the Rabb tract, at a proportionate price, in full settlement of the case, and moved for judgment on the pleadings. The defendant disclaimed that construction of their answer, but the trial judge gave judgment which directed a conveyance of the Rabb tract. From this judgment the defendants appealed.

[1] The courts have no power to make contracts for people and then require them to perform them. They can only require parties to contracts to specifically perform the contracts they themselves make. This is fundamental law, and no authority is needed for it.

[2] I. The first error is to be found in that construction of the contract that makes it a contract to convey two tracts of land.

It is a contract to convey one tract composed formerly of two tracts. The names of the former tracts are given as a part of the description. The acreage is given as a whole, and the boundaries are given as a whole. It is manifest that the subject of the contract is all the land included within those boundaries. The contract made the land one tract, and by the one tract the rights of the parties must stand or fall. The pleadings show that the plaintiff was notified that the contract could not be performed, and after that the plaintiff brought his action sounding in damages for its breach.

[3] II. This would end the case for specific performance, unless the defendants, by their answer, made a new offer to sell the Rabb tract alone. The plaintiff took that view of it, and the trial judge sustained their view. In this we think they were in error. The first part of paragraph 6, taken by itself, does look that way; but when the answer is taken as a whole and construed liberally, as required by the Code of Procedure, it appears that the statement was intended in mitigation of damages, if any, and not as an offer of compromise or a new contract.

The judgment is reversed.

FANNING et al. v. BOGACKI. (No. 10120.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 21, 1919.)

1. EQUITY §87(3)—STATUTES OF LIMITATION—APPLICATION.

In suit to enforce an executory agreement whereby defendant purchased plaintiff's land upon sale in a partition suit, to hold the same for plaintiffs and reimburse himself from rents, the legal bar of the 10 and 20 year statute of limitations cannot be interposed by defendant.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE §121(4)—ESTABLISHMENT OF ORAL CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

In a suit to enforce an agreement whereby defendant purchased plaintiff's land upon sale in partition suit to hold for plaintiffs and reimburse himself from rents, evidence held sufficient to establish the agreement.

3. PLEADING §261—AMENDMENTS DURING TRIAL—CHANGING DEFENSES.

Defendant's motion for leave to amend answer by setting up statute of frauds, made after the case was argued, could not be allowed under Code Civ. Proc. 1912, § 224, where its effect was to change defense from denial of oral contract to avoidance.

4. PLEADING §236(7)—TRIAL AMENDMENTS—FURTHERANCE OF JUSTICE.

Defendant's motion for leave to amend answer by setting up statute of frauds, made after the case was argued, may be denied as not in furtherance of justice, in view of Code Civ. Proc. 1912, § 224.

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE §105(3)—LACHES—CONTRACT TO HOLD REAL ESTATE IN TRUST.

An oral contract by which defendant purchased land at a partition sale and agreed to hold the same for plaintiffs until defendant had reimbursed himself out of the rents is valid at common law, and, where the reimbursement contemplated required a long time, a delay by plaintiff of about 19 years in beginning suit was not laches.

6. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE §105(1)—ACTIONS—PREMATURE.

An action for specific performance of a contract whereby defendant, purchasing land at partition sale, agreed to hold the same in trust for plaintiffs, brought before defendant had fully reimbursed himself from rents as agreed, but after he had repudiated contract and tried to sell the land, is not premature.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; Ernest Moore, Judge.

Action by Lena Fanning and others against C. Y. Bogacki. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The decree of the presiding judge was as follows:

Decree.

This is a suit in equity, the complaint in which alleges that in 1894 the land described in the complaint was sold by the master for Barnwell county in a partition suit among the plaintiffs, to which action W. H. Kennedy, holding two mortgages over the land, was made a party. That before said sale, the plaintiff, Mrs. Fanning, on behalf of herself and her children, had an oral agreement with C. Y. Bogacki, the defendant in this action, that he should buy in the land at this master's sale and hold the same until, out of the rents, he reimbursed himself for the outlay in the purchase price and such sums as he should thereafter advance for the support of the said Mrs. Fanning and her children, whereupon he would reconvey the land to them. The complaint also alleges that, by reason of this alleged agreement being known at the sale, the bidding was chilled and the land was sold to the defendant at much less than its value—at a sacrifice unless the agreement be enforced. The complaint, among other things, prays for such relief as may be equitable and just.

[1] The defendant answered by a general denial and pleaded adverse possession for 10 and 20 years. These two latter defenses are, of course, not applicable to this suit in equity. See Blackwell v. Ryan, 21 S. C. 124, where the Supreme Court uses this language: "It is undoubtedly true that 10 years' adverse possession gives title against all who are capable of suing and do not; but it seems to us that the legal bar of the statute cannot as such be interposed to a proceeding on the equity side of the court for the specific performance of an executory contract. See Smith v. Smith, McMull. Eq. 134." Also Poston v. Ingraham, 76 S. C. 167, 56 S. E. 790.

The action was referred to the master to take the testimony and comes up for hearing before me in open court upon this testimony.

The undisputed facts are that in 1891, one G. S. Fanning was killed, and died seized and possessed of seven undivided eighths of the tract of land described in the complaint, the other one eighth belonging to R. B. Fanning, who later conveyed it to the widow and children of G. S. Fanning. That he left surviving him his widow, Mrs. Lena Fanning, and certain infant children, the oldest being 20½ years and the youngest 4 years old at the time of the sale in 1894. These children or their heirs are all plaintiffs in this action. That G. S. Fanning had given two mortgages over this land to one W. H. Kennedy, now deceased. That in 1894 the land was sold by the master in a partition suit brought by Mrs. Fanning against her children and the said mortgagee. There was only one bid, and that was made by Messrs. Patterson & Holman, who were the attorneys conducting that partition suit. Pursuant to that bid, the master's deed was made to the present defendant, C. Y. Bogacki, who was then and is now a resident of the city of Montgomery, Ala., and who is a brother of the plaintiff, Mrs. Lena Fanning. C. Y. Bogacki was not present at the sale. The amount bid was the exact amount due on the mortgages, principal $752.60, interest from the date of the decree to the date of the sale $35.12, and costs $40.78. For at least one year, if not more, after the sale the defendant, Bogacki, permitted the plaintiffs to collect and appropriate the rents from the land. He sent money to the plaintiffs, and continued it so long as their necessities required it. The disputed facts are:

The alleged contract and the allegation that the bidding was chilled by reason of said alleged contract or agreement.

[2] The plaintiff Mrs. Fanning testified that her brother, the defendant, promised to buy this land in, hold it until out of the rents he reimbursed himself for the outlay in purchase price and in advancements made to her, whereupon he would turn the land back over to her and her children. To corroborate her testimony there are two letters from the defendant to Mrs. Fanning, the testimony of her son, George, and the testimony of disinterested witnesses to the effect that there was a rumor afloat at the sale that the land was being bid in for Mrs. Fanning and her children. This together with the undisputed facts above mentioned and the testimony as to gross inadequacy of purchase price constituted the proof on the part of the plaintiff upon the question of whether or not the alleged oral contract did exist.

The proof on the part of the defendant upon this point is his denial of the existence of the alleged oral contract. In his testimony he would not deny that such a contract existed in letters he had written to Mrs. Fanning. The plaintiffs do not rely upon a written contract, but merely introduced certain letters of the defendant for the purpose of corroborating the testimony of the plaintiff and used the letters in the cross-examination of the defendant, with the aforesaid results, which to some extent must weaken the defendant's strong denial that such an oral contract existed.

After a careful consideration of the testimony and exhibits, my conclusion is that the alleged oral contract did exist.

[3, 4] After the plaintiffs had argued their case the attorneys for the defendant made a motion for leave to amend their answer by setting up the statute of frauds. This motion is made under section 224 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section is a limitation upon the power of the court to grant amendments, and unless the proposed amendment falls within one of the four classes mentioned in that section the court has no power to grant it; and, if it does, then it is not grantable as a matter of course, but the court is called upon to exercise its discretion and determine whether the proposed amendment is in the furtherance of justice. The fourth class of amendments mentioned in section 224, that is, amendments during the trial, must not substantially change the claim or defense. Knight v. Cotton Mill, 80 S. C. 213, 61 S. E. 307; Kennedy v. Hill, 79 S. C. 270, 60 S. E. 689; Jennings v. Parr, 54 S. C. 110, 32 S. E. 73; Cuthbert v. Brown, 49 S. C. 513, 27 S. E. 485. Upon the authority of these cases, I hold that I have no power to grant the proposed amendment, for the reason that it substantially changes the defense from a denial of the oral contract to an avoidance of the same. 31 Cyc. 216.

In addition to the foregoing, however, such an amendment would not be "in the furtherance of justice," as required by the Code. Bliss on Code Pleading (3d Ed.) § 431; Suber v. Richardson, 61 S. C. 393, 39 S. E. 540; Coward v. Boyd, 79 S. C. 134, 60 S. E. 311; Wallace v. Dowling, 86 S. C. 307, 68 S. E. 571, 138 Am. St. Rep. 1064; 31 Cyc. 216.

By specific performance both plaintiffs and defendant received justice.

I therefore refuse to allow the amendment, and the plaintiffs are entitled to specific performance, unless they are guilty of laches, which was advanced by the defendant in argument as a bar to relief to the plaintiffs.

[5, 6] Are the plaintiffs barred by laches? What constitutes laches is not decided by length of time alone, but the question must be determined by the facts and circumstances of each case and according to right and justice. The doctrine of laches is applied to prevent the commission of a wrong. Shute v. Shute, 82 S. C. 264, 64 S. E. 145; note, Ann. Cas. 1914B, p. 314; Hellams v. Prior, 64 S. C. 298, 42 S. E. 106; Hubbard v. Manhattan Trust Co., 87 F. 51, 30 C. C. A. 520. And the party who desires to maintain an objection founded on the other's laches must show himself to have been "ready, desirous, prompt and eager." Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. § 1408. This oral contract is valid at common law and in morals, and justice requires that it be enforced. The length of time over which it extended is not laches, because the contract itself contemplates a long length of time before its complete performance.

The acknowledged and reasonable confidence of the plaintiff in the integrity and protecting love of the defendant fully explains the fact that they took no action against him until he attempted to violate the contract in 1913.

I, therefore, hold that laches is not a bar to specific performance of this contract. Nor is the action prematurely brought even if the defendant has not fully reimbursed himself, for he has repudiated the contract and attempted to sell the land. Payne v. Melton, 87 S. C. 233, 45 S. E. 154; Crosby v. Ga. Realty Co., 138 Ga. 746, 76 S. E. 38.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that when out of the rents of the said lands the defendant shall have reimbursed himself for the amount paid at the master's sale, $828.50, with interest at the legal rate, and such advancements as he may have made to the plaintiffs, the clerk of this court do execute and deliver to the plaintiffs a sufficient deed of conveyance, conveying to them in fee simple the lands in question.

And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that this cause be, and the same is hereby, recommitted to the master for Barnwell county, to take an accounting between the plaintiffs and defendant, and to report his findings of fact and law thereon to this court forthwith.

FLOYD et al. v. MONTGOMERY LUMBER CO. (No. 10122.)

1. EVIDENCE ¶213(1)—LETTERS—ATTEMPTED COMPROMISE.

Letters attempting to settle difference of opinion as to title to certain lands and the timber thereon, but which were written long prior to the bringing of the suit involving such title, land, and timber, could not be excluded as constituting an offer of compromise and settlement.

2. TRESPASS ¶45(1)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—LETTERS.

In action for trespass upon land, letters between the parties written prior to the alleged trespass were admissible to show that the trespass was committed after full notice of plaintiff's claim.

3. WITNESSES ¶159(8)—CONTRACT WITH DECEASED PERSON.

A witness could not, in view of Code Civ. Proc. 1912, § 438, testify regarding disposition a deceased ancestor made of his land and what arrangements, with respect to whether the ancestor had agreed to sign a deed to witness, had been made.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1050(1)—HARMLESS ERROR.

In trespass for cutting of timber, admission of tax duplicates of the county treasurer was harmless, where the fact that plaintiffs had paid the taxes was shown by other evidence and testimony.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Horry County; Hayne F. Rice, Judge.

Action by Lillie Mae Floyd and others against the Montgomery Lumber Company. Judgment on verdict for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Testimony referred to in the opinion is: Johnson Floyd, a witness for the plaintiff, testified:

Direct examination: "I am a son of Frederick Floyd. My mother's name was Nancy Floyd. My father had six children by his first wife and seven by his last. Hardy Floyd, Elizabeth McDaniel, Asbury Floyd, Gourdin Floyd, William H. Floyd, and D. C. Floyd were children by the first wife. Gus Floyd was my half-brother. I am 44 years old and was only 8 when my father died about 36 years ago. After father's death, my mother and all his children lived on the old Fred Floyd place. Mother died two years ago. Up until a couple of years she stayed on the old place. The house got burned and she stayed with these children. The old house got burned 2 years ago, and after it was burned she lived with the other children."

Cross-examination: "I am one of the heirs that signed the timber deed to Mullins Lumber Company. My mother was my father's second wife, and she also signed this title to the Mullins Lumber Company.

"Q. At that time, how long had it been since Augustus Floyd had lived on that place? A. I suppose he left when I was small; I suppose 30 or 35 years ago when he left.

"Q. Did he leave after this title had been made that has been introduced in evidence signed by the children of the first wife? A. He was away when that was signed. Augustus Floyd bought some of the old heirs, D. C. Floyd, Gourdin Floyd, and Elizabeth McDaniel. I don't remember what he paid. He did not pay them all. Three took pay and three did not, three of the older children. The title which was introduced, to Augustus Floyd, was left in the hands of my uncle, and he has it yet. Augustus Floyd left my mother and her children in possession of this land. I was one of them.

"Q. What arrangements did he have with you about it; in other words, had he promised that he would sign a deed to you? (Objected to as being obnoxious to section 438 of the Code. Objection sustained.)"

H. H. Woodward, of Conway, for appellant.
Hoyt McMillan, of Mullins, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This action was for damages to real estate, for cutting and removing timber therefrom, and other acts of trespass. Plaintiffs claimed that they owned four undivided thirteenths of the land and timber. The answer was a general denial, and that the defendant was the owner of the timber and trees and other easements on said lands, and that they were the owners of nine undivided thirteenths of timber and trees and necessary rights of way and easement, and that they only took their interest from said lands, leaving the plaintiffs their undivided interest still, on said property, doing this after negotiations had failed for the purchase of plaintiffs' claim. The cause was tried before Judge Rice and a jury at the April term of court, 1918, for Horry county, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiffs for $3,000 actual and $500 punitive damages. From this judgment defendant appeals.

[1, 2] Exception 1 alleges error in the admission of certain letters written by defendant to plaintiffs' attorneys and letters written by plaintiffs' attorneys to the defendant. Defendant contends that these letters should have been excluded as an offer of settlement or compromise. This exception cannot be sustained, as the letters and correspondence were written long before any suit was brought, or, as far as record discloses, was ever contemplated or thought to be necessary. While this court was held, and reiterates the doctrine, which is so wholesome, that—

"The policy of the law is to encourage parties to settle out of court. Therefore, they are not to be prejudiced in subsequent litigation by proof of unsuccessful efforts to settle." Machine Co. v. Johnston, 102 S. C. 130, 86 S. E. 480.

These letters do not show an offer to compromise nor anything in relation thereto. They give notice of title, and offer to sell, and admission of defendant of title. At that time, no timber had been cut, and there was no dispute as to the property rights between the parties. Later, when the alleged trespass was made, it was competent to go to the jury in an action for actual and punitive damages, that these acts were committed after full notice of plaintiffs' claim. This exception is overruled.

[3] Exception 2, alleging error in excluding the evidence of Johnson Floyd, is overruled. It was clearly obnoxious to section 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure and under Jones v. Kelly, 94 S. C. 349, 78 S. E. 17.

[4] Exception 3, as to admitting tax duplicates of the county treasurer: This is overruled, as being harmless, as witness Davenport testified he had paid taxes on the land for a number of years for the plaintiff, and there was other evidence that the heirs at law, plaintiffs herein, of Augustus Floyd, had been paying the taxes for a number of years, and the tax duplicate was competent to show in whose name the property was listed, and amount of taxes assessed.

Exceptions 4, 5, and 6 are overruled as being without merit. There was ample evidence to submit the case to the jury for their determination on these issues, and it would have been error on the part of the court not to have done so.

Appellant's remaining exceptions complain of error in his honor's charge, and as to the liability and measure of damages. Taking the judge's charge, as a whole, we see no error. There was nothing in it that was prejudicial to the appellant, and we see no reason why the judgment of the circuit court should be disturbed. All exceptions are overruled. Judgment affirmed.

Wm. Elliott and James H. Fowles, both of Columbia, for appellant.

Richard E. Carwile and James S. Verner, both of Columbia, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an action for the recovery of $500 under a policy of insurance on the life of Nellie T. Johnson. The case was tried before Judge Memminger and a jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $500. At close of plaintiff's evidence the defendant made a motion for nonsuit, which was refused. When all the testimony was in, the defendant made a motion for a directed verdict in its favor, which was refused. After verdict a motion for new trial was made and refused. After entry of judgment defendant appeals, and imputes error to his honor in overruling defendant's motion for a directed verdict; both of these motions being on the ground that "the undisputed evidence was that the insured procured the policy because she represented to the insurer that she and her husband were free from tuberculosis, and knew these representations were false," and further "that she had not been under the care of a physician for more than two years, and she knew these representations were false" and in his honor's charge "he left it to the jury as a question of fact whether or not the defendant by the issuance of the policy waived misrepresentations made in order to procure it where there was no evidence that the defendant's agents knew the representations to be false or in any way colluded with the insured." If there was any competent evidence in the case, it was the duty of his honor to send the case to the jury. Bouknight, a witness for the defendant, testified:

"I delivered this policy to Nellie Johnson, and was present at the time the application was signed. I delivered the policy to the same woman who signed the application. This all happened at College street house, although she gave her address as Lincoln street. A photograph of the application is attached to the policy. I heard all of the questions read over to her, and her answers were properly recorded by Mr. Gregory."

Further witness testifies:

"Harry Johnson applied for a policy in the Metropolitan about the same time his wife, Nellie, applied. The company passed favorably on both applications, but when Harry's policy came and was taken down to his house to be delivered it was discovered that he was sick in bed. For this reason the policy on Harry's life was never delivered. We understood that he had consumption."

This testimony, with other evident facts and circumstances in the case, was sufficient for the case to be submitted to the jury under Gamble v. Metropolitan Insurance Co., 95 S. C. 196, 78 S. E. 875; Baker v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 106 S. C. 419, 91 S. E. 324; Patrick v. English, 91 S. E. 295; Wingo v. Insurance Co., 99 S. E. 436.

The exceptions are overruled, and judgment affirmed.

SENTELL v. NORRIS COTTON MILLS.
(No. 10147.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 1, 1919.)

MASTER AND SERVANT §153(3)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—LIABILITY OF EMPLOYER—INEXPERIENCED OPERATOR.

Cotton mill which solicited farmer to work for it was liable for injuries to him, uninstructed of dangers of work, after 2½ days' service, causing loss of arm, if it was guilty of lack of due care towards him, and he was not negligent and had not assumed risk, which was hidden.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Pickens County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by A. J. Sentell against the Norris Cotton Mills. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Carey & Carey, of Pickens, and Haynsworth & Haynsworth, of Greenville, for appellant.

Martin & Henry, of Greenville, for respondent.

GAGE, J. The plaintiff had a verdict for $3,000 for the loss of his left arm by the teeth of a carding machine in a cotton mill.

There are eleven exceptions; but the one issue argued at the bar and in the printed points arises out of the refusal of the court to direct a verdict for the defendant: (1) Because there was no proof of negligence by the defendant; (2) because the plaintiff assumed the risk of the task he was at; (3) because the injury to the plaintiff was caused by a fellow servant of his.

The complaint charged as many as seven delicts by the defendant. Of course if there was testimony tending to prove one sufficient delict which was a proximate cause of the injury, and not affected by the three defenses above stated, then the court ought to have sent the case to the jury. There will be no need, therefore, to consider all the seven delicts charged, nor in such event to consider perhaps all the defenses above stated.

The gist of the action, and of all such, is that under all the instant circumstances the defendant failed in the performance of its whole duty towards the plaintiff. Duty is the test of responsibility. There is no need to recite the testimony.

The truth of the postulate which next follows will not be denied. If the plaintiff, hitherto a farmer by life long practice and a man of 50 years, was solicited by the defendant more than once to quit his farm and enter the service of the mill, because of the scarcity of help there, and if the plaintiff yielded to the solicitation and entered such service, and if the plaintiff was put to strip cards with but a meager experience in cotton mills, and met with this accident after 2½ days' service, and if no instructions had been given him about the difficulties and dangers of that work, about which he was not practiced, and if he was put to labor on a cloudy and rainy day, in a mill darkened on the side he worked at by the state of weather and by a precipitous elevation of the ground there so as to conceal the dangers there present, and if as the proximate result of all this the man lost his hand by the revolving card cylinder while wiping off a carding machine, incident to stripping the cards, then the defendant is liable to the plaintiff, if the jury should conclude that the circumstances recited convicted the mill of a lack of due care towards the plaintiff, and should further find that the plaintiff had not defeated his right by a lack of due care on his part, and should further find that the risk was hidden and had not been assumed by the plaintiff as a part of his contract of service.

The testimony tends strongly to make such a case, and it was properly sent to the jury.

In this view, the issue of fellow servant goes out of the case; for there is no dispute but that the master put the plaintiff to work where he was hurt.

Judgment affirmed.

WHITLOCK v. TOWN OF JONESVILLE et al. (No. 10138.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 27, 1919.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ¶655 — CHANGE OF STREET—AUTHORITY OF TOWN COUNCIL.

Under Civ. Code 1912, §§ 1932, 2951, the town council had the right to alter a road pursuant to agreement whereby lot owner dedicated a strip of land on the east side of her lot in consideration that old street on west side of lot be abandoned to her.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Union County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by Ida E. Whitlock against the Town of Jonesville and others. Demurrer to complaint sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. C. Otts and Sanders & De Pass, all of Spartanburg, for appellant.

Wallace & Barron and J. A. Sawyer, all of Union, for respondents.

FRASER, J. The appellant alleges that she is the owner of a lot of land in the town of Jonesville, through the western portion of which there ran a street of the town; that by agreement with the town council, she dedicated to the city for a street a strip of land on the eastern side of her lot and in consideration thereof the town council agreed to abandon to her the old street through the western side of the lot; that in pursuance of said agreement, she turned over to the town the 50 feet on the eastern side, and it was accepted by the town and put in condition to be used as a street; that with full knowledge and consent of the town council she erected fences around her lot and across the ends of the old street and inclosed the same in her lot; that her son gave some offense to the town council, and that in consequence thereof the mayor and aldermen blocked the new street which they had already accepted, and wilfully, unlawfully, and in a high-handed manner tore down her fence across the old road. This action is brought against the town and mayor and aldermen officially and as individuals.

The defendants demurred on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the town of Jonesville had no power to discontinue the street, and, as the fence obstructed the street, they had a right to remove it. The demurrer was sustained on that ground and this appeal was taken by the plaintiff. There is one exception with several subheads, but really only one question, as the whole case depends upon the power of Jonesville to discontinue a street.

The complaint asks no damages against the town of Jonesville, but an injunction against interference with plaintiff's possession of the abandoned street.

Section 2951, Code of Laws of South Carolina, vol. 1, gives city councils the same rights in the management of its streets as are given to county boards of commissioners.

Section 1932 of said Code gives to the county boards of commissioners the right "to discontinue such roads, bridges and ferries as shall be found useless, and to alter roads so as to make them more useful."

According to the allegations of the complaint, the town council had the right to alter the road. We have been cited to no authority, and we know of none, that requires the alteration to be made by a formal ordinance.

The order appealed from is reversed.

NEWSOM v. F. W. POE MFG. CO. (No. 10146.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 1, 1919.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ¶289(13) — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a 14 year old employé was guilty of contributory negligence when injured by putting his hand inside a machine which he was helping to clean, in order to remove cotton, is a question for the jury.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ¶278(2) — INJURY TO SERVANT—CLEANING MOVING MACHINERY.

Evidence held to show that a 14 year old servant was directed to clean moving machinery in which he was caught and injured.

3. TRIAL ¶256(10) — INSTRUCTIONS — REQUESTS.

In an action by a father against employer for loss of services of minor son, an instruction that it was the duty of the servant to obey the orders of the master was in general correct, and if defendant wished a further instruction, he should have requested it.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ¶153(1) — MINOR SERVANT—WARNING.

The master is held to a stricter account to a servant of tender years than to an adult, since the master is required to warn such servant of dangers.

5. TRIAL ¶296(3) — INSTRUCTION—CONSTRUCTION WITH OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that the duty of the master to furnish a safe place to work is nonassignable, and that it would be liable for any injury resulting to the servant from working in an unsafe place at the direction of any one authorized by the master, was not error, where there was a further instruction that, if the danger was open and a person of ordinary prudence would have seen it, then the blame was on the 14 year old, servant and not on the master.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT §286(2)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—VIOLATION OF MASTER'S RULES AND OF STATUTE.

Where a minor servant was by the direction of one authorized by the master, employed at cleaning moving machinery, such, being in violation of the master's rules and of the statute, was negligence as a matter of law.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by K. E. Newsom against the F. W. Poe Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Haynsworth & Haynsworth, of Greenville, for appellant.

Martin & Henry, of Greenville, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action for damages for personal injury. It is the second action for the same injury. The first action was brought by Forest B. Newsom, a minor under 14 years of age, for the injury to himself, and is reported in 102 S. C. 77, 86 S. E. 195. This action is brought by K. E. Newsom, the father of Forest B. Newsom, for loss of his son's service, etc.

The evidence in the two cases is practically the same, and in the former case is stated:

"Forest Newsom, a boy between 13 and 14 years of age, was employed in appellant's mill as a sweeper. On the morning of the injury, he was sweeping not only his own section, but the section of another sweeper, who was that day out of the mill.

"There is evidence to show that Mr. Whisnant was overseer of the section assigned to the absent sweeper; that after Newsom had finished his sweeping and was talking to another employé, Mr. Whisnant called him to get a bag and help in the cleaning of the machines in Mr. Whisnant's section. These machines were cleaned only at long intervals, not oftener than four times a year. Some of the operatives who had been in the mill for years said they had never seen them cleaned. In order to clean the machines an iron door was opened, exposing the gear, and a broom was put into the machine through the open door, and the loose cotton was swept from the machine through the door. The plaintiff was holding a bag at the open door to catch the refuse as it was swept from the machine."

"Mr. Whisnant was a new man in his position. He stopped the first two machines while he was cleaning them. He then, under the advice of another operative, undertook to clean the machines while they were in motion. After cleaning several moving machines, he left Newsom at an open door to close another door, and Newsom saw a piece of cotton inside of the machine and undertook to pick it up with his hand. Newsom's hand was caught and severely injured."

[1] I. The first and second exceptions complained of error in the refusal of the presiding judge to direct a verdict as to negligence and willfulness. There was no error here. The reasons are fully stated in the former case, and need not be restated here.

[2] II. The appellant's fundamental error is contained in its seventh exception, which complains of error in his honor's failure to charge that the uncontradicted evidence showed that Forest Newsom was not put to work in cleaning moving machinery. The uncontradicted evidence shows that Forest Newsom was put to work in cleaning moving machinery. At the time of the injury Mr. Whisnant and Forest were together cleaning moving machinery. Mr. Whisnant was handling the broom, and Forest was placing the bag to catch the lint that Mr. Whisnant swept from the machine, and Forest was injured in catching the lint which Mr. Whisnant swept from the cogwheels. It was decided in the former case that this was in violation, not only of the rules of the company, but of the statute, and was negligence, and it was negligence as a matter of law.

[3] III. The third exception complains that the trial judge committed error in charging the jury that it is the duty of a servant to obey the orders of the master. As a general proposition, the charge is correct, and if the appellant desired further instruction, it should have requested it. The charge later qualified the statement.

[4] IV. The fourth exception complains of error in that his honor erred in charging the jury that the master is held to a stricter account to a servant of tender years than to an adult. There is no error there. The master is required to warn a servant of tender years of the dangers. The appellant's fourth request to charge admits the proposition. That request was:

"(4) The master is bound to warn a servant only when the servant, on account of youth and inexperience, does not know the danger attending upon the work."

[5] V. The fifth exception is:

"He erred in charging plaintiff's tenth request as follows: 'One of the nonassignable duties of the master is to furnish a safe place to work, and the master would be liable for any injury resulting to the servant from working in an unsafe place at the direction of any one authorized by the master, either directly or indirectly, to assign the servant to such a place of labor'—it being submitted that by said request the master is charged with liability, irrespective of the question of his negligence, and irrespective of the question as to whether the servant might not have assumed the risks involved."

This exception cannot be sustained. His honor charged the jury that, if the danger was open and a person of ordinary prudence would have seen it, then blame was on the servant, and not on the master.

[6] VI. The next complaint was that his honor erred in charging the jury that it was negligence per se to violate the rules of the company. The rules and the statute both forbid the employment of minors in cleaning moving machinery, and it has already been held that it was negligence as a matter of law.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1213—RETRIAL AFTER REMAND—DIRECTED VERDICT.

Order overruling demurrer to complaint having been sustained on appeal, and plaintiff on trial after remand having offered evidence to prove every essential fact alleged, a verdict for defendant could not be directed.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1099(6) — SUBSEQUENT APPEAL—RES JUDICATA.

Decision on former appeal that complaint was not demurrable held res judicata of contention that plaintiff and surety on bond of foreign insurance company filed with insurance commissioner were at most cosureties on the bonds in question.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by the Equitable Surety Company against the Illinois Surety Company and others. Directed verdict for plaintiff, and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 108 S. C. 364, 94 S. E. 882.

Robert Moorman, of Columbia, for appellant.

D. W. Robinson, of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The Illinois Surety Company was for a while doing business in this state. The statutes of this state require a foreign surety company, doing business in this state, to file with the insurance commissioner an approved bond or approved securities, in the sum of $10,000. The Illinois Surety Company filed a bond with the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company as surety. A suit was brought in the federal court in this state upon a contract upon which the Illinois Surety Company was surety, and judgment was obtained against the company. The company appealed, first to the Circuit Court of Appeals (Illinois Surety Co. v. United States, 215 Fed. 834, 131 C. C. A. 476) and then to the Supreme Court of the United States (240 U. S. 214, 36 Sup. Ct. 321, 60 L. Ed. 609). The company lost in both appeals. In both appeals the plaintiff herein signed the appeal bonds. The Illinois Surety Company became insolvent, and the plaintiff was required to pay the judgments. The statutes provide that the bonds and securities filed with the insurance commissioner shall be a fund out of which repayment may be had. The plaintiff took an assignment of the interest of the judgment creditors, and brought this suit against the Illinois Surety Company and United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company demurred to the complaint, on the ground, among other grounds of demurrer, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it appears as a matter of law that the plaintiff was substituted as surety for United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, and that this company was no longer liable. The demurrer was overruled, and on appeal to this court the order overruling the demurrer was sustained. The judgment of this court is found in 108 S. C. at page 371 et seq., 94 S. E. 882.

The case was remanded for trial. The appellants answered. On the trial of the case the plaintiff proved the facts alleged in the complaint without objection. The defendant offered no evidence. Both plaintiff and defendant moved for a direction of verdict in their favor. The presiding judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and the defendant appealed on three exceptions.

[1] I. The first exception merely states that his honor erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff and not for the defendant. A verdict for the defendant could not have been directed, as it had been conclusively held that the complaint stated a cause of action, and the plaintiff had offered evidence to prove every essential fact alleged.

[2] II. The second exception complains that his honor erred in not holding that the plaintiff was primarily liable and the defendant only secondarily liable, and that the plaintiff was Mable to the exclusion of the defendant. If this proposition is true, then the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The former opinion held to the contrary. It is res adjudicata.

[3] III. "Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in not holding that the plaintiff and said defendant were at most cosecurities on the bonds in question, and in not directing a verdict accordingly." This exception cannot be sustained. Mr. Justice Watts, delivering the opinion in the former case, said:

"Payment by the surety subrogated the surety to all the rights and privileges of such plaintiff in a judgment or decree against the principal debtor, and to all the securities, equities, rights, remedies, and priorities held by such creditor. Code of 1912, § 3942; Brandt on Suretyship (2d Ed.) § 309; Muller v. Wadlington, 5 S. C. 345; Garvin v. Garvin, 27 S. C. 472, 4 S. E. 148.

"Whatever rights the creditors in judgment had against the bonds filed with the insurance commissioner were, by virtue of the statutory laws of this state, transferred to the plaintiff upon payment by it of the judgment. The judgment creditors formally and duly assigned to the plaintiff all of their rights, equities, and interests under the judgment to plaintiff."

This is also res adjudicata.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

THOMAS v. SHEA. (No. 10143.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 29, 1919.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE \S 75(1)—TITLE TO REAL PROPERTY—EFFECT OF DISMISSAL—DISCONTINUANCE.

Magistrate, in whose court plaintiff sued for trespass by cutting timber, after dismissing complaint, on motion of defendant's attorneys, on answer of title to real property, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. 1912, §§ 87-89, had discretion to grant order allowing plaintiff to discontinue.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Thomas S. Sease, Judge.

Action by E. C. Thomas against J. E. Shea. From an order discontinuing the cause, defendant appealed to the Circuit Court, which set aside the order, and plaintiff appeals. Order of the Circuit Court reversed.

John Gary Evans and R. B. Paslay, both of Spartanburg, for appellant.

Carson, Boyd & Tinsley, of Spartanburg, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The agreed statement of facts shows:

"This action was commenced July 21, 1917, in the court of Magistrate Jennings, for the recovery of $50, actual and punitive damages. On August 21st the case was by Magistrate Jennings transferred to Magistrate E. E. Corry on defendant's motion, made on the grounds that the defendant did not believe he could get a fair and impartial trial before Magistrate Jennings. On the call of the case by Magistrate Corry on August 22, 1917, plaintiff referred to his summons for complaint as follows:

"Complaint having been made unto me by E. C. Thomas that you are indebted to him in the sum of $50, actual and punitive damages, for cutting down and hauling away several cords of wood from lands of plaintiff without his knowledge or consent and against his will, for willfully knocking down certain stakes placed on said lands by plaintiff, and for otherwise maliciously trespassing on said lands, the same having been done in the years 1916 and 1917:

"These are, therefore, to require you, the said defendant, to appear before me in my office in Spartanburg, 117½ Magnolia street, on the twenty-first day after service hereof, at 10 o'clock a. m., to answer to the said complaint, or judgment will be given against you by default."

"To which the defendant filed answer as follows:

"The defendant, answering—

"(1) Denies each and every allegation of the complaint.

"(2) Alleges that all the matters and things alleged to have been done by the defendant relate to a strip of land lying along the line between the plantation of the defendant and the plantation of the plaintiff, which has been in the actual possession of the defendant, and to which the plaintiff has recently made a claim of title, and made an effort to exclude the defendant therefrom; that the trees cut and alleged to have been hauled away by the defendant, and the stakes alleged to have been placed on said land by plaintiff, and the occupancy of the defendant alleged to have been trespassing, were all on the strip of land possessed and claimed by the defendant, and claimed by the plaintiff; that the determination of all matters referred to is dependent upon a determination of the issues of title to the real estate; that the title to real estate is involved in all the issues in this case, and this court is without jurisdiction to try the same."

"Along with this answer, the defendant filed a statutory bond, and the answer was countersigned by the magistrate and delivered to plaintiff's attorney. Upon hearing thereon, the magistrate passed the following order:

"It appearing to satisfaction of court that the question of title to real property comes into question, and on motion of defendant's attorneys, it is ordered that the complaint be dismissed in pursuance to sections 87, 88, and 89, Code of Civil Procedure.

"E. E. Corry, Magistrate. [Seal.]"

"On September 6th, plaintiff served the following notice:

"Please take notice plaintiff will move before his honor, E. E. Corry, magistrate, at his office at Spartanburg, South Carolina, on Monday, September 10, 1917, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, for an order discontinuing said case upon the payment of costs.

"You are respectfully invited to be present."

"On hearing this motion, the same being argued for plaintiff and in opposition for the defendant, on September 10, 1917, Magistrate Corry passed the following order:

"This action was commenced in the magistrate's court by plaintiff against the defendant. The plaintiff having paid the cost of said action, and having served due and legal notice on the defendant's attorneys of his intention to discontinue said action:

"Now, on motion of plaintiff's attorneys, it is ordered that the said action be, and the same is hereby, dismissed and discontinued, without prejudice to the rights of the plaintiff herein."

"From this order the defendant served notice of appeal to the circuit court as follows:

"You are hereby notified of our intention to appeal on behalf of the defendant from the rulings and order of Magistrate E. E. Corry, September 10, 1917, whereby he ordered this case discontinued, upon the following ground:

"That the magistrate erred in holding that he had jurisdiction to order a final discontinuance of the case; whereas, it is respectfully submitted that his previous order, discontinuing this case in the magistrate's court, had, by virtue of the statute, transferred this case to this court, and the magistrate was without jurisdiction to enter final dismissory, upon the ground of which we will move this court to set aside the said order appealed from."

"On hearing this appeal, the circuit court sustained the same with the following order:

"This is an appeal from an order of magistrate's court discontinuing the cause, the appeal being filed by the defendant on exceptions. It appears to the court that the previous order of the magistrate (dated August 22, 1917) was formal and in compliance with the statute, the exceptions are therefore sustained and the order appealed from set aside."

"Due notice of plaintiff's intention to appeal from the order of the circuit court was served, and plaintiff does now appeal and move the Supreme Court to set aside and reverse the same upon the following exceptions."

There are three exceptions, but only one question, to wit: Did the magistrate have the right to allow the plaintiff to discontinue his action? The case of High v. Wingo, 84 S. C. 246, 66 S. E. 185, is cited to sustain the order of the circuit court. High v. Wingo does not sustain the order appealed from. In that case there was no order by the magistrate allowing a discontinuance. In this case there was such an order, and it was within the discretion of the magistrate to grant it.

The order appealed from is reversed.

Ex parte VELTRI.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 21, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HABEAS CORPUS \S 3—DISCHARGE—ACTION OF EXAMINING COURT.

Where a court or justice having jurisdiction, on a warrant regular and valid on its face determines that there is probable cause for holding the accused to answer for the crime charged, and his mittimus committing the prisoner to the custody of the sheriff to await the action of the court having jurisdiction to try the accused is also regular and valid on its face, habeas corpus is not available to review the action of the examining court or to discharge the prisoner from custody on grounds purely defensive, as twice in jeopardy, or failure to indict, or to prosecute an indictment previously found for the same offense, within the time prescribed by the statute, not relied on or made the foundation for his discharge before the examining court.

2. HABEAS CORPUS \S 25(1) — DISCHARGE FROM CUSTODY—DENIAL OF RIGHT.

Nor is habeas corpus available to procure the discharge from custody of one so accused and held to answer for a crime, until the court having jurisdiction has by some affirmative action denied him some legal or constitutional right, and when the record shows that any order or judgment other than discharge from further prosecution would be absolutely void.

Habeas corpus by Bill Veltri to secure discharge from detention in jail by John L. Dougan, Sheriff of Monongalia County. Writ refused.

Lazzelle & Stewart, of Morgantown, for petitioner.

Cox & Baker, of Morgantown, for respondent.

MILLER, P. By habeas corpus petitioner seeks his discharge from imprisonment in the jail of Monongalia County upon a charge of murder, upon the ground that he is being illegally detained by respondent, the sheriff, for reasons hereinafter to be considered.

The return of the respondent, not controverted, is that he is holding petitioner under and by virtue of a warrant and mittimus issued on December 2, 1918, by W. L. Boughner, a justice of said county, charging him with the murder of one Tony Selario on the — day of December, 1917, and also by virtue of another commitment issued by the same justice on the same charge on the 30th day of December, 1918.

The warrant and mittimus are in due form and charge an offense of which the justice had jurisdiction as an examining court; and his transcript, also made a part of the return, shows that on the return day of the warrant the body of the petitioner was produced before him by the officer to whom the writ was directed, and that the petitioner waived a preliminary hearing and was thereupon by the order and mittimus aforesaid committed to the jail of said county to await the action of the circuit court touching the charge aforesaid.

Upon the face of this record no question of right, want of authority or jurisdiction of the justice appears, but the petitioner alleges as grounds for his release that the charge on which he is being held is identical in all respects with the crime with which he was accused in an indictment found by the grand jury attending said circuit court, on January 18, 1918. The October term, 1918, of said court, being the third term after the said indictment had been found, was still in session at the time of the issuance of the original warrant and mittimus by virtue of which petitioner was being held by respondent at the time he applied for and was awarded the present writ by this court. And his contention is that although before the end of the said third term, on December 3, 1918, the prosecuting attorney with the consent of the court entered a nolle prosequi as to said original indictment, and he was discharged from further prosecution thereon, and in as much as the court adjourned the said term without having brought him to trial on said indictment, he is now entitled to be discharged from further custody by virtue of section 25 of chapter 159 of the Code (sec. 5601), containing what is known as the three term rule.

[1] The question is thus presented, whether the petitioner is now entitled on this writ to be discharged from the custody of the sheriff, who is holding him not on the original indictment but on the new warrant and commitments by the justice exhibited with the return.

We have reached the conclusion that he is not; that habeas corpus is not available, at least at the present stage of the proceeding. Petitioner, as the record shows, was brought before the justice on the new warrant, waived examination, and was sent on to the circuit court to await the action of the grand jury. The justice thereby perhaps exhausted his jurisdiction over the petitioner and the subject matter of the accusation. The former charge and the indictment of the grand jury and the former proceedings of the court thereon were not before the justice in the last proceeding or in any way made the ground of a motion to discharge the petitioner. So the sole question presented on this writ is whether the warrant and commitment are in due form and sufficiently charge an offense. The jurisdiction of the justice and the formality and regularity of the writs are conceded.

The authorities hold almost without exception that the matters relied upon by petitioner are defensive in character and that they must be set up by proper motion or plea in the proceeding in which he is held to answer, and that former jeopardy, or any constitutional right occurring pending the proceeding, not involving the constitutionality of the act or statute, under which he is accused, must be asserted by way of defense and that habeas corpus is not available to review any error of judgment of the trial court. So hold the standard text books on this subject, and the decisions of the courts supporting them are legion. 1 Bailey on Habeas Corpus, § 40, page 118 et seq.; Hurd on Habeas Corpus (2d Ed.) page 178 et seq.; Hovey v. Sheffner, 16 Wyo. 254, 93 Pac. 305, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 227, 125 Am. St. Rep. 1037, 15 Ann. Cas. 318, and cases cited in note at page 327; State v. Smith, 138 Ala. 111, 35 South. 42, 100 Am. St. Rep., note at page 29 et seq. See especially State ex rel. Noonan v. Sheriff of Hennepin County, 24 Minn. 87; Ex parte Ruthven, 17 Mo. 541; Gillespie v. Rump, Sheriff, 163 Ind. 457, 72 N. E. 138; Ex parte Bigelow, 113 U. S. 323, 5 Sup. Ct. 542, 28 L. Ed. 1005; Whitten v. Tomlinson, 160 U. S. 231, 16 Sup. Ct. 297, 40 L. Ed. 406; and the many other cases cited in the note referred to in 15 Ann. Cas., supra.

Moreover, the proposition is fully supported by the principles of our own decisions and the decisions of the courts of Virginia. Ex parte Mooney, 26 W. Va. 36, 53 Am. Rep. 59; Ex parte Evans, 42 W. Va. 242, 24 S. E. 888; Ex parte Eastham, 43 W. Va. 637, 27 S. E. 896; Dudley v. State, 55 W. Va. 472, 47 S. E. 285; Ex parte Mylius, 61 W. Va. 405, 56 S. E. 602, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1098, 11 Ann. Cas. 812; Jones v. Commonwealth, 20 Grat. 848 (Va.); Ex parte Rollins, 80 Va. 314.

[2] Furthermore, the law undoubtedly is, according to our own decisions and the decisions of other states, that until the court having jurisdiction of the charge under which the petitioner is held has been called upon and has acted by some order or judgment of sentence denying defendant's right to be discharged and subjecting him to further imprisonment, habeas corpus is not available. In most cases we find that the writ has not been applied for until after judgment and sentence in the trial court, but our decisions are that one unlawfully restrained of his liberty may after the trial court has denied him his rights by some affirmative action and it fully appears that no judgment or order of the court except discharge from prosecution could lawfully be pronounced against him, the writ of habeas corpus may be resorted to, to restore him to his liberty. Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 5 Sup. Ct. 935, 29 L. Ed. 89; In re Nielson, 131 U. S. 176, 9 Sup. Ct. 672, 33 L. Ed. 118; Ex parte Bigelow, supra; Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 25 L. 94 S. E. 31; Ex parte Bracey, 82 W. Va. 69, 95 S. E. 593.

These conclusions render it unnecessary if not improper to consider the other questions presented. Therefore, we are of opinion to deny the writ and to remand the petitioner to the custody of the respondent.

CARROLL-CROSS COAL CO. v. ABRAMS CREEK COAL & COKE CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 21, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CORPORATIONS ⇨399(1) — AUTHORITY OF GENERAL MANAGER—SCOPE.

The implied authority of a general manager of a corporation extends only to such matters as come within the scope of its ordinary business.

2. MINES AND MINERALS ⇨105(2)—MINING CORPORATIONS — AUTHORITY OF GENERAL MANAGER—LEASE.

The general manager of a corporation operating coal mines on leased territory has no implied authority to give, sell, trade, or release to another such corporation any part of the leasehold estate.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1012(1)—FINDING OF FACT—REVIEW.

In the absence of a preponderance of evidence against the finding of a trial court on an issue as to whether such corporation conferred upon its general manager express authority so to dispose of a part of its leasehold, or ratified his unauthorized attempt to make such disposition thereof, the appellate court cannot disturb the finding.

4. MINES AND MINERALS ⇨105(2) — UNAUTHORIZED LEASE BY AGENT—ESTOPPEL—RECOVERY OF COMPENSATION—ENFORCEMENT OF PENALTIES.

An unauthorized and unratified agreement made by a general manager of such a corporation with another, under which the latter has mined coal within territory covered by a lease owned by the former, does not estop it from recovery of compensation for the coal so mined nor from enforcement of the statutory penalties inflicted for mining within a prohibited area along the boundary line between the leases under which the two companies are respectively operating.

5. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⇨156—SILENCE OF AGENT—ESTOPPEL OF PRINCIPAL.

Silence and inaction of an agent as to a matter not within his authority do not estop his principal.

6. ESTOPPEL ⇨95 — KNOWLEDGE OF TRESPASS—ACTION FOR INJURY.

Knowledge of a trespass or wrong perpetrated by one fully cognizant of the right invaded, and silence respecting it after notice, do not estop the injured party from asserting his right of action for redress of the injury done.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1043(6) — IRREGULARITY IN TAKING DEPOSITION—CROSS-EXAMINATION—WITNESSES—REVERSAL.

An irregularity in the taking of depositions fully developing the merits of the cause, at which all of the litigating parties appeared and examined and cross-examined the witnesses, constitutes no ground for reversal of the decree founded upon them.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

8. INJUNCTION ⇨26(6)—ACTIONS—DEFENSES AVAILABLE AT LAW—LIMITATIONS.

As the statute of limitations, if applicable, may be relied upon in action at law for value of coal mined by defendant therein on plaintiff's leasehold and to enforce statutory penalties for mining within certain distance of boundary line, as effectively as in a suit to enjoin such action, the statute is no ground of jurisdiction or relief in injunction suit.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mineral County.

Suit for injunction by the Carroll-Cross Coal Company against the Abrams Creek Coal & Coke Company. From a decree dissolving an injunction and dismissing the suit, complainant appeals. Decree affirmed.

D. L. Sloan, of Cumberland, Md., and Wm. MacDonald, of Keyser, for appellant.

Warder & Robinson, of Grafton, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, P. The decree, pronounced on a full hearing and brought up for review by this appeal, dissolved an injunction and dismissed bills the object of which was restraint by an injunction of two actions at law instituted against the plaintiff herein by the defendant; one for the recovery of statutory penalties for mining coal within the area along a boundary line in which mining, without the consent of the adjacent owner in writing, is prohibited by statute, and the other for the recovery of the value of coal mined by the plaintiff beyond the boundary line and in an area covered by the lease of the defendant in this case, as well as the value of additional coal rendered inaccessible by the operations beyond the line and so lost to the lessee.

Neither party actually owned the coal in the land on which it was operating. The plaintiff was the lessee of the West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railway Company, by assignment of a lease made to the Denman Coal Company, and the defendant the lessee of H. C. Homan, as to the tract of land encroached upon. The declaration in one of the actions at law claims right of recovery of fifteen $500 penalties, on the theory of fifteen separate violations of the statute inhibiting mining operations within five feet of a boundary line, without the consent in writing of the adjacent owner. In the other declaration, compensation for 6,900 tons of coal alleged to have been mined by the plaintiff in this bill, out of the Homan lands, of the value of $9,660, is sought and, in addition thereto, $2,068.00, as the value of 4,136 tons of coal, rendered inaccessible by the wrongful operation.

By way of equitable defense to the two actions at law, the original bill alleges two grounds of relief, an agreement between the two companies permitting the plaintiff to mine not only within five feet of the boundary line, but also beyond it, so as to form a connection between its works and those of the defendant, and, in the event of failure of proof of the agreement, conduct on the part of the defendant inducing such action by the plaintiff and constituting estoppel to enforce the penalties for violation of the statute and to have compensation for the coal taken out beyond the boundary line, in excess of a reasonable royalty thereon. An amended bill relies upon the statute of limitations, as to the penalties, and alleges facts constituting ground of necessity for a survey to determine the exact location of the boundary line and the quantity of coal removed.

[8] Since the statute of limitations, if applicable, may be relied upon in the action at law, as fully and effectively as in this suit to enjoin that action, it obviously constitutes no ground of jurisdiction or relief here. Whether there was such an agreement as the original bill alleges, or such conduct as constitutes an estoppel in equity, are the only material inquiries in the cause. The lease under which the plaintiff operates was executed July 1, 1903, and the Denman Coal Company had conducted mining operations under it for a number of years, prior to May 6, 1912, on which date it assigned the lease to the plaintiff. While the Denman Coal Company was conducting its mining operations under its lease, the Abrams Creek Coal & Coke Company, the defendant here, was mining under its lease of the adjacent Homan land. The evidence well establishes the fact that the general manager of the defendant company carried on some negotiations with the Denman Coal Company, for disposition to it of the area of coal in question here, about three acres, as well, possibly, as some other small portions, because they were so situated as to prevent ready and economical mining under the plan of operations contemplated by him; and that, after the Carroll-Cross Coal Company took over the works of the Denman Coal Company, these negotiations were continued. A. Spates Brady, who was general manager of the Abrams Creek Coal & Coke Company from April, 1910, until September, 1913, testified that, when he took charge of the property, its plans of operation were unskill-ful, ineffective, wasteful, and unsatisfactory; and that he altered them by dispensing with some of the openings and reducing their number and so connecting them up as to effect a great saving in expenses; and that the plan he adopted contemplated disposition of certain small portions of the coal to adjoining operators who could take them out more economically, by exchanges of coal property, mutually advantageous to the parties. He says he prepared the plans of operation, as contemplated, and furnished a copy thereof for the use of the president and board of directors, and that it indicated purpose and intention to dispose of the coal in question here to the Denman Coal Company. The reason assigned by him for this purpose was the impracticability of profitable mining thereof, because of the necessity of mining it towards the "dip," in consequence of which the headings, entries, and rooms filled with water, as the work progressed, which had to be removed by pumping, and the existence of a squeeze or breaking down of the roof, which made it necessary to abandon the headings through which the coal from that area had to be taken out. It appears from other evidence in the cause that the cost of a new entry so made as to give access to this coal and drain certain portions of the workings would have been altogether out of proportion to the value of the coal to be taken out through it. In view of this situation, A. Spates Brady says he intended, as general manager, to let the Denman Coal Company take that coal out through its workings, in exchange for some of its coal, to be taken out through the workings of the Abrams Creek Coal & Coke Company, so as to relieve the latter of the obligation imposed by its lease to take it out and pay the royalty thereon, and also afford means of draining his company's mines through the workings of the Denman Company. He swears that, some time in 1912, in pursuance of this plan, which the president and directors of this company had approved, he approached representatives of the Carroll-Cross Coal Company and endeavored to trade to them this "fag end" for an equal area of coal lying in front of some other works of his company. His proposition was not accepted at that time. In the fall of 1913, M. P. Gannon succeeded him, as general manager, and the proof is that he, being familiar with the plan by reason of his having previously held a subordinate position under Brady, had conversations with representatives of the Carroll-Cross Coal Company, some time in 1914, which are relied upon in the evidence as constituting an agreement authorizing the plaintiff to mine the coal in question. Carroll Pattison, president of the plaintiff company, says Spates Brady discussed his plan with him on several occasions and sometimes in the presence of Gannon, and that, after Brady left, Gannon renewed the proposition and he accepted it for his company. As to the terms of the arrangement, he is very indefinite, not saying whether the coal was to be exchanged or to be taken out on a royalty basis; but he says the proposition previously made by Brady was one of exchange. Howard Cross, superintendent of the Carroll-Cross Coal Company, says Gannon came over to his mine and, together with himself and his brother Harry Cross, sat down on a pile of props at the mouth of the mine and proposed that the plaintiff company take out the coal and pay a royalty for it not exceeding six cents per ton. Harry H. Cross says he heard Gannon tell his brother to go ahead and take out the coal and it could be settled for afterwards on a royalty or exchange basis satisfactory to both parties. Pattison says they began to act upon this request or agreement in January, 1914; but Howard Cross says they did not begin to do so until about June 1st of that year. The mining within the prohibited area and beyond the line continued until about June, 1916, when it was ascertained by an auger hole bored beyond the workings that a point within five or six feet of the old workings of the Abrams Creek Coal & Coke Company had been reached. This fact having been communicated to the superintendent of that company, James Christopher, and an inquiry made as to the identity of the heading approached, he reported it to Samuel D. Brady, president of the company, who, professing surprise at the conduct of the Carroll-Cross Coal Company, in crossing the line with its operations, immediately filed a protest against further operations and a demand for satisfaction for the alleged trespass upon the property of his company. As evidence of probability that Spates Brady's plan and the alleged negotiations in conformity therewith were known by S. D. Brady, the plaintiff relies upon correspondence between the latter and Pattison, in 1915. In a letter dated April 10, 1915, Brady said he believed some kind of an arrangement could be made by which some of the coal adjoining the Carroll-Cross Company's property could be mined by it and the drainage more economically handled for both companies, and requested a blueprint showing the workings of the company, with a view to joining up the maps of the two companies and working out a plan for discussion. Pattison replied in a letter dated April 14, 1915, saying he was unable then to find a map of the old Denman Coal Company workings, but the proposition would suit him, if he could arrange for permission by the railroad company, to take the coal out through their property. Brady says this correspondence related to other coal lying beyond the rock fault. As showing improbability of this it is noted that Brady had not then commenced work at the place he mentions.

Some of the claims relied upon by the plaintiff, as showing the desirability and practical necessity of the disposition of the coal in question, which A. S. Brady says he contemplated, are disputed and put in issue by numerous contentions of the defendants. Gannon, with whom the agreement is alleged to have been made, died in December, 1915, wherefore his testimony either to affirm or deny that of the witnesses of the plaintiff cannot be had. S. D. Brady says the correspondence between Gannon from Oakmont, at or near which the mines were operated, and the principal office, located at Fairmont, W. Va., contains nothing pertaining to the alleged agreement; and James Close, the clerk at the Oakmont office of the company during the period of management by Gannon, and having charge of the correspondence, swears there was no correspondence between the general manager and the president of the company relating to any such agreement or the subject-matter thereof. S. D. Brady and Christopher, the superintendent, and other witnesses, admit that there was some water in the rooms or headings of the Abrams Creek Company, abandoned about the year 1910, and up to which the plaintiff extended its operations between June, 1914, and June, 1916; but all of them swear it did not constitute a serious obstacle to mining operations in that section, because it could be disposed of with a small pump and did not have to be carried any considerable distance by means of the pump. The coal actually mined beyond the line by the plaintiff was not all the coal the defendant had in that section. All of the impediments to the mining of that coal applied to a considerably larger area of which it constituted a part; and S. D. Brady attributes the abandonment of the operations in that section to a cause entirely different from the circumstances mentioned and relied upon by the plaintiff. The defendant held leases upon two adjacent tracts of land, one belonging to Homan, the other to Kalbaugh and Ambrose. The minimum amount of coal to be mined annually under the Homan lease was 25,000 tons, and that to be taken out of the other lease 15,000 tons. As to the Homan lease, the company was largely in default; but, as to the other, the obligation of the lease respecting the amount of coal to be mined had been fully complied with. This situation made it necessary or desirable to direct the efforts and energies of the company more fully to the development of the operations on the Homan lease, to avoid the necessity of payment of royalties for coal not mined. As a circumstance tending to contradict this plausible theory, the plaintiff relies upon the fact that the coal actually taken out by it was on the Homan lease and not on the Kalbaugh and Ambrose lease. But it is to be observed that, notwithstanding this fact, the coal actually taken out was near the boundary line between the two leases, and successful operations in that section may have required operations on both leases, while the exigencies of the situation may have required all of the energies and efforts of the company to be directed to the mining of coal on the Homan lease. As to the squeeze mentioned by A. S. Brady, other witnesses deny its existence. Christopher, the superintendent, swears that neither Spates Brady nor Gannon ever informed him that the Carroll-Cross Coal Company was mining over the line so as to connect with the old workings of the company, and that he had no knowledge of their having done so until he was informed that these headings had been actually tapped by such mining.

The final decree merely dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill gives no indication of the ground upon which the decision rests. From argument found in the briefs, it may be inferred that the trial court proceeded upon the theory of lack of authority in Gannon to make the agreement claimed and, for that reason, ignored the evidence tending to establish it. On the other hand, the trial judge may have deemed the evidence insufficient, in view of its indefiniteness and the uncertainty as to its terms and the facts and circumstances tending to contradict it. A loose conversation does not always amount to a contract. If the former suggestion is sound, the trial court's view of the evidence becomes immaterial, unless it tends to prove ratification in some way. In other words, if Gannon had no authority to make such an agreement as the plaintiff claims and his making thereof was not ratified in any way by his principal, it amounts to nothing in law.

[1, 2] Though the powers of a general manager are large and extensive (Fletcher, Ency. Corp. §§ 2096 and 2098), they are not unlimited. It is the province or function of a general manager to supervise and conduct the ordinary business of his principal, and whether an act falls within his implied powers depends upon whether or not it is within the ordinary business intrusted to his management. Fletcher, Ency. Corp. § 2102; Varney & Evans v. Hutchinson Lumber & Manufacturing Co., 70 W. Va. 169, 73 S. E. 321; Laing v. Price, 75 W. Va. 192, 83 S. E. 497; Haupt v. Vint, 68 W. Va. 657, 70 S. E. 702, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 518. In all the instances in which this court has sustained the theory of implied authority in a general managing officer of a corporation, the subject-matter of his act has been something that arose in the conduct of the ordinary business of the corporation. Thomas & Moran v. Kanawha Valley Traction Co., 73 W. Va. 374, 80 S. E. 476; Union Bank & Trust Co. v. Long Lumber Co.,

70 W. Va. 558, 74 S. E. 674, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 663; Producers Coal Co. v. Mifflin Coal Mining Co., 95 S. E. 948. The subject-matter of the alleged agreement between Gannon and the plaintiff was not within the course and conduct of the ordinary business of the corporation he represented. It was his business to conduct the mining operations of his principal, the digging and selling of coal, employment and direction of the necessary labor, payment of wages, and the like; and the gift, sale, or release of a portion of the mining territory to another corporation was clearly not within his province. The leasehold of his corporation was a part of its permanent plant which he could not dispose of. Whether it was of such character as would enable him to make a profit out of it for his principal was a question pertaining to the general policy of the company, not one arising in the course of the conduct of its business, as defined by its charter, by-laws, and nature. The act imputed to him was not in any sense analogous to the employment of another corporation to mine the coal for his principal. At the best, it was a sale of the coal in place or of the right to mine it, at a price that would yield no profit to the owner. As interpreted by the witnesses who testify to it, the agreement was to yield no more than sufficient money to pay the royalty to the lessor, in exoneration of the lessee's obligation to take out the coal and pay the royalty. The only other benefit suggested was the advantage of drainage through the adjacent leasehold, and it was clearly not within his authority to obtain that advantage by a gift, sale, or barter of a part of the permanent plant of the corporation. Whether he could purchase such right, paying money for it, is a question of an entirely different character, which does not arise.

[3] On the question of express authority in Gannon to make the agreement, the evidence does not preponderate in any degree against the finding of the trial court. On the contrary, there is a very decided preponderance in favor of it. S. D. Brady swears neither he nor the directors ever conferred it or knew it was claimed or asserted. The clerk in charge of the correspondence between the office at the mines and the principal office never heard of it. Nor has any evidence of it been found in any of the correspondence which was produced and offered to one of the plaintiff's attorneys for examination. Moreover, the exchange of letters in April, 1915, several months after the plaintiff claims to have commenced work under the agreement, imports lack of such knowledge on the part of S. D. Brady. Whether it related to the coal in question or not, it seems to have carried an original proposition from Brady, and not an additional one. It is also significant that no report of the amount of coal taken out through a period of about two years was ever made and that royalties on it were paid to plaintiff's lessor, as if the coal belonged to it, instead of the defendant to whom they belonged. In this state of the evidence, the finding of the trial court cannot be disturbed.

Nor is there any evidence of ratification of the unauthorized agreement, if made. Though it might have been beneficial to the defendant, if accepted, it has not been a recipient of the benefit thereof in any way. It has declined compensation for the coal in money and forbidden the connection which would have given it the benefit of drainage through the plaintiff's workings.

[4-8] Gannon's lack of authority respecting the subject-matter of the alleged agreement is the rock on which the argument of estoppel breaks. His lack of authority to make a representation concerning it is as clear as his want of authority to make an agreement. The party claiming the benefit of an estoppel must have acted upon some representation in such manner as to work an injury to himself, in the event of the failure of the representation relied upon. Being a matter of law, Gannon's lack of implied authority is deemed to have been known by the plaintiff, and action upon the mere assumption of his express authority, without evidence of it, was action at the peril of the plaintiff. It was bound to know he had no authority, unless expressly conferred, and also to ascertain whether it had been so conferred. Thompson v. Mercantile & Mfg. Co., 60 W. Va. 42, 53 S. E. 908, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 311. Assuming constructive knowledge of the encroachment on the part of the defendant through Gannon, its general manager and director, this does not amount to an estoppel, for mere silence operates as an estoppel only because it is sometimes a form of representation. Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. 411, 38 L. R. A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891; 14 Am. & Eng. Ency. L., 643. There is no proof of any reliance of the plaintiff upon the silence of the defendant, in ignorance of the rights of the latter. Its title, as well as Gannon's lack of authority, was beyond question and fully known. Hence the plaintiff could not have been misled by the silence of the defendant after notice of the trespass, and one claiming a right by estoppel must show that he has been misled by the words, acts, or conduct of the other party, while ignorant of his rights. He must be governed by his own knowledge, even though a representation to the contrary may have been made by the other party. In other words, he must have been misled to his injury, and it is impossible that he should have been, when he was fully informed as to the facts. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Perdue, 40 W. Va. 442, 21 S. E. 755; Water Co. v. Brown-Ing, 53 W. Va. 436, 44 S. E. 267; Akinson v.

Plum, 50 W. Va. 104, 40 S. E. 587, 58 L. R. A. 788; Dawson v. Grow, 29 W. Va. 333, 1 S. E. 564; Thor v. Oleson, 125 Ill. 365, 17 N. E. 780; Bartlett v. Kauder, 97 Mo. 356, 11 S. W. 67; Crest v. Jack, 3 Watts (Pa.) 240, 27 Am. Dec. 353; 10 R. C. L. p. 694, § 21, Estoppel.

[7] The defendant's depositions having been taken before it filed its answer, a motion to suppress them was interposed, but not passed upon. In view of the probability that the motion would be sustained, it retook them, and, on the hearing, a motion to suppress those taken after the filing of the answer was made, on the ground of lack of right to take them while the former motion was pending and without leave to retake. The court sustained the first motion and overruled the second in the final decree, reciting that the parties had been advised, before the depositions were retaken, that the first motion would be sustained and leave granted to retake the depositions. At the retaking thereof, the plaintiff appeared and cross-examined the witnesses. The error, if any, was clearly harmless and does not call for a reversal of the decree. The merits of the cause were as fully developed as if the procedure had been strictly regular.

Perceiving no error in the decree, we will affirm it.

PIEDMONT GROCERY CO. v. HAWKINS
et al. (No. 3715.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 21, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CORPORATIONS §189(7½) — APPROPRIATION BY OFFICER—REMEDY.

The appropriate action to recover money improperly appropriated to his own use by an officer of a corporation is assumpsit for money had and received.

2. EQUITY §23—JURISDICTION—ACTION—EX CONTRACTU—ATTACHMENT.

Section 1 of chapter 106 of Code 1913 (sec. 4455), properly construed, confers upon courts of equity jurisdiction to entertain suits to recover on causes of action ex contractu where an attachment, supported by proper grounds therefor, is sued out as a basis of such jurisdiction.

3. ATTACHMENT §32—"FRAUDULENTLY CONTRACTING A DEBT"—"INCURRING A LIABILITY"—STATUTE.

An officer of a private corporation intrusted with its funds and property, who improperly converts the same to his own use, is guilty of "fraudulently contracting a debt" or "incurring a liability" to such corporation which will be the basis of an attachment under the provisions of section 1 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1913 (sec. 4455).

4. ATTACHMENT \S 114, 115—GROUNDS—AFFIDAVIT—STATEMENT IN DISJUNCTIVE.

Where an attachment is sued out and reliance is had upon two or more distinct grounds for support thereof, they should be joined in the conjunctive; but, where only one ground of attachment is relied upon and two or more phases of the same fact which constitutes such ground are stated, the joining of such different phases in the disjunctive will not invalidate the attachment affidavit.

5. ATTACHMENT \S 232—GROUNDS—AFFIDAVITS—DISJUNCTIVE.

An attachment sued out upon the eighth ground given by section 1 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1913 (sec. 4455), that the defendant fraudulently contracted the debt or incurred the liability for which the action or suit is about to be, or is brought, will not be quashed because the attachment affidavit states that the debt was fraudulently contracted or the liability incurred. This is but the declaration of two phases of the same fact which constitutes the basis of the attachment.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mineral County.

Suit in equity with attachment by the Piedmont Grocery Company against A. F. Hawkins and others. Demurrer to bill and motion to quash the attachment sustained and suit dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

F. C. Reynolds and H. G. Fisher, both of Keyser, for appellant.

Arthur Arnold, of Piedmont, for appellees.

RITZ, J. The defendant was for many years the treasurer of the plaintiff, and it is alleged that, during the time he was such officer, of the money coming into his hands he improperly appropriated large sums thereof to his own use, and that likewise during said time he, without authority, converted to his own use certain goods of the plaintiff. Upon the discovery of this alleged improper conduct on the part of defendant, the plaintiff brought this suit in equity, and at the same time sued out an attachment against the property and effects of the defendant, upon the ground that he fraudulently contracted the debt or incurred the liability set up. A demurrer to the bill and motion to quash the attachment were sustained, and the suit dismissed.

The ground of the demurrer is that the plaintiff's demand is a purely legal one of a tortious nature not cognizable in equity, even when accompanied by an attachment, and the grounds for quashing the attachment are that the facts set up in the affidavit do not show that the liability was fraudulently incurred, and further that the affidavit is void for uncertainty, inasmuch as it alleges that the defendant fraudulently contracted the debt or incurred the liability, so that it is impossible for the defendant to determine whether it is claimed that he contracted a debt or incurred a liability.

[1-3] The jurisdiction in equity is sought to be sustained solely upon the ground that it is conferred by section 1 of chapter 106 of the Code (sec. 4455), giving courts of equity jurisdiction of suits where an attachment is ancillary thereto. As this statute has been construed by this court in the cases of Swarthmore Lumber Co. v. Parks, 72 W. Va. 625, 79 S. E. 723, and Mable v. Moore, 75 W. Va. 761, 84 S. E. 788, jurisdiction is only conferred upon courts of equity to entertain such suits when the cause of action is one ex contractu. In those two cases it is asserted that the jurisdiction does not exist where the cause of action is ex delicto. After reviewing the history of our statute, we think the doctrine of those decisions is correct, and that wherever a plaintiff has a cause of action upon which he can maintain a suit in form ex contractu he may, if he have grounds therefor, sue out an attachment and prosecute a suit in equity. If, however, his cause of action is one upon which he must sue in tort, equity will not have jurisdiction. The defendant insists that the cause of action set up in the bill is one ex delicto, while the plaintiff asserts that it is in its nature ex contractu. The charge in the bill and in the attachment affidavit is full and complete as to the items of money and property appropriated by the defendant, and it seeks to recover a judgment for the amount of money so appropriated and the value of the property. It is contended by the plaintiff that this is purely an action on contract; that when the defendant received into his custody money or property of the plaintiff, as its officer, there was an implied contract that he would account for the same and return it when required so to do; and that his failure to do this renders him liable in an action for money had and received. For the defendant it is contended that, inasmuch as the allegations are that he is guilty of a criminal offense in converting this money and property to his own use, his acts are necessarily wrongful acts, and that the suit is no more than an action for damages for his wrongful conduct. It seems to be very clearly established by the authorities that for money misappropriated, or even for money stolen, an action of assumpsit for money had and received is the appropriate remedy. An act of misappropriation in the case of one intrusted with funds in an official or fiduciary capacity raises an implied obligation on his part to repay such funds, and even where money has been stolen it is uniformly held that the owner of the money may sue in assumpsit to recover the same. In Cooley on Torts, § 109, the author says:

"No question is made of this doctrine, where, as a result of the tortious act, the defendant has come into possession of money belonging to the plaintiff. The law will not permit him to deny an implied promise to pay this money to the party entitled."

This text is fully supported by the authorities cited in the note. In the case of Walker v. Norfolk & Western Railway Co., 67 W. Va. 273, 67 S. E. 722, this court held that an action of assumpsit would lie against one who appropriates the property of another to recover the value thereof. In that case the plaintiff, a contractor, left a pump stored temporarily on the right of way of the defendant, and the defendant appropriated this pump to its own use, and a recovery for the value thereof in an action of assumpsit was allowed. Many cases might be cited to support the doctrine that for money wrongfully converted or stolen an action of assumpsit will lie to recover against the wrongdoer. Gould v. Baker, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 669, 35 S. W. 708; Howe v. Clancey, 53 Me. 130; Shaw v. Coffin, 58 Me. 254, 4 Am. Rep. 290; Spencer v. Towles, 18 Mich. 9; Beardslee v. Horton, 3 Mich. 560; Royce v. Oakes, 20 R. I. 418, 39 Atl. 758, 39 L. R. A. 845; Downs v. Baltimore City, 111 Md. 674, 76 Atl. 861, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 255, 19 Ann. Cas. 644. The fact that the defendant may be guilty of a criminal offense in misappropriating the fund sought to be recovered in no way changes his civil liability to the plaintiff. If there were no statute making the misappropriation of these funds criminal, could it be doubted for a moment that there was an implied contract to repay them? The defendant would stand in no different position from the man who had borrowed money from another with an express promise to repay it. The law will not permit him to secure the funds of another in his capacity as agent, and then use them for himself without also raising a promise upon his part to repay. We are clearly of opinion that the cause of action set up in this case is one ex contractu, and such as gives jurisdiction to a court of equity to entertain a suit under the provisions of section 1 of chapter 106 of the Code, where an attachment is sued out upon sufficient grounds.

[4] But the defendant insists that no ground for the attachment sued out in this case is shown by the affidavit, and further that the affidavit is fatally defective. The affidavit was sued out upon the eighth ground specified in section 1 of chapter 106, and that is that the defendant fraudulently contracted the debt or incurred the liability for which the action or suit is brought. His contention is that the conversion of this money to his own use, he having come into possession of it lawfully, does not make him guilty of any fraud in incurring the liability or contracting the debt set up in the bill. It is quite true that, so far as the funds embezzled are concerned, they came into the possession of the defendant lawfully; so far as the goods appropriated by him to his own use are concerned, this cannot be said. The allegation in this regard is that he abstracted certain goods from the store of the plaintiff, used them himself, and charged the value thereof to various customers of the plaintiff, seeking in this way to conceal his own misconduct. But can the fact that he secured possession of the funds lawfully make any difference? So long as he retained the lawful possession of them as an officer of the company, there was no cause of action against him. The cause of action set up in this case arose when he appropriated these moneys to his own use, and can it be said that the deliberate taking of another's funds held for a particular purpose, and applying them to an entirely different purpose, is not a fraudulent act? It seems to us that this is clearly fraudulent. The defendant cites the case of Goss v. Board of Commissioners, 4 Colo. 468, in support of his contention, and that case does in a measure lay down the doctrine contended for by him; but a reading of it shows that the decision is largely based upon an entirely different proposition. In that case the party from whom the money was sought to be recovered was not a direct agent of the plaintiff, but was an employé of the treasurer of the plaintiff, and the court held that the extent of the plaintiff's rights were fixed by its contract with the treasurer, and recovery on the treasurer's bond was the appropriate remedy for it to pursue. We are not prepared, however, to approve the doctrine laid down in that case that, where a deputy or employé of the treasurer misappropriates funds intrusted to him as such employé, the owner of such funds cannot sue in an action for money had and received to recover a judgment for the same. In the case of Downs v. Baltimore City, 111 Md. 674, 76 Atl. 861, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 255, 19 Ann. Cas. 644, it is held that the wrongful conversion of funds by an officer constitutes fraudulently contracting an obligation which will sustain an attachment, and the reasoning of the court in that case seems to us to be entirely sound. Many cases are cited in support of the text at page 78 of 6 Cor. Jur., holding that attachment lies for goods or money embezzled or stolen, or obtained by other species of fraud. The doctrine of that text is also authority for the proposition that an action of assumpsit is an appropriate remedy in such case.

[5] The remaining ground for quashing the attachment is that the statement "fraudulently contracted the debt" is joined in the disjunctive with the statement "incurred the liability." Does this make the attachment affidavit bad? It is quite true that, where inconsistent or separate grounds of attachment are joined in the same affidavit, they must be joined in the conjunctive, for the reason that if the disjunctive is used the defendant is not apprised of which one of the grounds is relied upon; and then, too, the affidavit may be said not to contain an allegation that any ground exists, for the reason that the affiant only swears that one or the other of two or more grounds exist, but does not say which one. But this doctrine has no application where the statement contains but two or more phases of the same fact, or different facts of the same nature which constitute a single ground for the attachment. So it has been held that an affidavit is not defective because it states in the alternative different modes of effecting a stated purpose or intent, especially where in so doing it follows the language of the statute. 6 Cor. Jur. 136; 2 R. C. L. 833; Sandheger v. Hosey, 26 W. Va. 221; Shinn on Attachment & Garnishment, § 146; Drake on Attachments, § 102; Waples on Attachments & Garnishments, § 136. In this case the ground of attachment relied upon is that specified as the eighth ground in section 1, c. 106, and the fact that the defendant's alleged liability is charged to have arisen by fraudulently contracting the debt or incurring the liability is but two ways of stating the same substantive proposition, and under all of the authorities does not vitiate the affidavit.

Our conclusion therefore is to reverse the decree of the circuit court of Mineral county and remand the cause for further proper proceedings.

RAMSEY v. REID. (No. 3607.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 21, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

LICENSES. § 63—REVOCATION—EFFECT—REMOVAL OF STRUCTURES OR MOVABLES.

Though a license, conferring rights over the land of another, accepted and acted upon in good faith, may be revoked at the option of the licensor, the revocation effects only a discontinuance of the right to the future exercise and enjoyment of the privilege, and does not, in the absence of facts or circumstances indicating a contrary intention, prevent the licensee from removing structures or other movable articles placed thereon by him in reliance on the license, especially where such right has been recognized by the licensor, provided he causes the removal within a reasonable time after the revocation.

Error to Circuit Court, Tucker County.

Detinue by W. W. Ramsey, Trustee, against P. J. Reid. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

A. R. Stallings, of Parsons, D. E. Cuppett, of Thomas, and Chas. D. Smith, of Parsons, for plaintiff in error.

Melvin G. Sperry, of Clarksburg, D. H. Hill Arnold, of Elkins, and A. Jay Valentine, of Parsons, for defendant in error.

LYNCH, J. Plaintiff sued in detinue to recover possession, if it can be had, and, if not, the value, of steel railroad rails, and obtained the judgment which defendant seeks to reverse. Rulings upon the admissibility of testimony admitted, instructions given, the statute of limitations pleaded, and the right of the plaintiff to a judgment on the merits of the cause of action averred in the declaration form the basis of the writ.

The Clover Run Lumber Company, owner of a large boundary of timber land in Tucker county, entered into negotiations with Welch Brothers of Gowanda, N. Y., owners of a neighboring or adjoining tract, for the purpose of acquiring a right of way through it for a railroad for the transportation of lumber manufactured from the timber on the lumber company's land for shipment to market over the railroad of the West Virginia Central Railroad Company, now owned and operated by the Western Maryland Railway Company. To establish the grant of such right or privilege to construct and operate the lumber railroad over the Welch Brothers' land, that being a fact material to a correct determination of the issue raised by the pleadings, plaintiff, over objection, was permitted to and did introduce in evidence two letters, the body of each of which, and the signature of Welch Brothers, and the initials "T. F. W." or "T. F. Welch," thereto subscribed were typewritten. The letters apparently were written at Gowanda, N. Y., on July 17 and 26, 1902, mailed where written, and addressed to L. Hansford, attorney at law, Parsons, W. Va., the county seat of Tucker county. Hansford and Welch Brothers died before the trial of the action, and of course did not testify.

The letters, it is true, were part only of the correspondence between Welch Brothers and Hansford for permission to use the land owned by the former in the manner indicated, the ground of the objection to their admissibility being the failure of the plaintiff to introduce all of the correspondence on that subject. The first letter introduced purports to be a reply to a request in writing by Hansford, acting presumably for the Clover Run Lumber Company, for a statement of the conditions upon which the grant of the right of way would be given or could be secured, and the second to explain or offer some modification of the conditions embodied in the first.

Omitting the formal and unnecessary portions, the July 17th letter says:

"We will give the parties of whom you speak, if they wish it, the right or [of] way to build a tramroad across our land on the following conditions: They are to cut as little timber as possible in laying their tram, and they to pay us the full value in cash for all timber cut; they also to pay any damage done to the land; second, they are to allow us or our assigns to use the tramroad at any time on fair terms, and if they refuse to do so, we are to cancel the right of way. After they have finished with the tramroad, the same is to remain on the land for our use until we remove our timber. We think that this will probably be satisfactory, as we certainly mean it to be fair. If they wish to build the tram, please advise us."

The second says:

"We have your favor of the 23rd inst. The objection to the terms of the right of way which you mention is a good one. We would hardly expect them to leave such a road as you say they are going to lay there, after they finish, for an indefinite length of time. We would like to have the privilege of using it for a reasonable length of time, which we no doubt can agree upon."

The genuineness of the letters and authenticity and competency as proof seems to be attested and established fully and completely by what subsequently was done pursuant to the negotiations, and upon the faith and belief implied in and based upon them, and from the fact that Welch Brothers consented to permit the use of their lands for the construction and operation of the road, and that if Hansford did not disclose the name of the person or client in whose behalf he wrote the letters, replied to by Welch Brothers, acts later done identified the Clover Run Lumber Company as the applicant for the right of way. It built the road over its own land and over other land severally owned by Welch Brothers, Dasher, Williams, and Phillips to intersect with the road of the Western Maryland Railway Company at or near Parsons, with which it obtained switch connection, and began and continued to operate the railroad over all the tracts of land mentioned for the transportation and delivery of lumber manufactured by it from the timber on its lands until in March, 1905, when it sold and conveyed all its property, real and personal, in Tucker county, including the sawmill, equipment, and appliances of every kind and description, and the railroad and railroad rights of way, to the Snowden-Gardner Lumber Company, and as did this company also during several years thereafter, and until plaintiff acquired the property, as hereinafter set forth.

In 1906 Welch Brothers sold and conveyed to J. M. McLaughlin the tract owned by them over which the railroad was built and operated, and also another tract not involved in this action. The deed of grant, after describing the tract first mentioned as being in Tucker county, W. Va., contains this paragraph:

"This conveyance of the above-described tract is made subject to a right of way across the same heretofore given to the Clover Run Lumber Company for a railroad upon terms and conditions, but all the rights of the parties of the first part under the agreement for said right of way are hereby conveyed to the party of the second part hereto."

By the express terms of this deed McLaughlin acquired the property subject to the right of way across the same, but he was also granted the privilege mentioned in the correspondence on the part of Welch Brothers, as shown by the two letters admitted in evidence; that is, the right of Welch Brothers and their assigns to use the railroad so constructed and operated in hauling the lumber cut from the timber on the Welch Brothers' tract to the Western Maryland Railway for shipment to market, for which use the lumber road was to remain a reasonable time after the Clover Run Lumber Company or its assigns should complete their lumber operations.

Another significant fact bearing upon the same question is the action of Welch Brothers to recover of the Clover Run Lumber Company for damage done and timber removed by them in the construction of the road in violation of the agreement, for which by way of compromise the Clover Run Lumber Company paid to the plaintiff thereon $338. Another confirmatory circumstance of the same general character is that after McLaughlin had acquired Welch Brothers' title, and after the plaintiff in this action had acquired the title to the land and equipment formerly owned by the Clover Run Lumber Company, McLaughlin sold the timber on the Welch tract to Wildman, who applied to the plaintiff and was given the right to use the railroad over the Welch tract to haul the timber cut by him thereon to the main line of the Western Maryland, thus recognizing plaintiff's ownership and control of the railroad and railroad rails, the latter being the subject-matter of this action. Wildman availed himself of the right given by the plaintiff, and, before this cause of action arose, had completed the cutting and hauling of the lumber sold to him by McLaughlin.

As still further establishing the genuineness of the letters referred to before and the connection of Hansford and the Clover Run Lumber Company with them, there is the letter of Welch Brothers to A. J. Valentine, the attorney who represented them in the sale of their tract to McLaughlin. It is dated November 10, 1906, and was in reply to a letter written by Valentine to them, asking concerning the rights of the Clover Run Lumber Company over the tract. In it they say:

"There was no former [formal] contract for right of way with the Clover Run Lumber Company. We simply gave them by letter the right to run their railroad over the land to remove their timber, they to cut as little timber as possible in doing it, and to pay for all timber cut in doing it, to pay us all damages and we have the right to use the railroad in getting off our timber on fair terms, but they were not obliged to let their railroad remain after done with it. You can get the letter from Mr. Hansford."

These facts seem to foreclose any and all questions that might arise as to the grant of the permission or privilege, if not a right of way, over the Welch tract, the nature and character of which is reserved for later discussion.

The title to the property, real and personal, of every character and description owned by the Clover Run Lumber Company, including the rails in dispute, all of which the latter had conveyed to the Gardner-Snowden Lumber Company, March, 1905, for which it executed its notes for the deferred payments, plaintiff acquired through the decrees of sale and confirmation, entered in a suit in which he was the plaintiff, to enforce the lien reserved in the deed, and at which sale he became the purchaser, and the commissioners appointed to sell and authorized to convey the property executed to him a deed June 20, 1908. This deed granted the land, the buildings thereon, sawmill, lumber, tools, appliances, improvements, and specifically "the railroad extending from the Western Maryland Railroad near Parsons to the sawmill located on said land, with the appliances, locomotives and everything belonging thereto or used in connection therewith, with all rights of way used in connection with said railroad, or belonging to the Clover Run Lumber Company or the Gardner-Snowden Lumber Company, and all property of every kind and character whatsoever belonging to the said Clover Run Lumber Company or to the Gardner-Snowden Lumber Company, and by the decree of sale hereinbefore referred to decreed to be sold." Thus the plaintiff became vested with the title to every item of property owned and used by either of the two companies named in the deed to him; and, what is important now, the right, whatever it may properly be denominated, to operate the railroad over the Welch Brothers' land, or, if not to operate it, the right to remove the rails used in its construction, unless, as the defendant contends, that right has since been lost because of the statutory bar.

The statute of limitations has not and cannot have any application to the facts proved. McLaughlin took title to the land acquired by him with full knowledge and notice of the existence of the railroad thereon, a visible incumbrance on the property, and with the information imparted by the Welch Brothers' deed that he took it subject to the Clover Run Lumber Company's right of way, though he acquired Welch Brothers' rights therein, i. e., the right to use the same upon fair terms. Pocahontas Tanning Co. v. St. Lawrence Boom & Mfg. Co., 63 W. Va. 685, 60 S. E. 890. McLaughlin's vendee of the timber obtained from the plaintiff the right to use the railroad, and did use it to haul the lumber manufactured from the timber purchased by him to the railroad for the purpose of further transportation to market, and such use continued until well within the statutory period.

Nor has there been an abandonment of the lumber road by the plaintiff or by those through whom he derived title to the property, since which time he has always asserted a right to its enjoyment, and through his agent, McDonald, kept it under his surveillance, protection, and dominion.

There is some discussion as to the effect of the right conferred upon the Clover Run Lumber Company to use the lands of Welch Brothers for the purpose of the construction and operation of a lumber road, a road owing no duty to the public, a mere private way to haul lumber; that is, whether the grant or concession of the right created an easement or constituted a license only. It has some and does not have other characteristics of an easement, although the parties evidently so considered it. It was described as a right of way in the deed to McLaughlin and in the decrees in the chancery cause referred to, and in the deed to the plaintiff; and it may be, but we do not say, because not necessary, that the doctrine of estoppel applies. The right, however, seems also to partake of the nature of a license or of a mere temporary privilege to be exercised for a particular purpose subject to termination when that purpose is accomplished. Indeed, the difference between an easement and a license is subtle, shadowy, and elusive. Whether the one or the other, this much is beyond cavil or dispute; the right given was accepted apparently and acted upon in good faith by the Clover Run Lumber Company, and in pursuance thereof it made expensive outlays preparatory to the performance of the intended service, and when so prepared used it with the knowledge and acquiescence of the landowners and their privies in title, and by some of the latter permissively, until the defendant at the direction of McLaughlin removed and sold the rails in question.

Even if plaintiff's rights over the Welch tract constituted merely a license, a question which we do not decide, the rule that a licensee is entitled to remove his property and a reasonable time within which to cause its removal seems well settled. A license may be revocable at the option of the licensor, but the revocation effects only a discontinuance of the privileges granted by the license so far as their future exercise and enjoyment are concerned, and does not prevent the licensee from removing structures or other articles of value which he has constructed or placed on the land in reliance on the license, in the absence of facts or circumstances indicating an intention that the structures or articles should not be removed, especially where the licensee's right to remove has been expressly recognized. Fischer v. Johnson, 106 Iowa, 181, 76 N. W. 658; Watson v. Empire Engineering Corp., 77 Misc. Rep. 543, 137 N. Y. Supp. 231; Dame v. Dame, 33 N. H. 429, 75 Am. Dec. 195; Shipley v. Fink, 102 Md. 219, 229, 62 Atl. 360, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1002; Pitzman v. Boyce, 111 Mo. 387, 398, 19 S. W. 1104, 33 Am. St. Rep. 536; G. F. W. W. Co. v. G. N. Ry. Co., 21 Mont. 487, 504, 54 Pac. 963. In Putnam v. State, 132 N. Y. 344, 30 N. E. 743, the court required compensation to the plaintiff for an injury to his property by acts amounting to the revocation of a parol license, the court saying:

"He was entitled to reasonable notice and opportunity to remove the boats, and, unless it appeared that in some way he had waived or surrendered such rights, he had a valid claim for damages against the state."

In view of all the circumstances detailed, the expenditures occasioned by the exercise of the permission granted, the compensation rendered, the benefits accruing to McLaughlin and to his assignee of the timber, in that the road afforded an available means to convey it to the railroad and thence to market, an opportunity which doubtless enhanced the value of the land and timber, his failure to revoke the license, if revocable, and give notice of the revocation, and the fact that the right to remove the lumber road is expressly recognized in the letters to Hansford, we are of opinion that the judgment is so clearly right that it ought to be affirmed, notwithstanding the peremptory instruction of which defendant complains withdrew from the jury the main fact of ownership, and left for their determination only the question of value.

Judgment affirmed.

BARNA v. GLEASON COAL & COKE CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 21, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE ⇨528(2)—DAMAGES.

In an action for damages for personal injuries the opinion evidence of a physician or surgeon as to the nature of the injuries, and whether permanent or temporary, is competent on the question of damages recoverable in the action.

2. EVIDENCE ⇨470—INCOMPETENT EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Opinion evidence of non-expert witnesses as to matters of which the jury are as competent to judge as the witness on facts given in evidence is not as a general rule competent to go to the jury.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1053(1)—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—STRIKING EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

The admission of evidence, oral or documentary, subject to future rulings of the court in the progress of the trial, and subsequently stricken out and not allowed to be read or considered by the jury, does not constitute prejudicial error calling for reversal of the judgment, when it does not clearly appear that the objecting party has been prejudiced by such rulings of the court thereon.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1066—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

The giving of an instruction when there is any appreciable evidence tending to support it does not as a general rule constitute reversible error. If there is no evidence on the subject of such instruction the rule is otherwise.

5. TRIAL ⇨252(2) — EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS.

If there is any appreciable evidence tending to support the theory of an instruction, the giving of it does not constitute reversible error, though it turns out on the final test that such evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict.

6. NEGLIGENCE ⇨136(5) — EVIDENCE — DIRECTED VERDICT.

Where the evidence of negligence on which recovery is sought is so indefinite and uncertain as not to warrant a verdict thereon, the court should on motion of defendant direct a verdict in his favor, and not to do so constitutes error calling for reversal and the award of a new trial.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1064(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—MODIFICATIONS.

Where an instruction proposed is modified so as not to change its meaning or effect, and given as modified, such modification does not constitute reversible error.

8. WAR ⇨10(2)—ALIENAGE—PLEADING.

The fact appearing during the trial that the plaintiff, who has resided in this country for many years, was born in a country against which since suit brought this country has declared war, does not prove alienage. The fact that plaintiff is an alien enemy is defensive and ordinarily unavailing without timely plea.

Error to Circuit Court, Mineral County.

Action by Ambros Barna against the Gleason Coal & Coke Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded.

Taylor Morrison, of Keyser, and Albert A. Daub, of Cumberland, Md., for plaintiff in error.

Arthur Arnold, of Piedmont, and W. C. Grimes, of Keyser, for defendant in error.

MILLER, P. Writ of error to the judgment of the circuit court of Mineral county in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $7,583.33½. The action was one in case for alleged injuries sustained by plaintiff while employed as a miner in defendant's coal mine, due to the alleged negligence of defendant pleaded in the declaration. The only plea by defendant on which issue was joined was not guilty.

The only grounds of action, averred in the two counts, or paragraphs, of the declaration are the neglect of the general duty of defendant to use reasonable care and skill in providing plaintiff with a reasonably safe place to work, and to use all due care, caution and diligence to prevent danger, accident and injury to him while so employed, and to that end to cause all loose coal, slate and slack, stone and sand overhead in the rooms, air courses, drifts, passage ways and working places in said mine to be removed or carefully secured with sufficient props and stays to keep the coal, slate, slack, stone and earth hanging loosely about the roof of said mine from falling upon him, and negligently, carelessly and knowingly assigning and directing him to work in a place in said mine known to be dangerous, and whereby he sustained his injuries.

[1-3] To reverse the judgment several points of error are relied on. The first relates to certain opinion evidence of Dr. Kemp, as to the permanency of plaintiff's injuries, and that he would never again be able to pursue his occupation of coal miner to the evidence of plaintiff that if he had been allowed to put down additional track as he desired, he would not have been injured, and to the striking out of certain of the evidence of defendant's witness Rinker, who after describing the condition of the mine previous to plaintiff's injuries, undertook to give it as his opinion that the mine where plaintiff was at work was in fine condition, the court ruling that all his evidence describing the condition of the mine should remain, but that his opinion evidence should be excluded. The alleged discrimination against the defendant in these rulings is emphasized by counsel for defendant as prejudicial.

The exception to Dr. Kemp's testimony is clearly without merit. Proper elements of damages in such cases are the nature of the injuries, and whether permanent or only temporary. Who is better qualified to speak on this subject than an attending physician and surgeon? That such evidence of a medical expert based on actual knowledge of the facts or facts proven by others is admissible is supported by the great weight of authority. Norfolk Ry. & Light Co. v. Spratley, 103 Va. 379, 49 S. E. 502; Perkins v. Monong. Tract. Co., 81 W. Va. 781, 95 S. E. 797; Holman v. Union St. Ry. Co., 114 Mich. 208, 72 N. W. 202; 2 Enc. Evidence, 848; Carthage Tpke. Co. v. Andrews, 102 Ind. 138, 1 N. E. 364, 52 Am. Rep. 653; Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Crist, 116 Ind. 446, 19 N. E. 310, 2 L. R. A. 450, 9 Am. St. Rep. 865; Fay v. Harlan, 128 Mass. 244, 35 Am. Rep. 372; Buel v. New York Cent. R. Co., 31 N. Y. 314, 68 Am. Dec. 271.

Respecting the evidence of the plaintiff, that if he had been permitted to lay the track he desired he would not have gotten hurt, while he was an experienced coal miner, his opinion was hardly competent. Besides, the facts as to how and where he proposed to lay the track are very poorly developed, and how the laying thereof would have prevented his injury does not appear from the facts proven. If upon another trial the question becomes material, which we do not now see, he should be confined to stating all the facts and allow the jury to draw their own conclusions from them. On the same principle we see no error in the ruling of the court in respect to the opinion evidence of defendant's witness Rinker.

The next point urged is that after defendant had admitted on the record that it was in default to the Workmen's Compensation Fund at the time of plaintiff's injuries, the court over its objection permitted plaintiff to prove by the witness Topping of the Compensation Commissioner's office the same fact, and to introduce the record and also the correspondence with defendant relating to such default. It is admitted that this documentary evidence, admitted subject to the future ruling of the court, was not read to the jury, and that by defendant's instruction No. 7 given to the jury, all this evidence except the bare fact that the defendant had defaulted to the Workmen's Compensation Fund and was not a member thereof in good standing at the time plaintiff was injured, and also the fact that defendant had continued to deduct from plaintiff's wages his share of the premium, was stricken out and was not allowed to go to the jury. Nevertheless it is insisted that all of the facts got to the jury's ears to the prejudice of defendant, and that the verdict ought to be set aside on this account. We cannot agree with counsel on this proposition. How this evidence not read to the jury could have prejudiced defendant does not sufficiently appear. Courts frequently in the course of trials are obliged to admit evidence subject to future rulings. When better advised the course is to modify the rulings thereon. We are cited to no authority supporting the point and we find none.

[4, 5] Next in order are the several points as to the giving and refusing of instructions. And first respecting plaintiff's instructions, twelve asked, ten only given. It is affirmed of them generally that they are not complete and are not predicated upon the pleadings and proofs in the case. Respecting Nos. 1, 2, and 3 it is said as of the rest of those given, that they too much assume negligence, that they are abstract. It is not denied that each states correctly the general law of negligence. The objection is that they are objectionable in not limiting their application to the acts of negligence alleged and as to which there was at least some degree of proof. We do not find that it has ever been held reversible error to give an instruction general in terms if there is any evidence to which it may be applied. The rule invoked by defendant's counsel is applicable where the instruction is so indefinite as to be misleading and there is no evidence in the case on which such instruction can be properly predicated. Bond v. Balto. & Ohio R. R. Co., 96 S. E. 932; Suttle v. Hope Nat. Gas Co., 97 S. E. 429, 432; Lawrence v. Hyde, 77 W. Va. 639, 645, 88 S. E. 45; Blashfield's Instructions to Juries, chap. VIII. See, also, 7 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. 720, and the numerous cases there digested. Although the evidence of negligence may not be sufficient to justify a verdict, yet if there be any evidence to which the instructions may apply, the trial court may submit them to the jury. Of course if there is no evidence at all to which they can go, they should be refused as misleading. Squillace v. Tidewater Coal & Coke Co., 64 W. Va. 337, 349 et seq., and cases cited at page 350, 62 S. E. 446. We have no hesitation in saying however that the practice ought in all cases to limit the instructions to the facts pleaded and claimed to have been proved. Stating the law in the abstract is calculated to mislead and bring about verdicts not warranted by allegata and probata.

Of instruction No. 5 it is pointed out not only that it is too general and abstract on the question of negligence but that by the language "and if you believe from the evidence that the defendant failed to do what, under the circumstances and facts in evidence the jury may believe was incumbent on its part to do, in order to keep the room or place in which plaintiff worked in a reasonably safe condition in that nature of business, and that the injury to the plaintiff was directly caused by such failure then the jury should find for the plaintiff," the court left it to the jury to say what is negligence, a question for the court, and not alone whether there was negligence. This exact instruction was approved in Russell Creek Coal Co. v. Wells, 96 Va. 416, 31 S. E. 614. It limits the finding of the jury to the facts and circumstances in evidence. It defines negligence and then tells the jury in the language quoted what the law is if they find the facts proven show neglect of duty. If there is any degree of evidence supporting the theory of an instruction, it is not error to give it, although it turns out on the final test not sufficient to support the verdict. State v. Clifford, 59 W. Va. 1, 52 S. E. 981, syl. 6; Snedeker v. Rulong, 69 W. Va. 223, 226, 71 S. E. 180; Jones v. Riverdale Bridge Co., 70 W. Va. 374, 380, 73 S. E. 942.

Instructions Nos. 6 and 7 were predicated on the theory that there was evidence tending to show defendant had negligently allowed coal to hang loose in the roof of the mine over the working place where plaintiff was employed, rendering the place unsafe, which fell on him and caused his injuries. On this theory and the very slight evidence thereof, the instruction may not be erroneous. No. 6 seems to have been approved in Hansell-Elcock F. Co. v. Clark, 115 Ill. App. 209, 212, affirmed by 214 Ill. 399, 73 N. E. 787. No. 7 is substantially the same as No. 6, and if supported by the facts proven, would justify a finding in favor of plaintiff, since the enactment of section 26, chapter 15P of Barnes' Code (Code 1913, c. 15P, § 26 [sec. 682]), De Francesco v. Piney Mining Co., 76 W. Va. 756, 86 S. E. 777; Yates v. Coal & Coke Co., 76 W. Va. 50, 84 S. E. 626.

Is plaintiff's instruction No. 8 erroneous? It is predicated on the theory of negligence in failure to have a competent mine foreman and negligence in the performance of his duties, a fact not alleged in the declaration as the basis of recovery. It is contended for plaintiff that failure to employ a competent mine foreman is comprehended in the general allegation of neglect to furnish a safe place to work, and to use all due care, caution and diligence to prevent danger, accident and injury to plaintiff, and failure to operate said mine with reasonable safety and ordinary care. We do not think so. But as the law now is, since the enactment of the Workmen's Compensation Law, whether or not the defendant employed a competent mine foreman is immaterial, and the instruction in its final paragraph tells the jury that the negligence of the mine foreman no longer excuses a defendant who has failed to comply with the Workmen's Compensation Act (Code 1913, c. 15P, §§ 1-55 [secs. 657-711]). De Francesco v. Piney Mining Co., supra.

Plaintiff's instruction No. 9 was erroneously given. It is predicated on the theory that Brown, superintendent, directed plaintiff to work in a dangerous and unsafe place, knowing it to be dangerous, as a result of which he sustained his injuries. If it was true, which Brown denies, that he gave such direction, plaintiff's own evidence is that he was not at work at the place where Brown is alleged to have directed him, namely, on the right side of the entry, but on the left side contrary to such directions. So there was no evidence to support this theory. The instruction is based on the principles enunciated in De Francesco v. Piney Mining Co., supra, and Louis v. Smith-McCormick Const. Co., 80 W. Va. 159, 92 S. E. 249, and other cases that if the master with knowledge thereof directs his servant to work in a dangerous place resulting in his injury, the master is liable. But as the evidence justifies no such theory, the instruction was erroneous and misleading, and ought not to have been given. Instruction No. 10 is substantially the same as No. 9 and amenable to the same criticism, and the court erroneously gave that instruction to the jury.

[8, 7] We have next to consider the defendant's instructions. Instruction No. 1, directing a verdict for defendant, was refused. We are of opinion on the record now presented that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the verdict. Plaintiff's case rested mainly if not entirely on his own evidence. The main if not the only theory on which his counsel relies to sustain the judgment is that he sustained his injuries by the fall of coal from the roof over the place in the mine where he was at work loading slate and stone into cars placed on the track for that purpose, which should have been discovered and removed by defendant, and not at the face of the coal which had been undercut and which he was required to take out. Slight evidence given by plaintiff on his examination in chief tends in some slight degree to support this theory. When asked where the bad place was in the roof with reference to the track, he answered, "Just above the track," but he immediately says that the place could not have been propped up because he could not put a prop in the middle of the track, that he could not put a post where he had to shovel coal. He admits he had been directed to work on the right side of the entry, but when he was injured he was working on the left side. His evidence is that if he had been allowed to shoot down the loose coal and to have put the track up, he would have escaped injury. He says however that the condition of the mine was good on Monday but had become dangerous by Saturday by reason of the coal which he wanted to shoot down becoming loose. Whether this loose coal was coal left by him in the roof back of his working place and over the track already built or at the face of the upper of the two seams from under which he had shot down the lower seam and the slate and stone binders of the two seams existing in the mine, his evidence in chief leaves in grave doubt. But on cross-examination he seems to make it clear that the coal that fell upon him was not the coal left by him over previous cuttings, but the upper seam of coal lastly undercut for him, which had become loose in his mining out part of the under seam and the binder of stone or slate and shot down and removed by him; for he says distinctly that it was not rock which fell on him, but coal. When asked if he had not taken out the coal itself, he said "Yes," and had loaded it onto the cars, and that the upper seam described by him as "big coal" fell on him. He does say it was roof coal that fell on him, but his evidence clearly indicates that the roof coal referred to was the upper seam of coal which it was his duty to mine out as well as the lower seam. The evidence shows that the machine man a day or two before plaintiff was injured undercut the lower seam to the depth of six feet, and then it was the duty of the plaintiff to shoot down the lower seam and load it, and then the binder and remove it, and then to shoot down the upper seam and load it, and the manner of doing this was to pick it out and not go under where the coal was liable at any time to fall on him. It is conceded that if it was the upper seam of this coal which fell and did the injury, as one or two witnesses for defendant positively swore, defendant was guilty of no negligence, but plaintiff's injuries were due solely to his own negligence in going under the overhanging coal. The plaintiff admits that the coal could not be propped up while mining it out. So that as the facts now appear on the record, we must hold that no negligence was shown on the part of defendant on which a verdict for plaintiff can stand. Whatever the facts on another trial may show, there is no evidence in this record on which a verdict for plaintiff can safely be predicated.

Respecting defendant's instruction No. 5, modified by the court and given as No. 8, we see no error in the modification prejudicial to defendant's rights. The instruction as asked and as modified mean one and the same thing. As offered it would have told the jury that if plaintiff's injuries were caused wholly by his own conduct, he could not recover. The amendment introduced the words "and was not contributed to by negligence on the part of the defendant company or its officers, agents or employes." Of course if plaintiff's injuries were caused wholly by his own act, they could not have been contributed to by defendant. The instruction was good as offered and was not changed in meaning by the modification, although the modification was not necessary.

The next point to be considered is the action of the court in overruling defendant's motion to set aside the verdict of the jury and award it a new trial. The first ground was that the verdict was without evidence to support it. As we have decided in disposing of the defendant's instructions that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a verdict for plaintiff, we are of opinion that the point was well taken and should have been sustained. The other grounds assigned for a motion for a new trial, we have already considered and disposed of.

[8] Lastly, the point is made that plaintiff is an alien enemy and that any judgment in his favor ought not to prevail on principles of international law and public policy. This point was not raised by the pleadings or otherwise by proof except on cross-examination by defendant plaintiff answered that he was born in Austria. Defendant excuses itself for not having pleaded this fact at the trial on the ground of ignorance thereof and want of opportunity. But this is an untenable position, for under our practice pleadings may be amended at any time during the trial if substantial justice will thereby be promoted. The fact admitted, that plaintiff was born in Austria, does not prove alienage, and though an alien, if residing in this country since 1904, as plaintiff proved he had been, and conducting himself properly, he is not precluded from maintaining suits in the courts to vindicate his rights. Mittelstadt v. Kelly, 202 Mich. 524, 188 N. W. 501; Arndt-Ober v. Metropolitan Opera Co., 182 App. Div. 518, 169 N. Y. Supp. 944; Krachanake v. Acme Mfg. Co., 175 N. C. 435, 95 S. E. 851. But we need not consider this question further, for if the fact is as alleged by defendant, and it becomes material, it can upon the new trial be ordered be presented by proper plea.

For the errors found in the rulings of the trial court, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded.

JENNINGS v. McDOUGLE, Judge, et al.
(No. 3785.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 21, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DIVORCE ⚡77—VENUE—PROCESS—STATUTE.

The option granted by section 7, c. 64 (sec. 3642) Code Supp. 1918, to the plaintiff in a divorce suit, of suing in a county other than that of the residence of the defendant, in case the parties last cohabited in the county so selected, carries with it by necessary implication the right to direct process to the sheriff of the county where defendant resides for service upon him there.

2. DIVORCE ⚡66—VENUE—STATUTE.

The general jurisdiction of a circuit court to grant divorces is circumscribed and limited by that part of section 7, c. 64 (sec. 3642) Code Supp. 1918, which provides that, if the defendant is a resident of this state, "the suit shall be brought in the county in which the parties last cohabited, or (at the option of the plaintiff) in the county in which the defendant resides."

3. DIVORCE ⚡66—VENUE—OPTION—STATUTE.

By section 7, c. 64 (sec. 3642) Code Supp. 1918, there is but one circumstance or condition the existence of which confers upon the plaintiff in a divorce suit the right to compel the defendant to go out of the county of his or her residence to defend a suit for divorce brought in some other county.

4. DIVORCE ⚡90—JURISDICTIONAL FACTS—PLEADING.

Where the jurisdiction of a court to grant a divorce depends upon the existence of certain facts, such facts must be pleaded, and, if not pleaded, the court has no right or power to proceed or act in the cause.

5. DIVORCE ⚡90—VENUE—PLEADING.

The mere allegation of separation, abandonment, desertion, and refusal of cohabitation in a county is not the equivalent of an allegation that the parties last cohabited in such county.

6. DIVORCE ⚡66—JURISDICTION—VENUE—"IN THE COUNTY IN WHICH THE PARTIES LAST COHABITED."

The phrase "in the county in which the parties last cohabited," used in the statute, necessarily means the place where the parties ceased to live together as husband and wife in the same house, and ordinarily carries with it the idea of a substantial measure of continuity and regularity.

7. PLEADING ⚡290(5) — VERIFICATION — AMENDMENT—STATUTE.

When a statute requires all pleadings to be verified by the party in whose name they are filed (section 8, c. 64 [sec. 3643] Code Supp. 1918), an amendment of a pleading, especially if material and necessary to confer jurisdiction, must be verified, and, if not verified, will be disregarded.

8. PROHIBITION ⚡10(2)—JURISDICTION IN DIVORCE SUIT—PLEADING AND PROOF.

Where the allegations of a bill in a divorce suit are sufficient to show prima facie jurisdiction, the rulings of the lower court upon facts offered to prove the allegations are, at most, only erroneous, and therefore not correctable by writ of prohibition; but where, as in this case, the allegation of essential jurisdictional facts is omitted, the lower court is wholly without jurisdiction in the cause, and where the court is assuming and continuing to act without such allegations, prohibition will issue to restrain such action.

9. PROHIBITION ⚡17—JURISDICTION IN DIVORCE SUIT—PLEADING AND PROOF.

Nor in such a case will the writ be delayed to give plaintiff time to correct the bill by proper amendment.

10. PROHIBITION ⚡3(1)—OTHER REMEDIES—ACTION OF COURT WITHOUT JURISDICTION.

When a court is attempting to proceed in a cause without jurisdiction, prohibition will issue as a matter of right regardless of the existence of other remedies.

Petition for prohibition by Charles P. Jennings against Hon. Walter McDougale, Judge, etc., and others. Writ awarded.

A. F. McCue, of Clarksburg, and Smith D. Turner, of Parkersburg, for petitioner.

Chas. E. Hogg, of Point Pleasant, for respondents.

LYNCH, J. The petitioner, husband of the respondent Beryl Jennings, plaintiff in a divorce suit brought against him in the circuit court of Wood county, prays in his petition for a writ of prohibition to prevent her from further prosecuting the suit in that county, and Hon. Walter E. McDougle, judge of the circuit court in which the suit was brought, from the continued assumption of judicial authority to hear and determine issues arising therein; the ground for the writ being want of jurisdiction to entertain the cause.

After their marriage in Cincinnati September 5, 1912, petitioner and his wife began and continued to cohabit together as husband and wife in Doddridge county until some time in December, 1914, a fact the truth of which is not anywhere controverted, "at which time," according to the allegations of the bill, "they separated, and have not since cohabited, that said separation took place in Parkersburg, and that the said defendant has during the greater portion of time since said separation resided in Doddridge county," and also "that on the ——— day of December, 1914, in Wood county, the said defendant willfully, without any just cause therefor deserted and abandoned this plaintiff, and has ever since, and doth now, willfully refuse to live and cohabit with this plaintiff as her husband." The process to answer was issued by the clerk of the circuit court of Wood county and directed to the sheriff of Doddridge county, and by him served on the defendant at his place of residence in Doddridge county. Indeed, his residence elsewhere either permanent or temporary seems manifestly doubtful.

[1-4] These are the sole facts alleged by the plaintiff in the divorce suit to empower the circuit court of Wood county to take cognizance of the cause averred for relief and to determine the matters in controversy and decree divorce from the matrimonial bonds; the grounds assigned therefor being willful abandonment and desertion without just cause and disloyalty to the marriage vows. Nowhere in the bill is there any other statement or declaration which shows or tends to show such or any cohabitation as warranted the bringing of the suit in any county except the county of defendant's residence. The statute prescribing the jurisdiction of circuit courts in divorce cases (chapter 64, § 7 [sec. 3642] Code Supp. 1918) is:

"The suit shall be brought in the county in which the parties last cohabited, or (at the option of the plaintiff) in the county in which the defendant resides, if a resident of this state; but, if not, then in the county in which plaintiff resides."

This provision circumscribes and limits the jurisdiction of circuit courts to grant divorces by three specific conditions—two where defendant resides in this state; one where he is a nonresident of the state. As between the first two plaintiff had the option or the right to select in which of two counties she should prosecute the suit, the first in the county in which she and her husband last cohabited together as husband and wife, if such cohabitation last occurred in a county other than that in which he resided; but, if it did not, then she could sue only in the county of his residence. The statute is susceptible of no other construction. Its language is imperative, unambiguous, and specific. It designates the forum and limits the jurisdiction to two counties, and only two, where the party in default is a resident of the state, notwithstanding the general jurisdiction of circuit courts. There is but one circumstance or condition the existence of which confers upon the plaintiff in a divorce suit the right to compel the defendant to go out of the county of his or her residence to defend a suit brought in some other county for a divorce, or to defend against charges such as are lodged against defendant, except when and as allowed by statute; and to bring her cause within the statutory requirements she must allege and prove the existence of the fact prescribed by the statute in order to maintain her suit in such other county.

The obvious purpose section 7 had in view was to save the plaintiff the embarrassment, annoyance, and expense necessarily incident to the pursuit of a resident defendant, should he or she abandon or desert the other or otherwise disregard the marriage vows or duties and depart from the county where they last cohabited. The right given by it is one of the few exceptions to the general rule fixing the residence of the sole defendant, or the place where he may be found and served with process, as the situs of the forum where an action or suit may be maintained against him; and to bring herself or himself, as the case may be, within the exception, and to warrant the assumption or retention of jurisdiction of a divorce proceeding against a resident defendant, the plaintiff must allege in the bill the essential jurisdictional fact or facts. "When the jurisdiction of a court depends upon the existence of facts, it has no right or power to proceed or act upon a pleading which does not substantially set forth such facts." City of Charleston v. Littlepage, 73 W. Va. 156, 164, 80 S. E. 132, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 353; Burke v. Superior Court, 7 Cal. App. 178, 93 Pac. 1058; Hogan v. Superior Court, 16 Cal. App. 783, 791, 117 Pac. 947. Otherwise the cause is coram non judice. Acts done by a court which has no jurisdiction over the person, the cause, or the process are void. St. Lawrence Co. v. Holt & Mathews, 51 W. Va. 352, 363, 41 S. E. 351. Such, indeed, is the practically universal rule. See 13 C. J. 1235, and cases cited.

[5, 6] The mere allegation of separation, abandonment, desertion, and refusal of cohabitation in Wood county, an allegation relied on as the legal equivalent of an allegation of the last actual cohabitation, as contended for by counsel, falls far short of alleging such jurisdictional facts as warrant the assumption of jurisdiction by the circuit court of Wood county to entertain the cause. The place of separation, abandonment, desertion, and refusal of cohabitation and the place of the cessation of cohabitation by husband and wife need not necessarily be, and frequently are not, in the same county, and probably were not in this instance. No allegation of the bill shows the fact to be otherwise. A separation may occur anywhere, though the parties may have ceased to cohabit at some other place. The phrase "in the county in which the parties last cohabited," used in the statute, necessarily means the place where the parties ceased to live together as husband and wife in the same house, and ordinarily carries with it the idea of a substantial measure of temporal continuity. Calef v. Calef, 54 Me. 385, 92 Am. Dec. 549. There is no such inseparable and essential connection between the language used in the statute to designate the jurisdiction in divorce cases and the allegations of the bill as warrants the sanction of the substitution of the latter for the former. Abandonment, desertion, and the discontinuance of cohabitation and refusal to renew it are grounds prescribed by the statute for the dissolution of the marriage; but they do not singly or conjointly suffice to determine the forum within the meaning of the statutory provision. In them inheres no such conception as justifies their adoption as the legal equivalent of the statutory phrase "in the county where the parties last cohabited," and therefore it clearly appears that the fact necessary to confer jurisdiction upon the circuit court of Wood county has not substantially or effectually been alleged in the bill.

[7, 8] Plaintiff's counsel, in her absence and on the day petitioner applied for the writ, did attempt to supply this defect by an order entered of record amending the bill by supplying the necessary allegation, but, though the bill was verified as required by the divorce statute, the amendment was not. Amendments of pleadings become part thereof, and where, as in cases of this sort, the statute requires that "all pleadings shall be verified by the party in whose name they are filed" (section 8, c. 64 [sec. 3643] Code Supp. 1918), the attempt to amend the bill in the manner indicated necessarily proved abortive. Where pleadings are required to be verified, an amendment thereto, especially if material and necessary to confer jurisdiction, must be verified, and an amendment not verified will be disregarded. Foy v. Foy, 35 N. C. 90. Where a statute requires a pleading to be verified, an amendment must also be verified. Bland v. State (Tex. Civ. App.) 36 S. W. 914; Gregg v. Brower, 67 Ill. 525; McDougald v. Dougherty, 11 Ga. 570, 593; 1 Stand. Ency. of Proc. 904. To hold otherwise would enable a party by amendment to incorporate in a bill already sworn to certain facts essential to his case to which he may not be willing to give the sanction of an oath. Thus the whole purpose of verification could be defeated.

Clearly, therefore, the writ should go if the right thereto depends solely upon the bill of the plaintiff in the divorce proceedings. It does not make out a case cognizable in the circuit court of Wood county, and equally clearly defendant's demurrer to the bill should have been sustained, not overruled, as it was, and the cause dismissed if the bill was not amended properly by allegations sufficient to show jurisdiction in the lower court.

The defendant tendered and was permitted to file a paper called and purporting to be a plea in abatement to the jurisdiction. This plea the court adjudged to be defective on plaintiff's demurrer. The basis for the abatement was that, as the petitioner was the only party defendant and resided in Doddridge county, the process to answer could not lawfully be issued, directed to and served on him in any other county.

Whatever may be the rule upon the right put in issue and denied by the plea upon issuance of process in other cases, it seems necessary to observe only that, as the statute grants to plaintiff the option of suing in a county other than that of the residence of the defendant, in case they last cohabited in the county so selected by her, certainly the Legislature meant to authorize what was done to bring defendant before the court, provided it had jurisdiction of the cause of action, notwithstanding the construction of section 2, c. 123 (sec. 4735) Code 1913, indicating the contrary. If there be no such authority, as counsel contend, section 7, c. 64, Code Supp., granting the option to prosecute the suit where the parties last cohabited, is meaningless. The right of selection given by the statute carries with it the right to pursue the procedure necessary to convene the parties to the litigation.

And further, section 2, c. 124 (sec. 4738) Code, provides that "process from any court, whether original, mesne or final, may be directed to the sheriff of any county," excepting only such process as is issued under the provisions of section 2, c. 123, Code, which may not be directed to an officer of any other county than that wherein the action is brought; this still being upon the supposition of complete jurisdiction to determine the cause. Lawrence v. Hyde, 77 W. Va. 639, 88 S. E. 45. See, also, Marsh v. O'Brien, 96 S. E. 795. Thus by this statute (section 2, c. 124) original process, as well as mesne or final, may be directed to the sheriff of any county, unless the action be brought under section 2, c. 123, in which case it cannot be directed to the officer of any other county than that in which the action is brought, unless the defendant be a railroad or other corporation specified in the statute. In no wise does it qualify section 7, c. 64, Code Supp., under which this proceeding was instituted; hence process under it may be directed to a sheriff in the county where defendant resides or may properly be served. As the plea filed by defendant in abatement of the suit and his motion to quash the summons and return of service raise this and no other question, the ruling of the court was not improper.

But the plea and, as we have said, the demurrer to the bill sufficed to direct the court's attention: First, to the fact of the nonresidence of defendant within its territorial jurisdiction; and, second, to the absence from the bill of an allegation of such cohabitation of the parties as gave it jurisdiction of the cause and of the parties. They required such an examination of plaintiff's pleadings as must, except by inadvertence, have demonstrated the defects inhering in them, because of the omission to state therein a material and necessary fact.

Furthermore, it is said that, if the court has general jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the controversy, it has the power and may of right determine all other questions affecting jurisdiction, and that, when these are to be determined upon contested facts which the inferior tribunal is competent to inquire into and decide, prohibition will not be granted, though the court should be of opinion that the questions of fact have wrongfully been determined by the court below, and, if rightly determined, would have ousted the jurisdiction. Circuit courts, it is true, are courts of general jurisdiction, and as such may hear and determine suits for divorce. They do not have authority, however, or power to exercise jurisdiction in any divorce case if the defendant resides in a county outside of the circuit, unless the parties last cohabited in the county where the suit is brought, and unless such jurisdictional fact is made reasonably apparent by the bill itself, there is no occasion for the application of the rule contended for, because there are no contested facts to be determined. The bill vouches the fact of defendant's residence in Doddridge county at the time the suit was brought, and hence put the court upon its guard as to the second fact necessary to empower the court to proceed with the cause to final decree, the place of the last matrimonial cohabitation. There is no more real issue for the determination of the circuit court than there would be if it were conceded that the grounds upon which to rest the jurisdiction claimed had no existence as a matter of fact; for nothing can be more clear than that the lower court was powerless to entertain the bill because it did not allege a fact without which it could not proceed at all. It had no jurisdiction to determine any fact in controversy except that it was powerless to act in the absence of a showing of the grounds necessary to give it cognizance of the suit.

[9] It may be urged that plaintiffs should be given time to correct this defect in her bill by a proper amendment. That question, however, has been answered decisively by Judge Poffenbarger in City of Charleston v. Little- page, 73 W. Va. 156, 164, 80 S. E. 131, 135 (51 L. R. A. [N. S.] 353), where he says:

"That allegations of fact, when necessary to vest jurisdiction in a court, must be sufficient is an obvious corollary of the proposition just asserted. To say the court may act upon insufficient allegations, because they may be made sufficient by amendment, is clearly inconsistent with the rule or principle. The facts stated do not confer jurisdiction, and ability to amend is mere matter of surmise and conjecture. Nothing in the view of the court establishes it. Hence it is not a fact within the knowledge of the court. If it is permitted to act under such circumstances, it clearly acts without jurisdiction. To permit action upon such a bill or pleading will enable the court at any time to exercise jurisdiction in cases in which it has none. If it has power to retain for amendment and act upon the pleading, pending the process of amendment, the time allowable for amendment would be within its discretion and not reviewable. It might take a week, a month, or a year, during which there would be action without jurisdiction shown. The power to proceed at all depends upon certain facts, and they are not shown and may never be. If a court could act upon such a pleading, there would never be any lack of jurisdiction except in those cases in which it is denied by some statute or principle of law and is in no sense dependent upon facts."

See, also, Weil v. Black, 76 W. Va. 685, 86 S. E. 666, pt. 2, Syl.

It is further stated in the opinion in Charleston v. Littlepage, supra, 73 W. Va. 162, 80 S. E. 134, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 353:

"The rule is that, in passing upon the question of its own jurisdiction, a court always acts at its peril. Its decision upon that question affords it no protection from supervisory process from a higher court and confers no right upon the parties in whose favor the decision was rendered."

As in that case the court had acted upon the prayer of the bill in granting an injunction, when the allegations of the bill were insufficient to make out a case therefor, so here the circuit court of Wood county has assumed jurisdiction of the case and has acted thereon in awarding temporary alimony and suit money, and in referring the cause to a commissioner, as permitted by section 18, c. 64, and for the purposes therein specified, when the bill fails to aver facts essential to confer jurisdiction upon it. At page 163 of 73 W. Va., at page 135 of 80 S. E. (51 L. R. A. [N. S.] 353), in the opinion in Charleston v. Littlepage, supra, it is said:

"To warrant interposition by the writ of prohibition, it is only necessary to show that the inferior tribunal is actually proceeding or about to proceed in some matter in which it has no rightful jurisdiction. * * * Thus stated by courts everywhere, the terms of the rule preclude right to time for consideration after action, and authorize prevention of action without any allowance of time for consideration."

Because the circuit court has acted in awarding temporary alimony and suit money, with a petition now pending before the court to double the monthly allowance of the former and increase the latter, it readily appears that the remedy by the ordinary appellate process is inadequate. When such is the case, the remedy is by writ of prohibition. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483, 501; State v. Clark (Tex. Cr. App.) 187 S. W. 760, 767. But, irrespective of the adequacy or inadequacy of other remedies, when a court is attempting to proceed in a cause without jurisdiction, prohibition will issue as a matter of right regardless of the existence of other remedies. Chapter 110, § 1 (sec. 4518) Code; Marsh v. O'Brien, 96 S. E. 795; Wayland Oil & Gas Co. v. Rummel, 78 W. Va. 196, 88 S. E. 741; Weil v. Black, 76 W. Va. 685, 688, 86 S. E. 666; Charleston v. Littlepage, supra. As in the cases last cited, so in this the lower court has decided to permit plaintiff and to require defendant to proceed with the cause, notwithstanding the apparent want of authority on its part so to do. Depositions have been taken, apparently for the purpose of supplying omissions in the bill; at least the contention is that the proof taken shows the last place of cohabitation to have been in Wood county, payment of alimony and counsel fees required, and a second application pending for an increased amount of both, as if all questions affecting the court's jurisdiction were adjudicated, settled, and determined formally and completely.

[16] In awarding this writ we do not base our action upon the sufficiency or insufficiency of the proof adduced to show cohabitation in Wood county, and we express no opinion upon the evidence. That is a disputed question of fact, and plaintiff had not yet concluded her taking of depositions. But it is well settled that facts necessary to the conferring of jurisdiction in a divorce suit must be pleaded as well as proved, and proof cannot be considered to supply the omission of an allegation necessary to show jurisdiction. Stansbury v. Stansbury, 118 Mo. App. 427, 84 S. W. 566; Robinson v. Robinson, 149 Mo. App. 733, 129 S. W. 725; McGee v. McGee, 161 Mo. App. 40, 143 S. W. 77. In the case first cited the jurisdictional facts were indisputably established by the uncontradicted evidence, but, because not pleaded, the cause was reversed, and the whole proceeding held to be coram non iudice for lack of jurisdiction over the subject-matter. It is essential that the jurisdictional facts be adequately pleaded. Holton v. Holton, 64 Or. 290, 129 Pac. 532, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 779; Miller v. Miller, 55 Ind. App. 644, 104 N. E. 583; 2 Bishop, Marriage & Divorce, §§ 589-594. If the allegations of the bill had been sufficient to show prima facie jurisdiction, the ruling of the lower court upon the facts could have been, at most, only erroneous, and therefore not correctable by writ of prohibition.

Writ awarded.

BAILEY et al. v. TRIPLETT et al.
(No. 3544.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 21, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ARBITRATION AND AWARD ⇨57—AWARD—VALIDITY.

In making an award upon matters in controversy arbitrators are bound by the terms of the agreement submitting the questions to them. Such agreement is their charter of authority, and, if they make an award which violates or disregards some of the terms thereof, the same will not be upheld.

2. ARBITRATION AND AWARD ⇨29—AUTHORITY OF ARBITRATORS.

Where, in an agreement submitting to the determination of arbitrators the proper location of a disputed boundary line, the parties agree upon the method to be pursued in order for the proper location of such line, neither such arbitrators nor an umpire selected by them, in case they fail to agree, have authority to make an award arrived at by disregarding the agreements of the parties as to the method of solving the dispute, and substituting for such agreement in this regard the opinion of the arbitrators or the umpire as to the proper method therefor.

3. ARBITRATION AND AWARD ⇨65—CONFIRMATION OF AWARD.

Where the proper location of a disputed boundary line is submitted by the interested parties to arbitrators, with the provision that in case of their disagreement an umpire selected by them shall make the award, and they do disagree, and such umpire so selected makes an award in the alternative, finding that in his judgment the disputed boundary line properly located is at a certain place, but that if he follows the directions contained in the agreement signed by the parties the disputed boundary line is at a certain other place, the circuit court, upon being asked to enter judgment upon such award, will disregard the award made by the umpire based on his own opinion, and will enter judgment confirming that award, made in accordance with the methods agreed upon by the parties for the location of the disputed line, in the absence of fraud, mistake, or adventitious circumstances.

Error from Circuit Court, Mineral County.

Arbitration agreement entered of record, in circuit court between Susie M. Bailey and others and John J. Triplett and others for the determination of a disputed boundary line. From a judgment disregarding the umpire's award on his own opinion and confirming his award in the alternative according to directions contained in articles of submission, John J. Triplett and others bring error. Affirmed and remanded.

W. H. Griffith and R. A. Welch, both of Keyser, for plaintiffs in error.

W. C. Grimes, of Keyser, for defendants in error.

RITZ, J. On the 6th day of March, 1789, James Dawson procured a patent for a tract containing 396 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres of land. This land is bounded by four lines of equal length, to wit, 252 poles each, intersecting each other at right angles, thus making a tract of land in the form of a square. Dawson conveyed the land to Thomas Bond in the year 1792. In the year 1801 Thomas Bond conveyed a part of this tract of land to one Edward McCarty. The part so conveyed was the northwestern portion thereof, and was separated from that remaining by a straight line running from a point in the southern line of the original tract 70 poles from the southwest corner thereof to a point in the northern line of said tract at a distance of 12 poles from the northeast corner thereof. The description in the deed to McCarty gives slightly changed courses from those contained in the original patent. The description of the 396 $\frac{1}{4}$ -acre tract in the original patent is as follows:

"Beginning at a hickory, corner to O'Neal; thence N., 88° E., 252 poles; thence N., 2° W., 252 poles; thence S., 88° W., 252 poles; thence S., 2° E., 252 poles, to the beginning."

The beginning corner, which is referred to as a hickory, corner to O'Neal, is established and is not in dispute. The land conveyed by Bond to Edward McCarty in 1801 is described in the deed as follows:

"Beginning at a hoopwood tree standing by a point of rocks about 20 poles E. from the North branch of the Potomac river and corner to Nicholas Seaver; thence with his line N., 85° E., 70 poles, to the three chestnut oaks on the ridge called 'Bond Ridge'; thence with the top of said ridge N., 40° E., 86 poles, to a large white oak in a hollow; the same course continued N. 296 poles, to two small hickories on the side of a hill in John Ravenscraft's line; thence with it S., 85° W., 240 poles, to his corner; thence S. 252 poles to the beginning."

The point referred to in this description as the beginning corner is the same as the beginning corner referred to in the patent to Dawson, and is not in dispute. The next corner called for on top of Bond ridge is likewise not in dispute, and it is the location of the line extending from this corner, being the next line referred to in the description, that is disputed. The Triplett's now own the southern part of the land conveyed to McCarty by the deed of 1801, and the Baileys own the land which was retained by Bond when he made the deed to McCarty, which is the land lying southeast of the disputed line.

It will be observed that the Triplett's do not own the land along the entire course of this line, but its correct location solves the matter in dispute between the parties. It will likewise be observed that the line called for in the McCarty deed corresponding to the line in the Dawson patent with a course of N. 88° E., has a course N., 85° E., and that the other corresponding lines have this variation of 3°. The parties, not desiring to resort to litigation in the establishment of the disputed line, entered into an agreement by which they submitted the question of its location to the determination of two surveyors mentioned in the agreement, and provided, further, that if the arbitrators did not agree they should select an umpire, and that this award should be final and binding on the parties, and should be entered as the judgment of the circuit court of Mineral county. This agreement was entered upon the records of the circuit court of Mineral county, and the arbitrators proceeded to act under it. They failed to agree, and selected an umpire. This umpire made an award finding that in his opinion the true location of the line was as found by arbitrator Harr, and which is the line contended for by the Triplett's; but he also found that, if this line was to be located in the manner pointed out in the arbitration agreement, that is, by locating the northern end of it, and then running a straight line between that point and the point agreed on as the other end of the division line, it was as located by arbitrator Hott. This award was presented to the circuit court of Mineral county, and that court asked to enter a judgment thereon. The court took the view that the terms of the agreement directing the arbitrators how the northern end of the disputed line should be ascertained were final and binding upon the arbitrators, and that they could not depart from these terms. He therefore disregarded the award made by the umpire based on what he believed to be the correct line, and entered a judgment on the alternative award, fixing the location of the line by following the directions contained in the articles of submission, and from this judgment this writ of error is prosecuted.

The agreement of submission contains certain stipulations of the parties as to how the arbitrators selected by them shall determine the proper location of the disputed line. The provisions of the agreement in this regard, which are pertinent to this discussion, are as follows:

"It is further mutually agreed that the southwest corner of the lands now owned by the said John J. Triplett and Nannie Triplett, which corner was formerly known as the 'O'Neal Corner,' and also as the 'Nicholas Seavers Corner,' now the corner of said Triplett to Alkire and Ravenscraft (and described in deed from Bond to McCarty as 'beginning at a hoopwood tree, standing by a point of rocks about twenty poles E. from North branch of the Potomac'), is the recognized and established corner of the said patent made to said James Dawson; and the corner on top of Bond's ridge, in line of original survey, N., 85° E., 70 poles from said southwest corner of said original survey, according to the calls of said conveyance from Thomas Bond to Edward McCarty, July 10, 1801, is now a recognized, established, and undisputed corner, the beginning of said line in dispute between said lands and which line is to be established hereunder.

"For the further aiding and guiding the said surveyors, it is mutually agreed that the following lines shall, for the purposes hereunder, be recognized and treated as fully established lines of the original survey, patented to James Dawson, March 6, 1789:

"Beginning at the southwest corner of said patent, the corner hereinbefore described, and recognized as the undisputed southwest corner of the said Triplett lands, and running thence N., 88 E., 252 poles, according to the calls of said original survey of said patent, at the end of which distance, only for the purpose hereof, a corner shall be treated as fully established and recognized, according as the survey made by said arbitrators may show; thence N., 2° W., 252 poles, according to calls of said patent to said James Dawson, to a corner of said original survey, probably now gone, but for the purpose contained herein shall be recognized and fully established as the northeast corner of said patent to said James Dawson, according as the survey of said arbitrators may show; thence S., 88° W., 252 poles, at the end of which distance shall be treated as the fully established and recognized northwest corner of the said patent for the purposes contained herein; thence S., 2° E., 252 poles, to the beginning; and, for the purposes of establishing said boundary or division line in dispute between the parties hereto, it is mutually agreed that beginning at said northeast corner of said patent, running thence, according to calls of said original survey of said patent, S., 88° W., 12 poles, and S., 85° W., 240 poles, reversed, according to the calls of said deed from Thomas Bond to said Edward McCarty, from the northwest corner of said patent, in the line of said original survey, is the end of said original boundary or division line in dispute between the lands of the parties hereto, and which line is described in deed from Thomas Bond to Edward McCarty, which deed is dated July 10, 1801, and of record in Deed Book No. 12, page 340, Hampshire County Records, as follows:

"[Beginning] to three chestnut oaks, on a ridge called Bond's Ridge; thence with the top of said ridge N., 40° E., 86 poles, to a large white oak in a hollow; the same course continued all 296 poles to two small hickories on the side of hill in John Ravenscraft's line."

"It is further agreed that for the purpose of making and surveying any of said lines necessary to be surveyed and establishing any corner necessary to be established, in order to properly and truly locate said boundary or division line in dispute, the following rules shall govern said surveyors: First. Recognized and established, natural, and artificial monuments, corners, and marked lines shall govern over courses and distances. Second. Where natural monuments or marked lines do not exist or cannot be established, the course and distances called for shall govern, except: Third. In determining lost corners or lines, the lost lines shall be run according to courses and distances in the original survey, unless the lines so run do not close the survey with the corners remaining, in which case the courses shall be followed, and distances disregarded; but, if the original survey cannot be made to close, the courses shall be deviated from so as to make said survey close according to the right and the true intent of said survey; and the gap, if any, shall be closed as seems most consistent with all the calls."

[1, 2] It will be seen from the part of the agreement thus quoted that the parties thereto fixed upon the means which the arbitrators should use in determining the disputed line, and that was to begin at the recognized corner, being the southwest corner of the Dawson patent, as well as the southwest corner of the Triplett land, and then run a line 252 poles on the course contained in the Dawson patent, which point, for the purpose of locating the line in dispute, was to be treated as the southeast corner of the Dawson patent; thence to proceed from that point upon the course called for in the Dawson patent a distance of 252 poles, which point should be considered, for the purpose of locating the disputed line, as the northeast corner of the Dawson patent, and so running around the Dawson patent upon the courses and for the distance therein contained, and the corners thereof located in this way were to be treated as the true corners of that patent for the purpose of the arbitration. Then, for the purpose of locating the northern end of the disputed line, it was agreed that the arbitrators should start from the northeast corner of the Dawson patent as above located, and run with the courses given in the Dawson patent, to wit, S., 88° W., 12 poles, at the end of which 12-pole line would be the northern end of the line in dispute, and which point is to be 240 poles on the course S., 85° W., reversed from the northwest corner of the McCarty land. It will be observed from this that the agreement of the parties was that the northern end of the line in dispute was in the northern line of the Dawson patent at a point 12 poles from the northeastern corner of said patent, and all that was necessary for the arbitrators to do to carry out the agreement was to locate the lines of the Dawson patent, then to locate a point 12 poles west from the northeastern corner thereof, and fix this as the northern end of the line in dispute, and run a straight line from that point to the beginning of the division line between the parties, and so much of this line as separated the lands of the one party from the other would be the line agreed upon. One of the awards made by the umpire in this case was made in this way, and this is the one which the court adopted. The other award made by the umpire is based upon evidence taken before him, and by other facts which he observed upon the ground, to the entire disregard of the directions contained in the agreement of the parties as to the manner of ascertaining and locating the disputed line; and the only question is whether the arbitrators, or rather the umpire, had any authority to locate any line except as directed by the agreement of submission; and, second, if he did not, whether the court could enter a judgment upon such an alternative finding, or whether all of the findings of the umpire should have been entirely disregarded and the parties left to settle the dispute some other way. The agreement of submission entered into by the parties is the authority for the arbitrators and the umpire to act. Without that, anything that they do is entirely without authority. It is their charter of authority, and can it be said that, where matters in dispute are submitted to them for determination, they have authority to decide that dispute in any manner which they see fit, in utter disregard of the provisions of the agreement of submission? Where the parties themselves agree upon the manner of the submission of the dispute, and upon what shall be considered by the arbitrators, and what shall be done by them in order to a settlement of the dispute, it is part of the agreement, and is as binding upon the arbitrators as any other part, and they have no authority to make an award in violation of, or not in accordance with, such stipulations. Such an award cannot be binding upon the parties, and would be entirely beyond the authority given to the arbitrators. In 5 Cor. Jur. at page 126, it is said:

"To adopt a different rule of decision from that which the terms of the authority require the arbitrators to apply is as much a departure from the submission as to pass upon a matter not submitted, or to omit to consider a matter embraced in the submission."

It is also laid down in 2 R. C. L. p. 374, that the powers and duties of arbitrators are determined by the order of submission. Where the parties themselves limit the arbitrators in the manner of their proceeding, such limitations in the agreement of submission are as binding upon the arbitrators as any other provision of the agreement. So in Insurance Co. v. Board of Education, 49 W. Va. 360, 38 S. E. 679, it is held that arbitrators cannot act beyond the authority conferred by the submission, and, if they do so any award made will not bind the parties. In Goff v. Goff, 78 W. Va. 423, 89 S. E. 9, which was a cause submitted to arbitration for the purpose of determining a disputed line, it was held that, where the agreement of submission provided that the arbitrators should determine the line by the deeds and other evidence deemed necessary to enable them to arrive at a just and fair settlement, they were not authorized to determine such dispute in such manner as they may deem just and fair, but that they must determine it in accordance with the title papers of the parties and the evidence submitted to them, as provided in the order of submission. Similar holdings are found in the cases of Mathews v. Miller, 25 W. Va. 817; Austin v. Clark, 8 W. Va. 236; Dunlap v. Campbell, 5 W. Va. 195; and Swan v. Deem, 4 W. Va. 368. We are clearly of the opinion that the agreement of the parties as to the methods to be pursued by the arbitrators and the umpire in locating the disputed line is as binding upon them in doing the work as any other part of the agreement, and that the parties could not be bound by any award not made in accordance therewith. There is no real dispute in this case but that the conclusion adopted by the judgment of the court is the only one which can be reached by following the directions given in the agreement of submission; but one of the arbitrators does not agree that that is the proper way to locate the disputed line, and declined to agree to it for that reason. This necessitated the appointment of the umpire. The umpire was likewise of the opinion that the agreement made by the parties as to how the line should be fixed and determined was not the proper way for deciding it, but he, as before stated, in addition to finding this, also found as an alternative award that, if the agreement in this particular was binding upon the arbitrators, then the line finally established by the circuit court of Mineral county is the true division line. Much evidence was taken tending to show that the other line is the correct one. This evidence was all improper and immaterial. There is no showing that any fraud was practiced upon either of the parties in entering into the agreement to submit the question to arbitrators. They were anxious to get the line in dispute between them settled, and without knowing just where the same would run on the ground they, from the title papers and the information they possessed, freely and fairly entered into the agreement. The policy of the law is to settle disputes by arbitration, and when contending parties submit a matter of this character, or of any other character, to arbitrators for the purpose of determining their differences, and agree upon the method to be pursued by such arbitrators, and there is no fraud or mistake in the making of such agreement, an award made thereunder will be final and binding upon the parties. On the other hand, an award made in disregard of the agreement entered into, even though it may be the opinion of the arbitrators that such is the correct solution of the matters submitted to them, will be set aside as having no authority for its basis.

Attention is called to the fact that it is impossible to form the northern line of the Dawson patent in the manner indicated in the agreement of arbitration, for the reason that the 12-pole line therein referred to is on a course of S., 88° W., 12 poles, while the continuation of the line to the northwest corner of the McCarty line is on a course of S., 85° W., 240 poles. This is quite true, but it will also be observed that it is provided that, in case the original survey could not be made to close on the courses given, the gap should be closed as seems most consistent with all the courses. It is apparent that the intention of the parties was to locate the lines of the Dawson patent, and to fix the northern line of that patent as a monument in which the northern end of the disputed line would be found at a point 12 poles from its eastern end and 240 poles from its western end, and the only way to fix this line was to make the course S., 85° W., which is the course given in the McCarty deed, correspond with the course of the corresponding line of the original patent, and this was what the umpire did in his alternative award.

It is also contended that to locate the line in dispute as it was located by the circuit court of Mineral county changes the course given in the McCarty deed. This is true, but it is likewise true that it is provided in their submission that, where a monument was called for by their agreement, courses and distances must yield to such monument. The point in the northern line of the Dawson patent is a monument when that northern line is fixed and established. Vandal v. Casto, 81 W. Va. 76, 93 S. E. 1044. So that, when the northern line of the Dawson patent was fixed in the manner pointed out by the parties in their agreement, it became a monument, and their agreement that the northern end of this disputed line should be in this northern line of the Dawson patent at a point 12 poles from its eastern end made it necessary to change the course given in the McCarty deed for the disputed line, which was done, not only in accordance with the terms of the agreement of the parties that such should be the case where such a contention arose, but also in accordance with the law governing the question of reconciling contradictory descriptions in deeds.

[3] In view of the fact, however, that the umpire made two awards, and made their validity depend upon whether the court came to the conclusion that the parties were bound by the stipulations of the agreement of submission, did the circuit court of Mineral county have the authority to adopt that one of such awards that was in accordance with the terms of the agreement of the parties? We think the court not only had the power, but that it was his duty to disregard the award confessedly made in violation of the agreement entered into, and adopt the other award made by the umpire as the only one which had a real basis for its existence. This was the course taken by the circuit court which we think was clearly right.

We therefore affirm the judgment complained of, and remand the cause to the circuit court of Mineral county, in order that said judgment may be executed.

BURGESS v. TORRENCE. (No. 9683.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 14, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨85(1)—RECOVERY ON MARRIED WOMAN'S NOTE—FRAUD.

B. W. Torrence brought suit against Mattie L. Burgess, a married woman, on a promissory note signed by her and given under her written rent contract with plaintiff. The defendant admitted signing the note sued on, but filed a defense setting up: (1) That she was not indebted to the plaintiff, and received no consideration or benefit from the signing of the note sued on; that the note was given for the rent of a farm rented by the plaintiff to defendant's husband, Gilliam Burgess; that she was forced by the plaintiff, acting through her husband, to sign the note; that her husband "threatened her until she was by fear forced to sign the said note; that she would not have signed the same had it not been for such threats and such other frauds and menaces heaped upon her by the plaintiff, B. W. Torrence, through her ignorant and unlearned husband"; and (2) "that it is not her debt or obligation; that she is not responsible to the plaintiff in any sum whatever; that she is now, and at the time of signing the note, was a married woman, and she wishes to take advantage of the statute making her exempt from the payment of her husband's debts in such cases; that the note was secured through fraud, force, and threats and fears." Upon the trial of the case the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and defendant excepted. Held:

"Fraud voids all contracts" (Civ. Code 1910, § 4254), and the free assent of the parties being essential to a valid contract, duress, either by threats or other arts, by which the free will of the party is restrained and his consent induced, will void the contract (Civ. Code 1910, § 4255). But in order for a married woman to defeat a recovery by the payee on a promissory note made by her, upon the ground that her signature thereto was procured by the fraud and duress of her husband, she must not only show that such was the fact, but must also show that the payee of the note was either a party to such fraud and duress, or that he had knowledge thereof. Pate v. Allison, 114 Ga. 651, 40 S. E. 715; Johnson v. Leffler Co., 122 Ga. 670, 50 S. E. 488 (3); Bateman v. Cherokee Fertilizer Co., 21 Ga. App. 158, 83 S. E. 1021. The court therefore did not err in charging the jury as complained of in the first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨80, 85(1, 6)—WIFE'S ASSUMPTION OF HUSBAND'S OBLIGATION—LIABILITY—HUSBAND AS WIFE'S AGENT.

While under our law a married woman cannot assume the debts of her husband (Civil Code of 1910, § 3007), still the issue as made by the evidence in this case was not one in which this principle was involved. Even if it should appear that the plaintiff in the first instance rented the land to the husband, and subsequently entered into a new and different agreement with the wife, whereby she was to take over the land and become the tenant instead of the husband, such a procedure could not properly be called an assumption by the wife of the husband's obligation, but would be an original undertaking on her part; and unless it be shown that the new contract was brought about by fraud or duress practiced upon the wife by the plaintiff, or by another with his knowledge, there would be nothing to render such an agreement on her part invalid. The consideration going to the wife in such a case is not the incidental extinguishment of the prior promise of the husband, but the taking over by her of the land itself under the rent agreement. Simmons v. International Harvester Co., 22 Ga. App. 358, 96 S. E. 9 (5), and cases there cited. That the negotiations leading up to the signing of the rent notes by the wife were had through the husband would not change the rule. Longley v. Bank of Parrott, 19 Ga. App. 701, 92 S. E. 232 (1).

3. VERDICT—CHARGE OF COURT.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the charge of the court is not subject to the exceptions taken.

Error from City Court of Nashville; C. A. Christian, Judge.

Suit by B. W. Torrence against M. L. Burgess. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

WHITES v. STATE. (No. 9602.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 14, 1918.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS —251— CONDEMNATION OF VEHICLE—RIGHTS OF CONDITIONAL SELLER.

In a statutory proceeding to condemn or confiscate a vehicle employed in the illegal transportation of liquor, contrary to the provisions of section 20 of the act of 1917 (Acts 1917 [Ex. Sess.] p. 16), where the owner of the vehicle had previously sold it to the party engaged in the illegal transaction, but reserved title to it until full payment of the purchase price, part of which purchase price was represented by a retention of title note duly recorded, and the remainder of which was by agreement to be covered by a similar note, in case the vendee failed to pay the remainder on or before a date specified, and where the evidence disclosed that the vendors were wholly without knowledge of the illegal intent or acts of the vendee, and the property was seized in behalf of the state before the agreed time when the second note reserving title was to be executed in the event that the amount to be covered thereby had not been previously paid, the owner would be entitled to the full amount of the purchase money due, as might appear from the evidence, including both the amount covered by the note actually given and the note agreed to be given.

Error from City Court of Dublin; R. D. Flynt, Judge.

Statutory proceeding by the State against O. E. Beachman to condemn or confiscate a vehicle employed in the illegal transportation of liquor, with intervention by Whites, a partnership. Judgment of condemnation and sale, with order for payment of part of proceeds to interveners, and interveners bring error. Reversed.

Burch & Daley and J. B. Green, all of Dublin, for plaintiffs in error.

S. P. New, of Dublin, for the State.

WADE, C. J. This case arose under the act of 1917 (Acts of 1917, Extraordinary Session, § 20, pp. 16, 17), which provides that—

"All vehicles and conveyances of every kind and description which are used on any of the public roads or private ways of this state, and all boats and vessels of every kind and description which are used in any of the waters of this state in conveying any liquors or beverages, the sale or possession of which is prohibited by law, shall be seized by any sheriff or other arresting officer, who shall report the same to the solicitor of the county, city or superior court having jurisdiction in the county where the seizure was made, whose duty it shall be within ten days from the time he received said notice to institute condemnation proceedings in said court by petition, a copy of which shall be served upon the owner or lessee if known, and if the owner or lessee is unknown notice of such proceedings shall be published once a week for two weeks in the newspaper in which the sheriff's advertisements are published. If no defense is filed within thirty days from the filing of the petition, judgment by default shall be entered by the court at chambers, otherwise the case shall proceed as other civil cases in said court. Should it appear upon the trial of the case that said vehicle, conveyance, boat or vessel was so used with the knowledge of the owner or lessee, the same shall be sold by order of the court after such advertisement as the court may direct."

The case was determined by the trial judge, without the intervention of a jury, upon the following agreed statement of facts:

"(1) That V. Chavous, a policeman of the city of Dublin, Ga., did on the 19th day of January, 1918, arrest one O. E. Beachman and seize one automobile, same being described as follows: Oakland roadster automobile No. 3702124, motor No. 10751—and that, at the time the said V. Chavous seized the said automobile and arrested the said Beachman, the said Beachman was carrying in said automobile whisky, over the highways of Laurens county and into the city of Dublin, Ga.; that the said V. Chavous made said seizure and arrest without a search warrant, state warrant, or any legal process whatever.

"(2) That the said O. E. Beachman is the conditional owner of the said automobile, having purchased the same from Whites, the interveners herein; that he owes the said firm the sum of $815 and interest on the purchase price of said automobile, and executed to the Whites a note reserving the title in them until they were paid; said note being for the amount of $515 and interest.

"(3) That, in addition to the sum represented by the above-stated note, Beachman is due on the purchase price of said automobile the sum of $300, which said sum he agreed to pay on the 21st day of January, 1918, or, in lieu of making said payment, he was to give a note reserving title to said automobile in the Whites for the principal sum of $300.

"(4) That the said sums as above set forth are now due and unpaid.

"(5) That the following is a true and correct copy of the said reservation title note given by said Beachman to the said Whites, to wit:

"$515. Dublin, Ga., January 14, 1918.
"On Feb. 10th after date I promise to pay to Whites, or order, five hundred fifteen and no/100 dollars, payable as follows: $200 on Feb. 10, 1918, $165 on March 10, 1918, and $150 on April 10, 1918, with interest from date at 8 per cent. per annum, interest payable annually, for one Oakland roadster, No. 3702124, motor No. 10751.

"The title to said property to remain in said payee, his heirs and assigns, until fully paid for. If said property is lost or destroyed in any way, I am still to pay this note, and all costs and attorney's fees incurred in its collection, which costs and fees I hereby agree to pay. And to secure the payment of this note — hereby mortgage and convey unto said payee, his heirs and assigns, the following property, to wit: —

"I hereby waive for myself and family all rights or benefits of homestead or exemption of personalty as against this debt or any renewal thereof. Witness my hand and seal the day and year above written.

"Filed for record at 8 o'clock a. m. this 23d day of Jan'y, 1918, and recorded in Book 90, folio 684, this 25th day of Jan'y, 1918.

"E. S. Baldwin, Clerk."

"(6) That the Whites had no knowledge of the fact that said automobile was being used as a whisky carrier by the said O. E. Beachman; neither did they know, at the time they sold said automobile to the said O. E. Beachman, that he intended to use said automobile for said purpose.

"(7) That V. Chavous said that he would pay the Whites the amount of its written reservation title, which was refused."

The court rendered judgment, condemning the automobile which had been seized, and ordering that it be sold, and that from the proceeds of such sale the sum of $515, principal and interest, be paid on the claim of Whites, the partnership, composed of certain named persons, which had filed the intervention, claiming a total sum of $815 as purchase money thereof. This judgment was excepted to generally as being contrary to both law and evidence, and more specifically upon the ground that the court was without authority to order the sale of the automobile without providing for the payment to Whites of not only that portion of the purchase price included in the retention of title note of record, but the full amount due that firm upon the purchase price. The judgment was further specially excepted to upon the ground that the lien of the plaintiffs in error under its reservation of title note was superior to any lien which the state of Georgia might obtain by reason of the illegal use of the automobile by the vendee, O. E. Beachman, for the full amount due on the purchase price thereof, and because the judgment was contrary to law, in that it condemned the interest of Whites in said automobile, without showing any knowledge on their part that the same was to be used for any illegal purpose, and that the court was without authority to condemn the car, when not in its possession, custody, or control.

It is agreed in the brief of counsel for the state that no construction of the act of 1917, supra, is necessary for the determination of this case, since, under the agreed statement of facts and the assignment of errors in the bill of exceptions, but one question is really presented, and that is, should Whites have had a judgment for $515 or for $815.

In the case of Shrouder v. Sweat, 148 Ga. 378, 96 S. E. 881, the Supreme Court held:

"Where an automobile was sold on credit to one who gave his note for the purchase price, securing it by a mortgage upon the car, and where subsequently, before payment of the note, the purchaser being engaged in conveying intoxicating liquors in the car, a sheriff arrested and took him and the car into custody, and thereupon instituted proceedings to condemn the car under the provisions of section 20 of the act of the General Assembly of this state, passed at its extraordinary session of March, 1917, relating to prohibition of intoxicating liquors, approved March 28, 1917 (Acts of General Assembly, Extraordinary Session, March, 1917, p. 7), a court of equity, upon a petition for injunction brought by the holder of the mortgage, who did not participate in any way in the criminal enterprise of the purchaser, should have enjoined the condemnation proceeding until provision was made for application, after the final hearing, of the funds arising from the sale of the vehicle to the lien of the mortgage."

"We are of the opinion that the judge erred in so refusing. The condemnation proceedings should have been enjoined, and the status quo preserved until the final hearing, when a decree upon the facts as then shown could have been rendered. The petitioner was the vendor of the car, and had a valid mortgage thereon for the purchase money. He had not participated in the criminal intent of the purchaser of the car, who was in possession thereof at the time it was seized while being used for the carrying out of the criminal enterprise whereby it was subject to seizure and confiscation. The vendor, the petitioner and the holder of the valid mortgage, could not intervene in the statutory proceeding instituted in the city court for the purpose of condemning the car and to procure an order for its sale. His only redress for the enforcement of a clear equitable right was through an equitable petition, such as he filed in this case. The mortgage had not been recorded, but that did not affect its validity. Unrecorded mortgages remain valid, but 'are postponed to all other liens created or obtained, or purchases made prior to the actual record of the mortgage.' Civil Code, § 3260. The provision of the section of the act of March 28, 1917, to which we have referred, and under the terms of which the condemnation proceedings were instituted, is penal in its nature. We do not think it was the intention of the Legislature to divest and destroy liens held by innocent third parties. The fact that the mortgage in this case was unrecorded may be considered in connection with any other evidence, if it should be produced on the trial, tending to show that the holder of the lien participated in the criminal enterprise or intent of the purchaser of the car; and if it should be made to appear that the vendor did participate in the criminal intent and enterprise, it may then be decided whether he had any standing in a court of equity."

In that case the petitioner, who applied for an injunction, held simply an unrecorded mortgage for the purchase money of the vehicle sought to be condemned. The act of 1917, supra, makes no provision for the determination in the statutory proceeding of the rights of one claiming a valid mortgage upon an automobile or other vehicle about to be confiscated and condemned; and hence, as held by the Supreme Court in the case above referred to, the doors of a court of equity should not be closed against such holder of a valid lien, and this notwithstanding the fact that the lien was not of record.

In the case under consideration, the parties filing the intervention brought themselves within the terms of the act by showing that they were the actual owners of the property sought to be condemned, and their rights could therefore be determined in that proceeding and without resorting to equity. It appears that, under the contract of sale between Whites and Beachman, $515 of the purchase price was evidenced by a retention of title note describing the property sold, which was duly recorded, and that the remainder of the purchase money amounting to $300, was not represented by any writing whatsoever. Nevertheless, it was distinctly agreed, by the vendors and vendee, at the time the automobile was purchased, that the title to the same was reserved until the full sum of $815 was paid; the agreement between them being that in the event the vendee failed to pay the sum of $300 in excess of the note for $515, actually signed, on or before the 21st day of January, 1918, the vendee should therefore execute a further note to the vendors, reserving title in them for said additional sum. The contract of sale between Whites and Beachman for the full amount of the purchase price of the automobile was enforceable, so far as they were concerned, whether evidenced by any writing or not. All the conditions of the contract between the parties were in fact enforceable, except as against third parties. Civil Code 1910, § 3318.

Of course, the secret understanding between Whites and Beachman touching the $300 of the purchase price not represented by any duly recorded retention of title contract could have had no binding effect upon any third person acquiring contract rights against the property without knowledge of such understanding. Here, however, the state is seeking, not even to enforce a judgment already obtained, but to obtain a judgment binding property to which the party whose illegal use thereof rendered it prima facie subject to condemnation had absolutely no title whatsoever. Even had there been no written contract of any kind, but merely an oral agreement between Whites and Beachman that the title to the automobile should remain in the vendors until payment of the full purchase price of $815 on or before a time named, and the vendee, immediately upon the delivery of the machine to him, engaged in the transportation of liquor, contrary to law, this would furnish no reason, under the provisions of the confiscation act, why the vendors, who were wholly ignorant at the time of the sale of the intention of the vendee to thus illegally use and employ their property, and who in no wise thereafter consented to such illegal employment, should be compelled to suffer its entire loss. In the case as made, however, the vendors actually retained title in a legally sufficient instrument, which was duly recorded, though it covered only a portion of the purchase price.

The agreed statement of facts discloses that Whites had absolutely no knowledge of the illegal use of the car or of the intention of the purchaser to employ it in any unlawful manner. Section 20 of the act of 1917, supra, provides that vehicles, conveyances, etc., shall be sold by order of the court in the event it appears upon the trial of the case that they were used in the manner prohibited thereby, "with knowledge of the owner or lessee."

Applying the principle laid down in the Shrouder Case, supra, the decisions of the Supreme Court being binding as precedents upon this court, we hold, as the retention of title contract between Whites and Beachman was valid and enforceable between them for the full amount of the purchase price agreed to be paid before the title to the automobile should vest in Beachman, that Whites were entitled to all of the said agreed purchase price, and not merely to that portion represented by the recorded note. If Whites were entitled to exact the payment to them of the $515 portion of the purchase price represented by the recorded note, they were equally entitled to the remaining $300 of said purchase price due them in excess of said note, which under the terms of the contract of sale must also have been paid by Beachman before any title would vest in him. Clearly the state occupied no better position with respect to the portion of the purchase price not covered by any written instrument of record than a third person would occupy who had extended no credit, parted with no rights, and suffered no injury by reason of the apparent ownership by the vendee of property in fact owned by some one else.

We hold, therefore, that the court erred in rendering the judgment complained of, since, under the agreed statement of facts, fixing at $815 the amount of the purchase price until the full payment of which title of the property was reserved in Whites, they were entitled to collect the full amount.

Judgment reversed.

CRAPP v. STATE. (No. 9783.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 15, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRANSFER OF CAUSE BY SUPREME COURT.

This case has been transferred back to this court by the Supreme Court, under the ruling of that court that the assignments of error involving constitutional grounds were too indefinite to be considered. See Crapp v. State, 95 S. E. 993.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS \S 247, 250—CONDEMNATION OF VEHICLE—INSTRUCTION.

The evidence demanded a verdict in favor of the plaintiff; and the special ground of the motion for a new trial, assigning error upon the court's refusal to charge the jury as requested, is without merit.

Error from City Court of Sylvester; C. W. Monk, Judge.

Proceeding by the State of Georgia against Adam Crapp, to condemn and sell an automobile used in conveying intoxicating liquors. Verdict for the State, motion for new trial overruled, and defendant excepts and brings error. Affirmed.

This was a proceeding instituted by the state of Georgia, through the solicitor of the city court of Sylvester, under the provisions of the act of 1917 (Ga. L. 1917, Extr. Sess. p. 16), and was maintained for the purpose of condemning and selling an automobile, which it is alleged was owned and used by the defendant in conveying spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, and intoxicating liquors on and over the public roads of Worth county. The defendant filed a demurrer to the petition, wherein he sought to raise certain questions involving the constitutionality of the act. The court overruled the demurrer, and the questions thus attempted to be raised have been disposed of by the Supreme Court. See Crapp v. State, 95 S. E. 993.

Upon the trial of the case, the defendant testified:

"The morning I was arrested I was on my way to Dawson. I had people living in Terrell county, and was going up there to—I had nearly a quart of whisky with me, and afterwards plead guilty for being drunk on the public highway and having whisky in my possession; the whisky was in my grip. It was not my purpose to carry the whisky to Dawson, I only had it along with me for my own use. I was not hauling it for the purpose of delivering it to any place or to any person. I was not making the trip to carry the whisky anywhere, but had it along with me to use myself. I got this whisky the evening before in Sylvester from a colored man. Went back home in this automobile with it that night, and, after spending the night at home, took it along with me the next morning, and on my way to Dawson and Terrell county I was arrested with it, and my car was taken charge of by the sheriff. Bought one quart and a pint, and had drunk the pint and part of the quart and had the balance with me on my way up to Terrell county, where my people live. I would have taken this whisky to Dawson with me if I had not been interrupted by the officers."

The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant made a motion for a new trial, based solely upon the general grounds, except that error is specially assigned upon the refusal of a request to charge the jury as follows:

"If the evidence discloses that the defendant in this case was transporting whisky from one point to another, and that he was using his car for the purpose of transporting or conveying the whisky, then you should find against the defendant. On the other hand, if you should find from the evidence that the defendant had some whisky with him, and that the transportation of it on the car was merely incidental to the trip, that it was [sic] primarily his purpose to convey the whisky, but that he took the whisky along with him for his own use, and that it was not his intention to carry the whisky to some other point, then you should find in favor of the defendant in this case."

The motion for a new trial having been overruled, the defendant excepted.

G. R. Nottingham and L. D. Passmore, both of Sylvester, for plaintiff in error.

Clyde Forehand, Sol., of Sylvester, for the State.

JENKINS, J. (after stating the facts as above). In our opinion, the request to charge does not contain a correct statement of the explicit terms of the law, nor does it conform to what is its plainly expressed purpose and intention. It is insisted by counsel for the defendant that, construing these portions of the act in connection with the title, it must be seen that it was not the intention of the Legislature to condemn a vehicle where the carrying of whisky was merely incidental, and that the law condemns the vehicle only when it is being used for the primary purpose of transporting or conveying liquors. In other words, if the vehicle was used for the primary purpose of conveying or transporting liquors, the provisions of the act would be operative; but if the liquors were thus being merely incidentally transported, and only because the vehicle was at the time being used for another and different purpose, then the penalty would not obtain. So much of the title of the act referred to as is material to this case is as follows:

"An act to amend and supplement the prohibition laws of this state; to make it unlawful to transport, ship, or deliver in this state, whether from without or from within the state, any spirituous, vinous, malt, or fermented liquors, or other intoxicating liquors or beverages, except alcohol and wine under certain restrictions and limitations; * * * to provide for the seizure, condemnation and sale of property used in violation of this act, and for the disposition of the funds arising from such sale."

Section 1 of the act provides that:

"It shall be unlawful for any common carrier, corporation, firm or individual to transport, ship or carry, by any means whatsoever, with or without hire, or cause the same to be done, from any point without this state to any point within this state, or from place to place within this state, whether intended for personal use or otherwise," any of the liquors or beverages therein enumerated, save as thereafter excepted.

Section 20 of the act provides that:

"All vehicles and conveyances of every kind and description which are used on any of the public roads or private ways of this state, and all boats and vessels of every kind and description which are used in any of the waters of this state in conveying any liquors or beverages, the sale or possession of which is prohibited by law, shall be seized by any sheriff or other arresting officer, who shall report the same to the solicitor of the county, city or superior court having jurisdiction in the county where the seizure was made, whose duty it shall be within ten days from the time he received said notice to institute condemnation proceedings in said court by petition, a copy of which shall be served upon the owner or lessee if known, and if the owner or lessee is unknown notice of such proceedings shall be published once a week for two weeks in the newspaper in which the sheriff's advertisements are published. If no defense is filed within thirty days from the filing of the petition, judgment by default shall be entered by the court at chambers, otherwise the case shall proceed as other civil cases in said court. Should it appear upon the trial of the case that said vehicle, conveyance, boat or vessel was so used with the knowledge of the owner or lessee, the same shall be sold by order of the court after such advertisement as the court may direct."

[1, 2] Thus, it would seem that when, with the knowledge of the owner, any such vehicle is used on any of the public roads or private ways of this state in conveying any liquors or beverages, the sale or possession of which is prohibited by law, the vehicle or conveyance is subject to seizure and sale in the manner prescribed, regardless of what might have been the purpose and intent of the owner or operator of the vehicle at the time it was so employed. Under the plain and explicit terms of the act itself, the fact that the liquors or beverages thus conveyed were for the personal use of the owner or operator of the vehicle would not alter the rule, but the provision is that the mere use of a vehicle, wherein and whereby any of the enumerated liquors are conveyed with the knowledge of the owner, renders the vehicle subject to seizure and sale, regardless of what may have been the reason in thus using the vehicle, or what may have been the purpose as to the use or disposition of the liquors. To hold otherwise would entirely emasculate these provisions of the act, and in practice would defeat every purpose for which they were enacted.

Judgment affirmed.

Jan. 14, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶193(9) — WRIT OF ERROR—ATTACK ON PLEADING.

A defendant who passes over, without demurring, a petition which is fatally defective, in that it does not set forth a cause of action, may still attack it by a writ of error, sued out in due time, excepting to the judgment overruling a motion for a new trial, complaining that the verdict is contrary to law.

2. CARRIERS ¶268 — PASSENGERS — DEPARTURE FROM TRAIN.

A passenger on a railway train has no legal right unnecessarily to leave the cars on personal business or pleasure at an intermediate station, where his train is detained for an unusual length of time because of a wreck elsewhere on the line; and, where he does so at his own instance and makes inquiry of the conductor as to the length of time the train is expected to remain at the station, the conductor cannot be presumed to know that it is the desire and intention of the inquirer to absent himself from the station grounds, merely to gratify idle curiosity concerning a nearby mill; and consequently the answer of the conductor, under such circumstances, expressing his opinion as to the length of the delay, apparently made in good faith, could neither increase nor diminish the duty or liability of the carrier to the passenger.

W. B. Mebane and McHenry & Porter, all of Rome, for defendant in error.

WADE, C. J. The following is a fair statement of the case as made by the pleadings and the evidence: On July 19, 1917, the plaintiff boarded a train of defendant's railway at Pryor's Station, Rome, Ga., for Birmingham, Ala., and paid his fare to the conductor in charge of the train to Anniston, Ala., taking a receipt therefor. The train stopped an unusual length of time at Jacksonville, Ala., and, as it was very warm in the coach, he left the train, with several other passengers, in order to ascertain from the conductor the cause of the delay, and was informed by him that there was "a wreck down the road," and that they would be there "an hour, till 12 o'clock." Relying upon this information, the plaintiff and a fellow passenger sought a nearby restaurant, and, after lunch, thinking they had ample time, as it was then only 20 minutes after 11, they decided to inspect a mill, about a quarter of a mile distant. They stayed at the mill only a few minutes, and returned to the depot 10 or 15 minutes before 12 o'clock, when they discovered to their surprise that the train had departed. They then decided to go to Anniston, which was approximately only 12 miles away, by taxicab, and it cost them 50 cents each to make the trip in this manner, and the plaintiff reached Anniston in time to continue his journey to Birmingham by the same train he would have traveled on had he not been delayed at Jacksonville. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $250. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial, and exception is taken to the judgment overruling the motion.

"'Proving a case as laid' will prevent a non-suit, and may possibly prevent a motion for a new trial from being granted on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, but it will not authorize a recovery unless the case as laid so authorizes. Mere proof of a fact will not in law authorize a recovery unless the existence of such fact so authorizes [italics ours]. One of the prerequisites to a recovery by a plaintiff is that his pleadings and evidence be in substantial accord, but it is not the only prerequisite. A failure to demur does not confess the action either in law or in fact. A defendant who passes over, without demurring, a petition which is fatally defective in that it does not set forth a cause of action may still attack the same on this ground by an oral motion to dismiss the case at any time before verdict; and after verdict, by motion in arrest of judgment made during the term at which the judgment was rendered; or by assigning error on the judgment by a direct writ of error sued out in due time; or within three years from the date of the judgment, by motion to set aside. * * * On such a writ of error the whole case as shown by the record is before the court of error for inspection and revision. 'Where the defect appears on the face of the declaration, it is settled law that a court of error is bound to notice it.' When it is clear that in point of law the action will not lie, a judgment in favor of the plaintiff will be reversed on writ of error." Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 872, 43 S. E. 280.

[1] Although in the present case, there was no demurrer to the petition, no motion was made to dismiss the case before verdict, and no motion was made after verdict to arrest judgment, the writ of error excepting to the overruling of a motion for a new trial in which motion it is complained that the verdict is contrary to law, is sufficient to raise for adjudication in this court the question whether or not the facts alleged by the plaintiff authorized a lawful recovery against the defendant. Notwithstanding the absence of any demurrer or motion to dismiss on account of the legal insufficiency of the allegations in the plaintiff's petition, and notwithstanding the proof submitted may as a whole establish without conflict every essential allegation made, if the facts alleged and proved in themselves fix no burden of liability upon the defendant, or do not charge the defendant with no responsibility for the injuries on account of which the plaintiff sought to recover damages, the total insufficiency of the facts alleged and proved can nevertheless be taken advantage of under general grounds of a motion for a new trial, and a bill of exceptions, assigning error on the judgment of the court overruling the motion for a new trial, presents for consideration and determination the question as to the existence of any cause of action based upon the allegations and proof as made.

[2-4] In order to determine whether the petition set forth a cause of action against the defendant, it is necessary to ascertain whether the defendant owed any duty to the plaintiff under the allegations set forth, which were substantially supported by proof; for, in the absence of any obligation to perform any duty to the plaintiff, no negligence on the part of the defendant could exist of which plaintiff had a right to complain. The plaintiff was a passenger on the defendant's train, under a contract, to be carried to Anniston, but on arriving at the town of Jacksonville, where the train was delayed several minutes on account of a wreck, he voluntarily left the train and its vicinity and by so doing ceased to be a passenger until he again entered the train for the purpose of being conveyed to his destination, or at least came again upon the premises of the defendant for the purpose of boarding the train. To enable the plaintiff to hold the defendant responsible for his safe carriage to Anniston, he should at least have remained at the station, or in close proximity thereto, where he could have been looked after by the officers or agents of the company. Such is the rule announced in King v. Central Ry. Co., 107 Ga. 754, 757, 33 S. E. 839. Where a passenger actually leaves the premises of the company, he ceases to be a passenger. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 745; Brunswick & Western R. Co. v. Moore, 101 Ga. 684, 28 S. E. 1000; Ga. R. R. & Bkg. Co. v. Richmond, 98 Ga. 495, 25 S. E. 556. Elliott in his work on the Law of Railroads, vol. 4, § 1592, says that where a passenger leaves the train and voluntarily walks along the track, the relation of carrier and passenger is severed. The contract of a railroad company with a passenger is to carry him to his point of destination. He is not expected to leave the cars at intermediate stations, and the carrier does not engage to afford him an opportunity to do so except at the usual stopping places for refreshments. It is not the rule that once a passenger always a passenger. Du Bose v. Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co., 81 S. C. 271, 62 S. E. 255; 10 C. J. 612. See, also, Palmer v. Willamette Valley Southern R. Co., 88 Or. 322, 171 Pac. 1169, L. R. A. 1918D, 1114. It is therefore no longer an open question in Georgia, that, where a passenger voluntarily leaves the station grounds of the carrier, his status as such terminates.

However, the plaintiff contends that this general rule is inapplicable to the instant case, in view of the statement of the conductor, "We will be here an hour—until 12 o'clock." This contention is unsound. It will be observed that the conductor made no misstatement as to the facts of the existing situation, and in expressing his opinion or view that the train would remain at the station until 12 o'clock, there is nothing whatever tending to show that he then knew it would depart before that precise time, or that he made any willful misrepresentation to the passenger with intent to deceive. The train was held at the station on account of a wreck further along the line, and was directed to remain there until the way was cleared, which it was estimated or conjectured would take until 12 o'clock. Being apprised of the facts causing the delay, the plaintiff must have known, as an ordinarily intelligent man, that the future operation of the train upon which he was a passenger, and especially the time of its departure from that station, would altogether depend upon the time when the obstruction was removed from the track. Notwithstanding such knowledge, he nevertheless without any legally sufficient reason, and without the consent or knowledge of the conductor, absented himself from the vicinity of the station at which the train was delayed, in order to go a quarter of a mile distant merely to satisfy his idle curiosity as to the situation in and about a certain mill. Under these circumstances he had no legal right to rely blindly upon the purely gratuitous and casual statement of the conductor that the train would not leave until 12 o'clock, and it seems to us only reasonable that by leaving the station grounds altogether he assumed the obvious risks incident to a subsequent change in the situation which might permit the train to leave earlier than was conjectured at the time the conductor made the statement as to its prospective time of departure. If this were not true, then the plaintiff's action in leaving the station would have made the departure of the train not only dependent upon the removal of the wreck, but upon the time he might elect to return, before 12 o'clock. In other words, to agree with the plaintiff's contention, we would have to hold that the true statement of the conductor as to the cause and possible duration of the delay (made merely from courtesy and not in the discharge of any legal duty) so changed the rights of the parties as to make any movement of the train up to the hour of 12 o'clock wholly dependent on the passenger's pleasure. It could not be required or expected that a conductor in charge of a train en route between terminal points should call the roll of his passengers at every intermediate station where the train might stop for a longer or shorter interval, before permitting it to proceed on its way, lest by some chance he might have unguardedly, though in perfect good faith, expressed his personal opinion to some one or more of his passengers, as to the probable length of stay the train would make at that station, or as to the time of its departure therefrom. A different question might possibly be presented if the passenger had acquainted the conductor with his intention to absent himself from the station or the adjacent grounds, and had been thereupon assured by the conductor that he could do so with safety, provided he boarded the train by or before a time named, anterior to which time the train would not take its departure, and the passenger returned to the station before the time mentioned and found the train had already gone.

The ruling we make is not without precedent, for in the case of Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Foreman, 73 Tex. 311, 11 S. W. 326, 15 Am. St. Rep. 785, where upon nearing an intermediate station a passenger asked the conductor how long the train would stop at that station, and he answered, "Five minutes," and on the arrival of the train at the station the passenger left the cars to inquire after some business matters, and had gone but a few steps when he heard the train start, and in attempting to get on it while in motion he was thrown down and injured, and it appeared that the train started in much less time than five minutes, it was held that the answer of the conductor that the train would wait five minutes created no obligation to hold the train that length of time.

It follows from what has already been said that when a conductor is merely asked how long a train will stop at a certain intermediate station, he is not presumed to know that it is the desire of the inquirer to leave the vicinity of the station and consume on pleasure or business the time of the halt. Such questions are frequently asked by passengers from idle curiosity or other motives, and it would be unreasonable to hold that by answering them the conductor assumes for the company the obligation to watch at all times the movements of the passengers, or unnecessarily to delay the train or to make its movements coincide with answers made in good faith to such apparently idle questions. We think the obligation of the defendant to the passenger was neither increased nor diminished by the conductor's answer in this case, and therefore the verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $250 (although he suffered in actual damages only the small amount of 50 cents) must be set aside as being contrary to law.

In view of the foregoing ruling it is unnecessary to pass upon the several special grounds of the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

JENKINS and LUKE, JJ., concur.

(23 Ga. App. 113)

FOUNTAIN v. STATE. (No. 9978.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Nov. 23, 1918. Rehearing Denied
Dec. 13, 1918.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW §589(1), 925(1)—CONTINUANCE—MISTRIAL.

The court did not err either in refusing to continue the case, or in refusing to declare a mistrial.

2. HOMICIDE §163(2)—WITNESSES §37(4)—EVIDENCE—CHARACTER OF DECEASED FOR VIOLENCE.

"Evidence offered in a trial for murder to show the character of the deceased for violence will, as to the party making the attack, be confined to the reputation which the deceased bore in the community, and will not extend to specific acts."

(a) "Any evidence depending on the knowledge of the witness, save what he has as to the reputation of the deceased, should be excluded."

3. CRIMINAL LAW §1084(4)—APPEAL—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Grounds of a motion for new trial based upon the introduction of evidence present nothing for adjudication by this court, when the evidence is not set forth therein either literally or in substance, nor attached as an exhibit to the motion.

4. CRIMINAL LAW §1129(3)—ADMISSION OF IRRELEVANT TESTIMONY—EFFECT.

"Unless in its nature manifestly prejudicial, or the assignment of error shows wherein it was harmful, the admission of irrelevant testimony will not be sufficient ground for the grant of a new trial."

5. CRIMINAL LAW §1129(3)—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—INSUFFICIENCY.

"An assignment of error upon a ruling of the court excluding evidence, which does not set forth the evidence literally or in substance, is too indefinite to present any question for consideration."

6. CRIMINAL LAW §918(5) — COLLOQUY BETWEEN COURT AND COUNSEL—PREJUDICE.

Where the attorney for a defendant in a criminal case is interrupted in his argument by the trial judge, and a colloquy between court and counsel follows, in which nothing prejudicial to the cause of client or counsel is developed, the mere fact that the argument was interrupted will not require the grant of a new trial.

7. CRIMINAL LAW §919(1)—STATEMENT OF COUNSEL TO JURY—HARMLESS ERROR.

A new trial will be granted because of a statement of counsel to a jury only when the statement is "manifestly improper and prejudicial to the rights of the opposite party. If the nature of the remark is such that it can plainly be seen that it could not have affected the result, the error would be harmless, and would afford no ground for a new trial."

8. CHARGE OF COURT.

When considered in connection with the entire charge of the court, no error appears in the excerpt quoted in the tenth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

9. CRIMINAL LAW §822(1)—MODIFYING INSTRUCTION—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where a judge in charging a jury incorrectly states in the first clause of a sentence a proposition of law, and immediately thereafter and in the same sentence says, "that is," and follows this by a second clause containing a correct statement of the law, the effect is to "specifically modify" the erroneous statement in the first clause and render it harmless.

10. CRIMINAL LAW §778(11) — HARMLESS ERROR — INSTRUCTION ON FLIGHT — EVIDENCE.

Under the facts of this case, the judge did not err in charging on flight.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

11. CRIMINAL LAW §1064(1)—APPEAL—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—SUPERFLUOUS MATTER.

Grounds of a motion for a new trial embracing superfluous and unnecessary matter, such as lengthy colloquies, recitals of irrelevant facts, so as to render it difficult, if not impractical, for court to ascertain ruling or conduct complained of, will not be considered.

12. CRIMINAL LAW §396(1)—CHARACTER OF DECEASED FOR VIOLENCE—SPECIFIC ACTS.

That a witness offered to show deceased's character for violence testified on cross-examination, without objection, that deceased "ran when he got a chance" would not allow counsel offering him to prove specific acts of violence.

Error from Superior Court, Ben Hill County; D. A. R. Crum, Judge.

Charlie Fountain was convicted of voluntary manslaughter. His motion for new trial was overruled, and he excepts and brings error. Affirmed.

Charlie Fountain, a white man, was indicted for the murder of Crockett Gallimore, a negro, and was convicted of voluntary manslaughter. A motion for a new trial was filed, on a number of grounds, among them that the court erred in refusing to continue the case, and in refusing to order a new trial on account of a certain occurrence during the progress of the trial. As to these two grounds the trial judge says, in a qualifying note:

"When this case was called on March 11th for trial, Mr. H. J. Quincey, of counsel, for movant, made the showing that Mr. John W. Bennett was leading counsel for the defendant. At his request the case was postponed until as late as Wednesday morning, March 20th, Mr. Quincey at that time knowing that he would be engaged in the regular term of Berrien county superior court, and not sure that he would be loose from that court at that time, Wednesday. On Wednesday morning, March 20th, the leading counsel, Mr. Bennett, and Mr. Rice, Mr. Quincey's partner, were present in court, as well as the defendant's father who, as the record shows, was in charge of the active preparation of the case on the facts. The court had summoned near 100 jurors in order that this case might be tried by a jury drawn from the box. The court, knowing that [of] all men connected with the case the defendant's father was better prepared to strike the jury than any one else, ruled the case to trial in so far as the selection of a jury on that date, and postponed the taking of testimony until the following day. Mr. Quincey came into the courtroom a few minutes after the selection of the jury had been completed, and had the opportunity of consultation with the witnesses, along with all the other counsel, during the remainder of the afternoon, from about 4 o'clock. As to the witnesses for whose absence continuance was asked John Bennett, E. D. Murray, and Dock Armatrout were secured, and were accessible to the defendant and his counsel during all of the actual trial of the case, and were not used by them. Iversen McCook was sworn. After the motion for continuance was made neither the defendant, nor his counsel, ever called on the court to procure the attendance of Sam Dixon, although he lived in the city. When the motion was overruled on Wednesday, March 20th, the court furnished a special officer with an automobile to search for Charlie Baker, and the defendant's counsel were notified that they could provide any friend or relative of the defendant to go along with this special officer to make search for Charlie Baker, and they availed themselves of this privilege. After being gone all day the officer reported that they had gone to those portions of the county designated by the defendant and his counsel, and that they were unable to find Charlie Baker, or to find any one who knew or had ever heard of him. When this report was made, defendant was asked if they desired any further search made, or could suggest where Baker might be found, and, there being no further suggestions as to the whereabouts of Baker, further efforts to find him were abandoned.

"Note to the second ground of the amended motion: During the trial of the case the court was privately informed by the sheriff that a man under the influence of whisky had been in the witness room, and treating the witnesses to whisky. The court privately informed the sheriff to be sure as to this, and, if he found that such was the case, to arrest the offending party and bring him into court. The witness room referred to is in the corner of the courthouse building, adjacent to the front entrance door to the courtroom, that entrance door being a folding door, situated about 50 feet in front of, and in full view of, the judge's stand, the upper two-fifths of each panel of the doors being of opaque glass. There is a strong light coming through this door from the outside of the building, to such an extent that the court could see through this opaque glass movements of the bodies of parties outside the door. Anticipating that the sheriff might make an arrest, the court was on the lookout for what did occur. As soon as he saw a commotion beyond the door outside of the courtroom he divined what was coming, and immediately turned to the jury and addressed them direct, 'Gentlemen, go to the jury room.' The jurors immediately arose from their seats, and were making their way to the jury room door, which was within a few feet of the jury box, when the sheriff came through the front door with one Tom Fuller, and while he was making his way down the aisle the jurors were filing out. A few of the jurors hesitated, and the court spoke to them again, and asked them to retire to the jury room, which they did. The sheriff brought the prisoner around on the opposite side from the jury to the judge's stand, and placed a bottle partly filled with what appeared to be whisky on the judge's stand. Without making any inquiry as to what had occurred, and without anything being said within the possible hearing of the jury as to the cause of the arrest, the court, addressing the sheriff, ordered the prisoner taken to jail. In this connection the court further certifies that while the name of Tom Fuller was called as a witness for the defendant when he called his list of witnesses, Fuller did not respond, and was not brought to the bar of the court and sworn with the other witnesses, and sent to the witness room. The court being of the opinion that nothing had occurred to prejudice the defendant, or his case, and as defendant's counsel were unable at the time to point out wherein or how his case had been in any wise prejudiced, the court declined to grant the mistrial as asked for."

The motion for a new trial was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

John W. Bennett, of Waycross, and H. J. Quincey, of Ocilla, for plaintiff in error.

J. B. Wall, Sol. Gen., and A. J. McDonald, both of Fitzgerald, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 11] 1. Some of the grounds of the motion for a new trial in this case contain much unnecessary matter. The attention of counsel is called to the first headnote in

Gate City Gaslight Co. v. Farley, 95 Ga. 796, 23 S. E. 119, where it is said that:

"Grounds of a motion for a new trial * * * which embrace utterly superfluous and unnecessary matter, such as lengthy colloquies between counsel on opposing sides, or between counsel and the court, tedious recitals of irrelevant facts, statements taken from the stenographic notes of the trial, and other like things, to such an extent as to bury the point in question under a great mass of entirely needless phrasology, and thus render it very difficult, if not impracticable, for this court to ascertain what was really the ruling or other conduct of the court complained of, will not be considered."

See, also, Henley v. Brockman, 124 Ga. 1059, 53 S. E. 672 (4); City of Atlanta v. Sciple, 19 Ga. App. 696, 92 S. E. 28 (1). Under the facts of the instant case, as shown by the record, and under the qualifying note of the trial judge, which is copied in the foregoing statement of facts, we cannot say that the ends of justice required a postponement of this case, nor that the trial judge abused his discretion in refusing a continuance, nor that he erred in refusing to declare a mistrial.

[2] 2. Grounds 3 and 4 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial present practically the same problem for solution, and will be considered together. A witness was called by the defendant, and testified to the character for violence of the deceased, saying it was bad. On cross-examination the witness testified:

"The night Gallimore was so rough I started to tell about while ago, he run when he got a chance."

After the cross-examination, counsel for defendant said to the witness to "Go ahead and tell what he did on that particular occasion at the time you said he ran;" counsel then stating that the witness would testify "In substance, that after the dispute about the overcoat he asked him if he was not afraid to dispute a white man's word, and the negro replied by saying, 'No,' that men were all the same to him, or words to that effect, and that the negro thereupon did draw his knife on him, and attempted to cut him, and that he struck him with his pistol and knocked him down, and shot at him as he was running off." The court said, "I decline to admit that." The solicitor general had objected to the attorney for the defendant asking the witness about specific acts or particular instances of violence. This ruling of the court was correct. The rule is:

"Evidence offered in a trial for murder to show the character of the deceased for violence will, as to the party making the attack, be confined to the reputation which the deceased bore in the community, and will not extend to specific acts. * * * Any evidence depending on the knowledge of the witness, save what he has as to the reputation of the deceased, should be excluded." Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 9, 29 S. E. 309 (1, 1b) 65 Am. St. Rep. 277.

In Owens v. State, 120 Ga. 210, 47 S. E. 545, Justice Cobb said:

"One's character for peace or violence is established by general reputation, and a witness will not be permitted, on direct examination, to go further than state what was the general reputation of the person in question for peace or violence. The person calling such witness will not be permitted to inquire into specific acts of violence or particular habits which might throw light upon this question. On cross-examination, however, the witness may be sifted, and inquiry may be made into the conduct of the person on different occasions or as to his different habits."

In Andrews v. State, 118 Ga. 1, 3, 43 S. E. 852, 853, Judge Lamar said:

"The character for violence both of the deceased and accused had been put in issue. The court properly refused to allow the defendant to prove specific acts of violence on the part of the deceased towards his wife. Ordinarily even the general character of the parties is inadmissible, and their conduct in other transactions is especially irrelevant. Civil Code, § 5159. In a trial for murder the general character of the deceased for turbulence and violence may be shown, but specific acts are inadmissible. Pound v. State, 43 Ga. 128; Doyal v. State, 70 Ga. 147; Thornton v. State, 107 Ga. 687 [33 S. E. 673]. On the same principle the general character of a witness for truth may be shown for the purpose of impeachment, but specific acts cannot be made the subject of inquiry (Civil Code, § 5293), and for the reason that every man is supposed to be able at a moment's notice to establish his general character for truthfulness or for peaceableness; but the best, as well as the worst, might often be unable to explain a single transaction requiring the presence, not of any one familiar with him, but only the eyewitnesses of that special transaction, in order to justify, explain, or excuse. The general character of the deceased for turbulence or violence can be shown by his neighbors generally; the state and the accused alike are put on notice that such general character may become an issue in the trial. But no one was bound to anticipate that the specific instance inquired about would be made the subject of investigation. A specific act does not necessarily tend to establish one's general character. The single transaction may have been exceptional, unusual, and not characteristic of the deceased. Where a witness has testified that one bears the character of being peaceable, it may sometimes be proper, on cross-examination, to inquire if the witness has not heard that the man whom he says was peaceable had in a particular case acted in a manner directly contrary to such reputation. Ozburn v. State, 87 Ga. 180 [13 S. E. 247]. But this line of questioning is intended solely to test the truthfulness of the witness, and not for the purpose of making an investigation of the other transactions. To allow proof of specific acts of violence would prolong the trial, multiply issues, and confuse the jury."

See Thornton v. State, 107 Ga. 683 (3), 687 (3), 33 S. E. 673, and cases cited; Doyal v.

State, 70 Ga. 134 (5), 147 (5), and cases cited.

[12] The fact that on cross-examination the witness, without objection, testified that the deceased at the time in question "ran when he got a chance" would not alter this rule and allow counsel introducing him to prove specific acts of violence. "There can be no equation of errors in the trial of a case." Stapleton v. Monroe, 111 Ga. 848, 36 S. E. 428 (2).

[3] 3. The fifth special ground of the motion for new trial alleges error as follows:

"Because the following evidence on behalf of the state was admitted to the jury over the objection of movant, to wit: 'He (movant) walked up there and just pulled the gun and stuck it up the negro's neck, and Mr. Nasworthy called him over there and told him to come over there; that he would 'run off the music.' (The foregoing testimony was delivered by Marvin Wash, a witness for the state, upon the trial of said case, and referred to a transaction between movant and a party other than the deceased, at a time prior to the killing of deceased.)"

The objection urged at the time of the introduction of this evidence was that it was irrelevant and inadmissible. Every ground of a motion for new trial must be complete within itself, and show error without reference to other parts of the record. When and to what place was it that movant "walked up"? It is stated that it was "prior to the killing of deceased," but how long prior? Under what circumstances did the movant pull the gun and stick it "up the negro's neck"? Standing alone, the evidence to the introduction of which complaint is made in this motion is too indefinite for this court to say that its introduction was harmful to the cause of plaintiff in error. "Grounds of a motion for new trial which are incomplete, and cannot be understood without resorting to an examination of the brief of evidence, fail to present any question for decision." Copeland v. Ruff, 20 Ga. App. 218, 92 S. E. 955, and cases cited.

[4] 4. The sixth special ground of the motion complains of the introduction by the state of that portion of the written motion made by the defendant for a continuance, which follows:

"Defendant shows that he expects to prove by said absent witness that he, the said John Bennett, was present when the difficulty occurred between Crockett Gallimore and this defendant, in which difficulty the said Crockett Gallimore was killed, and defendant expects the said Bennett to swear that upon that occasion the said Gallimore walked upon this defendant's feet, and when defendant remonstrated with him for so doing and asked him, the said Gallimore, to desist from such conduct, the said Gallimore cursed this defendant for a 'God damned white son of a bitch,' and stated that he would cut his 'God damn throat,' and actually drew his knife and attempted to cut this defendant, and that this [defendant] then and only then shot the deceased in order to save his own life."

The only objection to this testimony was that it was inadmissible, irrelevant, and immaterial. Taking this evidence as it stands alone, we cannot say that its nature is manifestly prejudicial to the cause of the plaintiff in error, and no attempt is made to point out in what respect the admission of this evidence was harmful. In Brown v. State, 119 Ga. 572, 46 S. E. 833, Justice Lamar said:

"An assignment of error must be complete in itself. * * * If on its face manifestly prejudicial, or if the motion discloses in what way irrelevant testimony has been harmful, a new trial may be granted for its admission over objection. But mere irrelevancy is not sufficient to upset a verdict. Such evidence cumbrous the record, sheds no light, gives no assistance, and prima facie is calculated to do no harm. If it does, the motion should disclose how it worked such a result."

See, also, Johnson v. State, 128 Ga. 71, 57 S. E. 84 (2).

[5] 5. The seventh special ground of the motion for a new trial is as follows:

"Because the court, having admitted the portion of the written motion for continuance set out and complained of in the sixth ground of this amendment, erred in refusing to admit in evidence the entire motion for continuance submitted by movant, a timely request that the whole record be admitted in evidence, if any portion of it was to be, having been submitted by counsel for movant, which request was denied by the court."

The court did not err in this ruling.

"An assignment of error upon a ruling of the court excluding evidence, which does not set forth the evidence literally or in substance, is too indefinite to present any question for consideration." Danner v. Johns, 147 Ga. 687, 95 S. E. 233 (1); Lewis Mfg. Co. v. Davis, 147 Ga. 203, 93 S. E. 206 (1); Deal v. Moseley, 147 Ga. 523, 94 S. E. 1013 (5); Maxwell v. Rucker, 127 Ga. 111, 56 S. E. 91; Johnson v. Thrower, 123 Ga. 706, 51 S. E. 636 (1); Chamblee v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, 20 Ga. App. 527, 93 S. E. 239 (4); City of Atlanta v. Sciple, 19 Ga. App. 696, 92 S. E. 28 (1), and cases cited.

[8] 6. Complaint is made in ground 8 of the motion for a new trial that the court, ex mero motu, twice interrupted counsel for the defendant in his concluding argument, and alleges several reasons why these interruptions were erroneous. While the interruptions may have been unwarranted, and were doubtless annoying to counsel, we cannot say they were harmful to the cause of his client. Indeed, if the interruptions by the court of counsel, and the colloquies between them which followed, had any effect on the jury we are inclined to think it was beneficial to the cause of plaintiff in error, for in both instances the judge finally admitted the correctness of the position of counsel, and each time allowed him to proceed as if no interruption had taken place. Nor can we believe that the interruptions by the court of able and experienced counsel could have so disturbed "the line of argument of counsel" that his address to the jury "may not have been as effective as otherwise if counsel had been permitted to pursue his line of argument without the unlawful and unwarranted interference of the court." If there are any dormant powers of eloquence in the speaker, such interruptions usually arouse them. "The lion sleeping in his lair when aroused by a wound fares forth with an angry roar, and woe to the other beasts, it matters not how powerful, that cross his path." Moreover, if the conduct of the trial judge appeared prejudicial to the cause of defendant, a motion for mistrial should have been made. Perdue v. State, 135 Ga. 277, 69 S. E. 184 (1); Harrison v. State, 20 Ga. App. 157 (6), 160 (6), 92 S. E. 970, and cases cited.

[7] 7. Complaint is made of the refusal of the court to declare a mistrial because the solicitor general in his concluding argument said:

"The only thing we were able to get out of him [Marsh Wilcox] was that the negro ran."

The witness Marsh Wilcox had been introduced by the defendant to show the character for violence of deceased. On cross-examination the witness testified that on a certain occasion the deceased "ran when he got a chance." In the enthusiasm of debate the solicitor general used the language quoted above; but we do not think this error is of sufficient gravity to demand a new trial, especially as the judge, when he refused the motion to declare a mistrial, told the jury:

"I will instruct the jury that they are to consider the evidence in the case as it has been delivered by the witnesses and all other evidence as it has been admitted in the case."

While the court did not in express terms instruct the jury not to consider the statement of the solicitor general, the effect of the instructions given was to eliminate it from the consideration of the jury. Besides, a statement made by an attorney in his argument to the jury will result in a mistrial only when the cause of the opposite party would be affected thereby. Justice Evans, in Taylor v. State, 121 Ga. 354, 49 S. E. 306, said:

"What the law forbids is the introduction into a case, by way of argument, of facts not in the record, and calculated to prejudice the accused."

Judge Russell, speaking for the court, in Moore v. State, 10 Ga. App. 811, 74 S. E. 318, said:

"In our opinion, therefore, the question in every case turns upon whether the nature of the argument is such that it is manifestly improper and prejudicial to the rights of the opposite party. If the nature of the remark is such that it can plainly be seen that it could not have affected the result, the error would be harmless, and would afford no ground for a new trial. For this reason, if the argument was directed to some collateral matter not directly affecting the guilt or innocence of the accused in a criminal trial, though the argument might be improper, the error would seem to be immaterial."

See Ellis v. State, 124 Ga. 91 (1), 93 (1), 52 S. E. 147. In the instant case, as stated by Judge Lumpkin in McNabb v. Lockhart, 18 Ga. 507 (4):

"The facts were rather overstated; not sufficiently so, however, to authorize a new trial on that ground."

[8] 8. When considered in connection with the entire charge, there is no error in the excerpt therefrom complained of in the tenth special ground of the motion for a new trial.

[9] 9. The judge charged the jury as follows:

"If you believe that he was justified in taking the life of Crockett Gallimore, if such you find and believe to be the truth of the case beyond a reasonable doubt from the evidence in the case, that is, if you find and believe beyond a reasonable doubt that he did take the life of Crockett Gallimore, but you believe that he was justified in so doing, then you should acquit him."

After a clear, full, and fair charge covering all the issues of the case, the judge was charging on the forms of the verdict. After telling the jury under what conditions they should return a verdict of murder, or a verdict of murder with a recommendation to the mercy of the court, or a verdict of voluntary manslaughter, the judge said:

"If you do not believe the defendant guilty of the offense of voluntary manslaughter, or if you entertain a reasonable doubt of his guilt of that offense, then you should acquit him."

Then followed that portion of the charge quoted above and alleged to be erroneous. The first clause of the sentence in the excerpt above is erroneous, but when in the same sentence the judge immediately adds, "that is, if you find and believe beyond a reasonable doubt that he did take the life of Crockett Gallimore, but you believe that he was justified in so doing, then you should acquit him," the effect of this last clause, which is a correct statement of the law, is to "specifically modify" the first and erroneous clause, and to render same harmless. The jury could clearly see that the judge was correcting the statement in the first clause, though he did not in express terms so state. It will also be noted that the erroneous clause is immediately preceded, as well as immediately followed, by a correct statement of the law, and under these circumstances the jury could hardly have been misled by the erroneous statement.

[10] 10. The judge charged the jury as follows:

"Flight, if any, and similar acts, if proven, from which an inference of guilt may be drawn, may be considered by the jury, but flight is subject to explanation; the weight to be given to it, or whether the jury will draw an inference of consciousness of guilt, or not, is for the jury. It is for the jury to determine whether the flight of the defendant, if such has been proven, was due to a sense of guilt, or to other reasons. If from other reasons, no inference hurtful to the defendant must be drawn by the jury."

We find no error in the language of the judge, nor do we think it was error harmful to the defendant that the charge was given. It appears from this ground of the motion that it was contended by the state that flight had been shown, and this charge simply left the jury to determine whether or not flight had been proven, and, if so, whether or not they would draw from it "an inference of consciousness of guilt," and this charge could not have "amounted to an expression of opinion on the part of the court that the defendant had fled, when in point of fact there was no evidence to show that such was the case."

(a) The charge was not erroneous because the court did not instruct the jury what was meant by "and similar acts, if proven, from which an inference of consciousness of guilt may be drawn."

11. There was evidence to support the verdict.

CRIMINAL LAW — 1134(3)—APPEAL—MOOT QUESTION—DISMISSAL.

The only assignment of error in the bill of exceptions in this case is upon the refusal of the trial judge to grant an application for bail made by a defendant who had been convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and who had pending in this court a bill of exceptions to a judgment overruling his motion for a new trial. This court having this day affirmed the judgment of the lower court refusing a new trial in that case (Fountain v. State [No. 9978], 98 S. E. 178), the question raised in the present case became moot.

MITCHELL v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.
(No. 9747.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1
Jan. 14, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL \S 69 — DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT — EXCLUSION OF ADDITIONAL EVIDENCE.

It does not appear that the court abused the discretion vested in the judge by refusing to allow additional evidence in behalf of the plaintiff after announcing that a nonsuit would be awarded; it further appearing both that counsel for the plaintiff had knowledge of the existence of the proposed additional evidence and that the same was then and there available before closing the case, and no reason being assigned why such additional evidence had not been previously presented. Cushman v. Coleman, 92 Ga. 772, 19 S. E. 46; Penn v. Georgia So. Ry. Co., 129 Ga. 856, 60 S. E. 172; Polhill v. Postal Telegraph-Cable Co., 16 Ga. App. 601, 85 S. E. 936 (3); Moore v. Dixie Fire Insurance Co., 19 Ga. App. 800, 807, 92 S. E. 302.

2. COMMERCE \S 27(7) — PERSONAL INJURY — FEDERAL EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT.

There was no error in awarding a nonsuit on the first and second counts of the petition, as the evidence failed to establish that the defendant was engaged and the plaintiff employed, at the time of the injury, in interstate commerce. According to his testimony the plaintiff was "inspector for engines, tanks, wheels, and all such as that—engine carpenter," and inspected engines engaged in both intrastate and interstate commerce. He inspected any engine that came into the roundhouse, and an engine might run to Chattanooga, Tenn., on one day, to Jacksonville, Fla., on another day, or to Macon, Ga., on still another day. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Winters, 242 U. S. 353, 37 Sup. Ct. 170, 61 L. Ed. 858, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 54. The answer of the defendant to the allegation as made in the petition (which was afterwards made more definite by amendment) that the plaintiff was injured while employed in interstate commerce was not so evasive as to constitute an admission of the truth of the alleged fact, and to supply, when introduced in evidence, sufficient proof that the plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce.

3. REMOVAL OF CAUSES \S 2, 25(1)—REFUSAL OF APPLICATION.

The court erred in granting the second application to remove the case from the state to the federal court, after sustaining the motion to award a nonsuit as to the two counts in the declaration, alleging that the plaintiff was employed in interstate commerce at the time of the injury, since the plaintiff did not admit any failure of proof as to the character of the employment, nor did he amend his complaint, but at all times insisted, and still insists, that the allegation was supported by the evidence, and it not appearing that the allegations as to employment in interstate commerce were made for the fraudulent purpose of evading the removal of the case from the state court.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by R. D. Mitchell against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Colquitt & Conyers, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

McDaniel & Black, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

WADE, C. J. In the case of Great Northern R. Co. v. Alexander, 246 U. S. 276, 38 Sup. Ct. 237, 62 L. Ed. 713, it was said:

"It is, of course, familiar law that, the right of removal being statutory, a suit commenced in a state court must remain there until cause is shown for its transfer under some act of Congress. Little York Gold Washing & Water Co. v. Keyes, 96 U. S. 199, 24 L. Ed. 656; Judicial Code, c. 3, §§ 28, 39 (36 Stat. at L. 1094, 1099), c. 231, Comp. Stat. 1916, §§ 1010, 1021). The allegation of the complaint that the deceased was employed in interstate commerce when injured brought the case within the scope of the federal Employers' Liability Act [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665], and it would have been removable either for diversity of citizenship or as a case arising under a law of the United States, except for the prohibition against removal contained in the amendment to the act, approved April 5, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 291, c. 143). But this allegation rendered the case, at the time it was commenced, clearly not removable on either ground. Kansas City Southern Ry. Co. v. Leslie, 238 U. S. 599, 59 L. Ed. 1478, 35 Sup. Ct. 844; Southern Ry. Co. v. Lloyd, 239 U. S. 496, 60 L. Ed. 402, 36 Sup. Ct. 210. * * *

It is also settled that a case, arising under the laws of the United States, nonremovable on the complaint, when commenced, cannot be converted into a removable one by evidence of the defendant or by an order of the court upon any issue tried upon the merits, but that such conversion can only be accomplished by the voluntary amendment of his pleadings by the plaintiff, or, where the case is not removable because of joinder of defendants, by the voluntary dismissal or nonsuit by him of a party or of parties defendant. Kansas City Suburban Belt Ry. Co. v. Herman, 187 U. S. 63, 47 L. Ed. 76, 23 Sup. Ct. 24; Alabama Great Southern Ry. Co. v. Thompson, 200 U. S. 206, 50 L. Ed. 441, 26 Sup. Ct. 161, 4 Ann. Cas. 1147; Lathrop, Shea & Henwood Co. v. Interior Construction Co., 215 U. S. 246, 54 L. Ed. 177, 30 Sup. Ct. 76; American Car & Foundry Co. v. Kettelhake, 238 U. S. 311, 59 L. Ed. 594, 35 Sup. Ct. 355.

The obvious principle of these decisions is that, in the absence of a fraudulent purpose to defeat removal, the plaintiff may, by the allegations of his complaint, determine the status with respect to removability of a case, arising under a law of the United States, when it is commenced, and that this power to determine the removability of his case continues with the plaintiff throughout the litigation, so that whether such a case, nonremovable when commenced, shall afterwards become removable, depends not upon what the defendant may allege or prove, or what the court may, after hearing upon the merits, in invitum, order, but solely upon the form which the plaintiff by his voluntary action shall give to the pleadings in the case as it progresses towards a conclusion. * * * The plaintiff did not at any time admit that he had failed to prove the allegation that the deceased was employed in interstate commerce when injured, and he did not amend his complaint, but, on the contrary, he has contended at every stage of the case, and in his brief in this court still contends, that the allegation was supported by the evidence. The first holding to the contrary was by the state Supreme Court, and the most that can be said of that decision is that the defendant prevailed in a matter of defense which he had pleaded, but, as we have seen, this does not convert a nonremovable case into a removable one, in the absence of voluntary action on the part of the plaintiff, and it therefore results that the defendant did not at any time have the right to remove the case to the federal court, which it claims was denied to it, and that therefore, there being no substance in the claim of denial of federal right, this court is without jurisdiction to review the decision of the Supreme Court of Montana, and the writ of error must be dismissed."

It is not necessary to add anything further to the rulings stated in the headnotes.
Judgment reversed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 928(1), 1064(1)—
NEW TRIAL \S 128(3)—TRIAL \S 224, 423 —REQUEST FOR WRITTEN CHARGE—TIME—STATUTE.

Where counsel for either party in any case, civil or criminal, desires the trial judge to write out his charge and read it to the jury, a request therefor must be made before argument begins. Pen. Code 1910, \S 1056; Homer v. State, 6 Ga. App. 667, 65 S. E. 701.

(a) The charge so written out and read to the jury should be filed, as soon as delivered, with the clerk of the court. Civ. Code 1910, \S 4848.

(b) Failure of the trial judge to hand his written charge, immediately after he has read it to the jury, to the clerk of the court to be filed, is reversible error, unless the evidence demanded the verdict returned. Forrester v. Cocke, 6 Ga. App. 829, 65 S. E. 1063.

(c) Where a special ground of a motion for a new trial complains that the trial judge refused to write out his charge, after being requested to do so by counsel in the case, it must be affirmatively shown in the ground of the motion that the request was made before the argument began. However, where (as in the instant case) the complaint is, not that the judge refused the request of counsel to write out his charge and read it to the jury, but that the judge, after complying with such request, failed to hand the charge at once to the clerk of the court to be filed, and retained it in his possession until the following day, when he filed it with the clerk, it will be conclusively presumed that the request was made in due time, unless the contrary is shown affirmatively in the motion or by a certificate of the trial judge.

(d) Where such a request had been made to the judge, no waiver of the right to have the charge reduced to writing and read to the jury, or to have it filed with the clerk of the court as soon as it had been read, resulted from the fact that the counsel who made the request informed the judge that he did not insist upon the judge's writing out the charge in pen and ink, but that it would be perfectly satisfactory for the judge to dictate his charge to the court reporter, have it typewritten, and read this typewritten charge to the jury, and that the judge adopted this suggestion.

2. TRIAL \S 225(1)—CHARGE—FILING WITH CLERK.

In the instant case, instead of filing with the clerk of the court the typewritten charge as soon as it had been read to the jury, the judge retained it in his possession and did not deliver it to the clerk until the following day. This was reversible error, and a new trial of the case is required.

HUSON v. DAWSON NAVAL STORES & LUMBER CO. et al. (No. 9876.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 29, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)BROKERS'—§57(1)—ACTION FOR COMPENSATION—SUFFICIENCY OF SERVICE.

This suit was based upon a contract authorizing the plaintiff to effect a sale of land for the Dawson Naval Stores & Lumber Company to one Moulton upon specified terms as to payment, etc., so that it would net to the owner $3.50 per acre, and to retain as compensation for this service all obtained for it in excess of that amount. The contract fixed December 20, 1913, as the time limit within which the plaintiff should "make, complete, and execute the aforesaid sale." The plaintiff on December 17, 1913, effected with Moulton an agreement of sale which provided that the owner should make, execute, and deliver bond for titles to Moulton, and that Moulton should "make, execute, and deliver to the first party [Dawson Naval Stores & Lumber Company] notes and mortgages as aforesaid, within thirty days from delivery of abstracts of title to the party of the second part." Held:

There was a clear variance between the contract effected by the plaintiff and that which he was authorized to make, the time for completion of the sale being extended by him beyond

December 20th, the time fixed by the owner of the property, and the owner had the right to repudiate the contract, as there was no acceptance "on the terms stipulated by the owner." Park's Ann. Civ. Code, § 3587; Robinson v. Weller, 81 Ga. 704, 8 S. E. 447 (1); Phinizy v. Bush, 129 Ga. 479, 59 S. E. 259 (4); Van Winkle v. Harris, 137 Ga. 43, 72 S. E. 424 (1); Gray v. Lynn, 139 Ga. 204, 77 S. E. 156. Neither was there such acceptance by the owner or such ratification of the changes made as would amount to a legal waiver of the variance between the terms authorized and the terms agreed upon. The trial judge therefore did not err in sustaining a general demurrer to the plaintiff's petition.

Grounds 1 and 2 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial contain long extracts from the testimony, which were objected to "in solido." Some of this testimony was admissible, and the objection to it as a whole was properly overruled. "Where evidence, partly competent and partly incompetent, was offered, and objected to as a whole, the illegal portion not being specified nor objected to separately, admitting all of such evidence affords no legal cause of complaint to the objecting party." *Smalls v. 2. CHARGE OF COURT.

When considered in connection with the entire charge, there is no error in the excerpts therefrom, of which complaint is made in the third and fourth grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §1156(1), 1159(2) — MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—DISCRETION OF COURT.

In passing on the facts in a motion for a new trial, the judge of the trial court has some discretion; but, where he has exercised that discretion, this court is powerless to interfere. Our Supreme Court has said: "This court has always recognized that the greatest weight and consideration should be paid to the verdicts of juries, and in many cases has held that while the verdict was different from what the judges would have rendered as men, the court would not interfere. So, too, where the evidence was conflicting, it would not disturb the finding, although it might think that the preponderance was in favor of the losing party. In testing the sufficiency of evidence this court cannot consider the credibility of witnesses, that being a matter exclusively for the jury, who note their manner of testifying, and consider the thousand and one things transpiring during a trial, which cannot be photographed or transcribed and transmitted to this court as a part of the record." Patton v. State, 117 Ga. 234, 43 S. E. 534. The fourth headnote in the case of Bunn v. Hargraves, 3 Ga. App. 518, 60 S. E. 223, is as follows: "This court has no power to determine that the preponderance of the evidence is in favor of one party to a cause rather than the other, or to award a new trial in any case where there is any evidence sufficient to support the verdict rendered." See, also, Randall v. Bell, 12 Ga. App. 614, 77 S. E. 1132.

Where an architect enters into a contract whereby he is to furnish plans and specifications, together with estimates of the cost for the erection of a building, and one sum is to be paid for the entire service, this constitutes an entire contract (Spalding County v. Chamberlin, 130 Ga. 649, 61 S. E. 533); and if, after having furnished the plans and specifications, he should, without fault on the part of the other party, or what would amount to the consent of that party, fail or refuse to furnish the estimates contracted for, this would constitute a breach of the contract, and he could not recover thereon for such part performance. Ala. Gold Life Ins. Co. v. Garmany, 74 Ga. 51. When a breach is thus occasioned, the other party has a right to rescind the contract, on notification and return of what he has received, or he may at his pleasure abide by the contract and have a right of action to recover damages for the breach; but he cannot do both. But if, after such breach, he not only retains the articles received, but puts them to his own use, this is equivalent to an election to abide by the terms of the original contract, and he thereafter holds under those terms the articles actually received. Harden v. Lang, 110 Ga. 392, 36 S. E. 100.

2. WORK AND LABOR \S 14(3), 27(3)—PARTIAL PERFORMANCE—LIABILITY—QUANTUM MERUIT—EVIDENCE.

Even when work to be performed under an indivisible contract has not been done according to its terms, yet if the service is received, and is of benefit to the party receiving it, he is liable in a sum equal to the value of the service rendered and material furnished, and the party rendering the service and furnishing the material may recover such sum in a suit on a quantum meruit. Ford v. Smith, 25 Ga. 675; Sentell v. Mitchell, 28 Ga. 196; Southern Railway Co. v. Branch, 9 Ga. App. 311, 71 S. E. 696. In such a case the plaintiff must prove the value of his services, and the defendant may prove anything in proper reduction thereof. Jacobus v. Wood, 84 Ga. 638, 640, 10 S. E. 1099.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Suit by C. E. Frazier against J. S. Collins and others. Verdict for plaintiff, and, from the overruling of their certiorari, defendants except and bring error. Affirmed.

C. E. Frazier brought suit in the municipal court of Atlanta against J. S. and C. R. Collins, alleging that he is an architect, and that the defendants employed him to prepare plans and specifications for a building to be erected by them, he agreeing to prepare the plans and specifications for a price that he would consider reasonable, and that he thought would be satisfactory to the defendants; that, about 60 days after the plans and specifications had been prepared and delivered to the defendants, he called on them for a payment, stating to them at the time that his charge would be 1¼ per cent. of the cost of the building, and the defendants at that time paid him $100 on account. The petition, as amended, alleged that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $437, the building having cost approximately $25,000. He afterwards amended his petition by adding a count based on a quantum meruit. The defendants answered, setting up that they employed the plaintiff to prepare plans, specifications, and estimates, he agreeing to prepare the same regardless of price, and to make the price satisfactory to the defendants; that the work was done in a very unsatisfactory manner, and they denied indebtedness. They subsequently amended their answer by setting up that the estimates which the plaintiff had agreed to prepare were not prepared according to contract; that the $100 paid to him was paid before they knew or had opportunity to know of the errors and mistakes in the estimates; and that, by reason of his failure to make the estimates with any reasonable care and skill, he had broken his contract and was not entitled to anything; and they prayed for a judgment against him for $100. Upon the trial of the case the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $250. The defendants sued out certiorari, and they except to the judgment of the superior court, overruling the certiorari.

Paul S. Etheridge and Moore & Branch, all of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

Robt. C. & Philip H. Alston, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] It is insisted by the defendants that the trial court erred in refusing to charge the jury as follows:

"If you believe, from the evidence, that the plaintiff was employed by defendants to prepare plans, specifications, and estimates, then I charge you that this would be an entire contract, and that, unless the plaintiff in good faith and with reasonable care and skill performed all of the contract, then he cannot recover on any part of the contract."

In so far as appears from the evidence adduced upon the trial of this case, the plans and specifications furnished by the plaintiff conformed in every respect to the requirements of the contract, and, while the defendants introduced testimony tending to show that the estimates furnished by the plaintiff were inaccurate, the undisputed evidence shows that the plans, specifications, and estimates, as furnished, were accepted and retained and used by the defendants in the erection and completion of the building for which they were furnished, and that no complaint was made with reference thereto until the present suit was instituted. There was ample evidence to support the verdict; and, under the rules stated in the headnotes, and the facts of this case, the court did not err in refusing to give to the jury the charge requested by the defendants. The ruling made by the Supreme Court in Spalding County v. Chamberlin, 130 Ga. 649, 61 S. E. 533, is not in conflict with the holding here made, since that case was not an action on a quantum meruit, where there was acceptance and use of a portion of the agreed service, but was a suit based upon contract, where no such fact of use and acceptance was shown.

The other exception, which is taken to the charge given, is governed by the same principle, and the charge is not subject to the criticism made.

McELREATH v. GROSS et al. (No. 9745.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 16, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. PROCESS ¶168—"MALICIOUS USE OF LEGAL PROCESS"—"MALICIOUS ABUSE OF LEGAL PROCESS"—SUIT FOR DAMAGES.

"Malicious use of legal process" is where a plaintiff in a civil proceeding employs the court's process in order to execute the object which the law intends for such a process to subserve, but proceeds maliciously and without probable cause. In a suit for damages growing out of such malicious use of process, it must appear that the previous litigation has finally terminated against the plaintiff therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Malicious Abuse of Process.]

2. PROCESS ¶168—"MALICIOUS ABUSE OF PROCESS"—SUIT FOR DAMAGES.

"Malicious abuse of legal process" is where a plaintiff in a civil proceeding willfully misapplies the process of a court in order to obtain an object which such a process is not intended by law to effect. In a suit for damages growing out of such a perversion of the court's process, it is not necessary to show that the former litigation was without probable cause, or that it terminated prior to the institution of the suit for damages.

3. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION ¶49—PROCESS ¶171—MALICIOUS USE AND ABUSE OF PROCESS—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—PETITION.

The court below did not err in sustaining the demurrer as applied to each count of the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Camden County; J. P. Highsmith, Judge.

Action for damages by Emmett McElreath against J. H. Gross and others. General demurrer to petition sustained, suit dismissed, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

It appears that an ordinance of the City of Kingsland imposed certain license taxes for doing business within that municipality; and provided for its enforcement by fine or labor on the streets, where persons liable to the tax transacted such business without first obtaining a license so to do; that Gross, Carleton, and others filed a petition for injunction against Emmett McElreath, the mayor, and W. H. Jones, the marshal of the municipality, in which they alleged that the ordinance was void as not being authorized by the city's charter, that petitioners had been arrested and fined for doing business without a license, and that they had sued out writs of habeas corpus before the ordinary, but that the mayor had notified them that he would continue to have them arrested if they attempted to do business without a license, wherefore they prayed that the defendants be enjoined from further arresting or trying them under said ordinance. On the interlocutory hearing before the judge of the superior court, the defendants were enjoined as prayed. That judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court, it being held that the case fell within the general rule that a court having equitable jurisdiction will not restrain by injunction a prosecution for the violation of a penal ordinance, nor in such a proceeding inquire into the validity of the ordinance, and that the case did not properly come within the exceptions to such general rule as had in some instances been recognized. See Jones v. Carlton, 146 Ga. 1, 90 S. E. 278. This decision of the Supreme Court was made the judgment of the court below, and, after the final determination of the injunction proceeding, the said Emmett McElreath instituted the present action for damages against the petitioners in that proceeding, alleging in the first count that the former proceeding was without probable cause and was a malicious use of legal process, intended only to injure, harass, and humiliate the petitioner in his administration of the office of mayor, and that such was its effect. The second count was for a malicious abuse of legal process, the averments of fact setting up the right of action being substantially the same as in the first count, except that a lack of probable cause as to the former proceeding was not alleged. To this suit for damages all the pleadings and orders in the former case were attached as exhibits. The defendants entered a general demurrer to the petition, and the trial judge sustained the demurrer and dismissed the suit, assigning as his reason therefor that the injunction proceeding was not without probable cause, and that since it had been maintained against the defendants in their official capacity, the present individual suit by the plaintiff would not lie.

Jas. T. Vocelle, of St. Marys, for plaintiff in error.

S. C. Townsend, of St. Marys, and Jas. R. Thomas, of Jesup, for defendants in error.

JENKINS, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. It was manifestly not error to sustain the demurrer so far as the first count, pertaining to the malicious use of process, was concerned. The lack of probable cause is one of the necessary elements to be alleged and proved in an action of this character. In the case of Short v. Spragins, 104 Ga. 628, 30 S. E. 810, the Supreme Court said:

"Where an equitable petition for injunction and the appointment of a receiver, which fairly and honestly set forth the facts relied upon by the plaintiffs therein, was presented to the judge of the superior court, who entered thereon an order sanctioning the petition, restrain-ing the defendants as prayed and appointing a temporary receiver, this action by the judge afforded conclusive evidence of probable cause for the bringing of the suit, although at an interlocutory hearing thereafter had the order above mentioned was rescinded by the judge as having been improvidently granted upon the facts alleged."

See, also, Georgia Loan & Trust Co. v. Johnston, 116 Ga. 628, 43 S. E. 27.

[2, 3] 2. Nor do we think that there was error in sustaining the demurrer in so far as it pertained to the second count of the petition, which sought to set up a malicious abuse of legal process. No misapplication or perversion of the court's process is made to appear. The object attained in suing out the petition for injunction was not a perversion of that process. If the purpose and effect of suing out the process had been to maliciously injure, harass, and humiliate the plaintiff, and had it been instituted without probable cause, but not actually put to some unauthorized use, there would have been a malicious use of a legal process; but in order for there to be a malicious abuse of process, it must be willfully misapplied or perverted to some use which the law did not intend that such a process should subserve. Brantley v. Rhodes-Haverty Furniture Co., 131 Ga. 276, 281, 62 S. E. 222. It does not appear that the process was employed for any purpose other than that which such a process was intended by law to effect, since the interlocutory granting of the injunction as prayed was the sole use made or object attained. As to what the present defendants did, the allegations end there. The mere fact that the institution of such a proceeding and the granting of such an order might of itself have incidentally caused the worry, annoyance, and humiliation alleged, and might also, as charged have occasioned the usual trouble and expense attending such litigation, could not be taken as a perversion or misapplication of the process. But if the process had been misapplied, had it been perverted to another and different use, such as the law did not intend such a process to subserve, and if by reason of such perversion the intended worry, trouble, and expense had resulted, then such an action for damages as is now referred to would properly lie. In making clear the rather fine but vital distinction which it is here sought to show, the statement in 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 632, quoted by the Supreme Court in Brantley v. Rhodes-Haverty Furniture Co., 131 Ga. 276, 281, 62 S. E. 222, is helpful:

"The principal distinction between an action for malicious abuse of process and one for malicious prosecution is that while the former lies for an improper use of the process after it is issued, the latter is an action for the malicious suing out of the process without probable cause."

See, also, Porter v. Johnson, 96 Ga. 145, 149, 23 S. E. 123; Mullins v. Matthews, 122 Ga. 286, 50 S. E. 101; Clement v. Orr, 4 Ga. App. 117, 60 S. E. 1017.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PARTS OF CHARGE.

When read in connection with the entire charge, there is no reversible error in any of the extracts therefrom, of which complaint is made in the motion for new trial.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §1160—VERDICT—REVIEW.

The evidence is sufficient to support the verdict; and, "the verdict having been approved by the trial judge, under the repeated and uniform rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court a reviewing court is powerless to interfere. When the verdict is apparently decidedly against the weight of the evidence, the trial judge has a wide discretion as to granting or refusing a new trial; but whenever there is any evidence, however slight, to support a verdict which has been approved by the trial judge, this court is absolutely without authority to control the judgment of the trial court." Toole v. Jones, 19 Ga. App. 24, 90 S. E. 732. See Bradham v. State, 21 Ga. App. 510, 94 S. E. 618, and cases cited.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §1064(3), 1151—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—CONTINUANCE—DISCRETION—SUFFICIENCY.

The ground of the motion alleging error in overruling the motion to continue is too indefinite for consideration by this court. It does not even give the name of the absent witness; nor does it show "that he has been subpoenaed; * * * that his testimony is material; that the witness is not absent by the permission, directly or indirectly, of the applicant; that he expects he will be able to procure the testimony of the witness at the next term of the court; and that the application is not made for the purpose of delay, but to enable the party to procure the testimony of the absent witness"; nor does the ground of the motion "state the facts expected to be proved by the witness." Pen. Code 1910, § 987. "Grounds of a motion for new trial should be complete within themselves." Daniel v. Schwarzwelss, 144 Ga. 81, 86 S. E. 239 (1); Copeland v. Ruff, 20 Ga. App. 218, 92 S. E. 955 (2); Bridges v. Griffin, 20 Ga. App. 599, 93 S. E. 170 (2). It is true that there is attached to the motion for a new trial what purports to be the evidence of plaintiff in error offered on a motion for continuance, but this is in no way identified as a part of this ground of the motion for new trial, nor referred to therein as an exhibit. In addition to the above, from the case of Sealy v. State, 1 Ga. 213 (1), 44 Am. Dec. 641, to Hilton v. Haynes, 147 Ga. 725 (2), 726 (2), 96 S. E. 220, our Supreme Court has decided that in motions for continuance the discretion of the court will be interfered with only in extreme cases. In the opinion in the Sealy Case, supra, 1 Ga. on page 216, 44 Am. Dec. 641, Judge Lumpkin said: "There is great danger of doing mischief by revising matters of this kind, which should properly be confided to the discretion of the court below, to be regulated by the circumstances of each particular case. No precise rule can be laid down, and a most arbitrary and oppressive exercise of this discretion must be made apparent to this court, before it will interfere." See, also, Blount v. State, 18 Ga. App. 204, 89 S. E. 78 (1). In the instant case we cannot say that the trial judge flagrantly abused his discretion.

HARRIS v. UNION COTTON MILLS.
(No. 9877.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 16, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PARENT AND CHILD ⇨7(3)—PERSONAL INJURY TO CHILD—PARENT'S RIGHT OF ACTION.

Where a father hires his minor son to an employer to do certain work, and the employer, without the consent of the father, puts the son to a different and more hazardous employment, and the son is injured, the father has a cause of action in his own behalf against the employer for the recovery of such diminution of the child's earning capacity, between the date of the injury and the date of his attaining his majority, as the injury may have occasioned. Braswell v. Garfield Cotton Oil Mill Co., 7 Ga. App. 167, 66 S. E. 539.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨230(7)—MINOR EMPLOYÉ—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—PERSONAL INJURY.

But where a minor, such as indicated, has been injured, and suit for damages is maintained in his own behalf, the fact that his employer might have changed the work and duties of his employment would not have the effect of having relieved the plaintiff of the duty on his part to exercise that degree of intelligence, knowledge, and judgment actually possessed by him; and thus, in such a suit, proof of such change of employment would not, of itself, furnish a ground of recovery, where it also appears that the injury complained of was brought about by the plaintiff's own inexcusable negligence. Wilder v. Miller, 128 Ga. 139, 57 S. E. 309 (3); Hendrickson v. Louisville & Nashville R. Co., 137 Ky. 562, 126 S. W. 117, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 311, and case note.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨155(1)—EMPLOYMENT OF MINOR SERVANTS—WARNING—LIABILITY.

If the danger was so patent and obvious that it must necessarily have been as easily known to the servant as to the master, the latter will not be liable for his failure to give warning. Crown Cotton Mills v. McNally, 123 Ga. 35, 51 S. E. 13; Williams v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 18 Ga. App. 120, 89 S. E. 158; 26 Cyc. 1171.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨154(1)—INJURY TO SERVANTS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—NONSUIT.

According to the plaintiff's evidence, he was at the time of the injury an ordinarily developed boy of average intelligence, lacking two months of being 18 years of age. He had worked in the mill for a period of several months, and for half of each day, for a period of three weeks, had been engaged at work with the particular machinery by which he was injured. None of the alleged acts of negligence on the part of the master are substantiated by the evidence of the plaintiff, save the allegation as to the failure of the master to give warning of the danger. The plaintiff necessarily must have known that to place his hand within the rapidly revolving open machinery, with which he was necessarily familiar, would be a dangerous act. Viewing the entire evidence as presented, with all reasonable inferences properly deducible therefrom, the court, in our opinion, did not err in granting a nonsuit. See Crown Cotton Mills v. McNally, 123 Ga. 35, 51 S. E. 13; Id. 127 Ga. 404, 56 S. E. 452, in which the facts involved were very similar to the evidence here presented.

Action by J. M. Watkins and others against W. M. Justice and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

J. R. Earle, of Walhalla, for appellants.

Stribling & Dendy, of Walhalla, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This is an action for partition of two tracts of land, one containing 135 acres, known as the Thomas Watkins home place, and the other containing 5 acres, known as the Eliza Watkins place. The plaintiffs allege that they, with the defendants, except W. M. Justice, are tenants in common in these lands, and ask for partition, and demand accounting from Sarah Watkins, defendant, in possession, for rents and profits. J. M. Watkins claims also to own in his own right the share of Nisea Watkins. Defendants deny that plaintiffs have any right on the 135-acre tract, and allege that Sarah Watkins is the sole owner of the same. After issue joined the cause was referred to the master to hear and determine all issues of law and fact, and report the same. The master made his report, wherein he found that W. M. Justice owned in fee the 135-acre tract, by virtue of a deed of conveyance executed and delivered to him. Since the commencement of this action, by Sarah Watkins, and that the 5-acre tract was subject to partition amongst the heirs at law of Eliza Watkins, deceased, and recommended a sale thereof for partition. He further found that J. M. Watkins was not an innocent purchaser for value without notice of the share of Nisea Watkins, but found that she had conveyed her interest prior to Sarah Watkins.

After the master had filed his report exceptions were duly filed and the cause was heard by his honor Judge Peurifoy, who by his decree filed April 26, 1918, overruled all exceptions, and approved and confirmed said report of said master. After entry of judgment, appellants appeal, and by four exceptions impute error.

[1] All of the exceptions are overruled except exception 4, for the reason that the pleadings raised a legal issue, and made it an action for the recovery of real estate, and the finding of the circuit judge is conclusive, if there is any evidence to sustain his finding, and there is. In addition to this we have the concurring finding of the master and circuit judge, and the appellants fail to satisfy this court that the finding is against the preponderance of the evidence.

[2] So much of exception 4 as raises the point that Cella Watkins, the widow of John Watkins, is barred of dower, according to the finding of circuit court, must be reversed. The record shows that the legal title to land conveyed was at one time in John Watkins during coverture with Cella, and the dower right of Cella attached therein, and the record fails to disclose any fact on her part that would defeat her claim thereto.

[3] All of the parties being before the court, her dower can be admeasured in this proceeding. With this modification as to dower, the judgment of circuit court is affirmed.

FOR JURY.

Questions of negligence, contributory negligence, and assumption of risk held under the evidence for the jury, where a construction company ordered an inexperienced laborer to go on a car of lumber and take the brakes off, and it ran down a grade into a post, causing his death.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by J. L. Ballenger, administrator of Foster Simpson, deceased, against the Fisk-Carter Construction Company, for death of deceased when a car of lumber ran down a grade into a post, after he as directed unloosed the brakes, the track being, it was claimed, icy and slippery. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sirrinc & Nettles, of Greenville, for appellant.

Martin & Henry, of Greenville, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an action for damages, by plaintiff against the defendant, for death resulting from personal injuries sustained by plaintiff's intestate, Foster Simpson, January 7, 1918, while engaged as a laborer by the defendant. The case was tried before Judge Wilson and a jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $2,000. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, a motion for a nonsuit was made by the defendant, and refused by his honor.

After entry of judgment, defendant appeals, and complains of error by 9 exceptions. At the hearing in this court appellant abandoned exceptions 2, 6, and 9. The remaining exceptions assign error in refusal of the defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and the judge's charge, and may be considered in three propositions: (1) That there is no testimony tending to establish any negligence, as alleged on the part of the defendant. (2) The testimony for the plaintiff shows that the injury was due solely to the negligence of the deceased. (3) The testimony for the plaintiff shows that the deceased laborer assumed the risk of injury under the circumstances. This exception cannot be sustained. The evidence shows that the place was dangerous, and that the defendant required the plaintiff's intestate to do a dangerous thing, in a dangerous way, and the jury were justified, under the law and evidence in the case, that the pleas of contributory negligence and assumption of risk could not avail.

The evidence shows that the deceased was an ignorant, inexperienced servant, as to this particular work; that he was neither warned nor instructed by the master; that the master selected the place, the fellow laborer's implements, and placed the deceased, who was ignorant and inexperienced and did not realize the unsafe conditions and surroundings in which the master had placed him. The evidence shows that he was an ordinary laborer, a country laborer, without experience in handling cars or in railroad-ing. The master selected four laborers from the crowd, and ordered deceased to go upon the cars and "take the brakes off."

The master put an extraordinary piece of work upon the deceased, and the deceased did the work imposed upon him, under and in presence of master's representative. His honor made no mistake in submitting to the jury, under the evidence in the case, for their determination, whether the defense of the pleas of contributory negligence or assumption of risk was made out. Neither do we see any error in any particular in his honor's charge.

All exceptions are overruled, and judgment affirmed.

(No. 10157.)

2. NEGLIGENCE ¶136(14) — QUESTION FOR JURY.

If the trial judge misstates the issues, his attention must be called to it or the error is waived.

4. NEGLIGENCE ¶61(2)—PROXIMATE CAUSE — ACTS OF THIRD PERSONS.

If a watchman for defendant was negligent in brandishing his club in front of a horse while telling the driver, plaintiff, that he could not drive on the defendant's premises, causing the horse to back the wagon into a dangerous excavation on the property of a third person, defendant cannot excuse himself, on the ground that the death trap was set by such third person.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by Mamie Dreher and her husband against the Columbia Mills Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Elliott and James H. Fowles, both of Columbia, for appellant.

A. W. Holman and A. F. Spigner, both of Columbia, for respondents.

FRASER, J. [1] There was evidence that the plaintiff was going along Gist street in the city of Columbia; that Gist street ran through the yard of the defendant mills company; that the street had gates at both the entrance into and exit of the street from the mill yard; that the gate of entrance was open; that as the plaintiff was going through the gate a watchman of the defendant said to the plaintiff, "You can't go through there;" that plaintiff asked permission to go far enough to turn round, and that another watchman ran up brandishing a stick, and ordered the plaintiff to go back; that the second watchman came so close to the horse and used such threatening gestures that it frightened the horse, and it went backwards out of the gate and ran the wagon off of the street and down the embankment, whereby the plaintiff sustained serious injuries. Much of this was denied, but this court cannot consider the preponderance of the testimony.

[2] The defendant made a motion for the direction of a verdict on the ground that there has been no negligence of any agent of the defendant acting within the scope of his authority. The motion was refused, and this refusal constitutes the first exception. The second watchman, Mr. Spigner, said:

"I am employed as watchman at the Columbia Mills, and it is my duty to stop all from coming into the millyard, except employes of the mill."

There is testimony, therefore, that the watchman was acting in the line of employment. Now, did Mr. Spigner wave the stick at the horse? Did he wave it close enough to the horse to frighten him? Was it negligence to do so, in view of the fact that there was a dangerous excavation just in the rear of the wagon? All of these questions were for the jury, and we cannot set aside their findings. This exception cannot be sustained.

The second exception is as follows:

"His honor erred when he charged the jury that if the plaintiff had acquired the right to go upon the defendant's property this right could not be negligently revoked, when there is no allegation in the complaint that the plaintiff acquired, or that the defendant revoked, a license to go upon its property, and when the allegation and proof was that the plaintiff was injured by a fall down a steep and dangerous embankment near one of the streets of Columbia, and not on the defendant's property."

This exception cannot be sustained.

[3] The rule is that if the trial judge misstates the issues, his attention must be called to it or the error is waived.

[4] The second part of this exception is really another exception, but it cannot be sustained. A man cannot excuse himself for throwing one into a death trap on the ground that the trap was set by a third person. The proximity of a death trap calls for greater care.

The judgment is affirmed.

C. S. Monteth, of Columbia, for appellant.
James H. Hammond and J. S. Verner, both of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action for personal injuries. The plaintiff was walking up Main street, in the city of Columbia, on a paved sidewalk. She stepped on a piece of banana peeling lying on the sidewalk and slipped and fell to the sidewalk, and broke her arm and otherwise injured herself, and brought this action for damages.

The plaintiff testified:

"I live at 2017 Main street. On the morning of June 10, 1917, between 7 and 8 a. m., while walking along the sidewalk on Main street going to store of H. D. Cooper, I slid or slipped on a banana peel and fell to the pavement. It was good daylight, and sidewalk was paved. My foot slipped from under me, and I fell on my left side, breaking my arm and otherwise bruising myself. Mr. Cooper helped me up. My arm pained me very much at the time and have never since that time been much good to me. Policemen pass my house all the time, about every half hour, or something of that kind. I saw policeman passing there the afternoon before I was injured. The scavenger wagons come right early, about 8 o'clock. The banana peeling was a black, rotten peeling, all dusty and full of dirt. It was an old peeling. It was lying not quite middleways of the pavement, and it had dust on it.

"I did not have anything but myself. I had a dollar bill in my hand, and that was all I had, and I was just going along in front, going along slowly. There was nothing to hurry me. I live on Main street near where I got hurt. Policemen pass my house all the time, every half hour, or hour. I see them pass my house every day. Scavenger wagons come by our house before 8 o'clock and take up trash from the street."

Cross-examination: "I do not know when the peeling was put on the sidewalk. I did not see it before I slipped on it. My eyesight is very good. I did not examine the banana peeling until after I had fallen. I went back and looked at it. The sidewalk at that point is the regular size of sidewalks on Main street. It is a nice paved sidewalk, and there is nothing the matter with it. I saw the peeling after I stepped on it and my foot rubbed it on the sidewalk."

There was further testimony to the effect that the throwing of a banana peeling on the sidewalk was forbidden by city ordinance; that a policeman was required to walk over that sidewalk every 45 minutes and it was his duty to remove such things from the sidewalk; that the driveway was swept by the city, but that the city relied upon the property owners to sweep the sidewalk; that the banana peeling was lying in plain view, and there were no other obstructions.

At the close of the testimony, the defendant moved for a direction of a verdict. The statute under which this action is brought reads:

"Causes of Action for Damages from Defects in Streets, Mismanagement, etc.—Any person who shall receive bodily injury, or damages in his person or property, through a defect in any street, causeway, bridge or public way, or by reason of defect or mismanagement of anything under control of the corporation within the limits of any town or city, may recover, in an action against the same, the amount of actual damages sustained by him by reason thereof.

If any such defect in a street, causeway or bridge existed before such injury or damage occurred, such damage shall not be recovered by the person so injured if his load exceed the ordinary weight: Provided, the said corporation shall not be liable unless such defect was occasioned by its neglect or mismanagement: Provided further, such person has not in any way brought about any such injury or damage by his or her own negligent act or negligently contributed thereto."

[1-3] Ordinarily, contributory negligence is an affirmative defense; but this statute requires the plaintiff to allege and to prove that she did not negligently contribute to her own injury. Whether the presence of the banana peeling on the sidewalk was evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant or not is immaterial. The evidence shows that the defect was obvious. It did not require expert supervision to detect the banana peeling, or to know of its danger. If the policeman should have seen it, then the plaintiff should have seen it. If it was negligence in the city, then it was contributory negligence in the plaintiff. There is no evidence to show that the peeling was on the sidewalk when the policeman passed. All the case shows is that the peeling was there when the plaintiff stepped on it. There is nothing in the case to show that the city had put it there or could have prevented it by the utmost care. It is said that the city did not sweep its sidewalks. The defendant must not only be negligent, but its negligence must be the proximate cause of the injury. There is nothing in the case to show that the banana peeling would not have been there at the unfortunate moment, even if the sidewalk had been swept daily. There was no evidence that the city was guilty of any negligence that was the proximate cause of the injury. The right of action is based upon the negligence or mismanagement which was the proximate cause of the injury. Those things relied upon to prove negligence, if they did prove negligence, would also prove contributory negligence.

The verdict should have been directed in favor of the defendant, and the judgment is reversed.

GILLIAM v. BLACK. (No. 10150.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 4, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 882(16)—INVITED ERROR.

Party cannot complain that presiding judge separated equitable and legal issues and restricted evidence before jury, where judge did so upon his suggestion and with his consent.

2. TRIAL \S 3 — EQUITABLE ISSUES — SUBMISSION TO JURY.

Where legal and equitable issues in case were separable, there was no error in not allowing jury to pass upon testimony going to prove equitable defense.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; Ernest Moore, Judge.

Action by T. J. Gilliam against W. Riley Black. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. M. Greene and C. Carroll Simms, both of Barnwell, for appellant.

James E. Davis and J. O. Patterson, Jr., both of Barnwell, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an action to recover on a general warrant contained in a deed from defendant to the plaintiff after issues joined. The case was tried before Judge Moore and a jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $274.35. After entry of judgment, defendant appeals.

At the opening of the trial Judge Moore construed the pleadings to contain separable legal and equitable issues, and would only submit to the jury such evidence deemed by him to be responsive to the legal issue, and in construing the first deed merged in the second deed to be one granting a specific number of acres and that the defendant would be liable for damages for any deficiency in said acreage. The exceptions summarized impute error to the presiding judge in separating the issues and restricting the evidence before jury and in his rulings in these particulars.

After all of the evidence was in, the equitable issues were fully inquired into by his honor, who decided the same, and then submitted the legal issues to the jury.

[1, 2] The exceptions cannot be sustained that insist that the jury should have been allowed to pass upon the testimony going to prove an equitable defense. Appellant did not ask his honor to withdraw the case from the jury. Neither did the court do so. But appellant's counsel suggested to the court "that the only question is trying the equitable issue before your honor," and in reply to this the court said, "You gentlemen agree to that?" and the reply of appellant's counsel was, "Yes, sir; we agree to that." Thereupon the court, in accordance with this suggestion and agreement of appellant's counsel, proceeded to try the question of mistake set out in the answer. The jury retired and this defense was fully entered into. The appellant cannot be heard to complain in this particular. Neither was there any error on the part of his honor in his construction of the deed (second one) in question. It was the deed that both plaintiff and defendant by mutual agreement entered into after execution and delivery of first deed between the parties and was to govern the transaction between them.

After delivery of second deed, plaintiff was ousted of part of the land embraced thereon under a title containing a general warrant by a paramount outstanding title in another. As to the finding by his honor of the equitable issues in the case, the appellant has failed to convince us that it is not sustained by a clear preponderance of the evidence in the case. The evidence shows that the plaintiff was to get the lands described in the plat. The deeds were the same, except the second deed gave the plaintiff the land within the plat. The evidence fails to show fraud or mutual mistake. The defendant knew, or should have known, what he was doing when he executed the deed.

We fail to see any errors in the trial in the circuit court, and all exceptions are overruled, and judgment affirmed.

It is master's duty to warn immature or ignorant employé working on unsafe machinery of the danger.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT \S 286(41)—INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ — DANGEROUS MACHINERY — JURY QUESTION.

In action for injuries to newly employed workman while working on planing machine with unprotected cylinder, where there was abundant evidence that machine was dangerous, and that no warning had been given, court properly refused to direct verdict for defendant.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT \S 278(13) — DANGEROUS MACHINERY — NEGLIGENCE OF EMPLOYER—EVIDENCE.

In action for injuries to newly employed worker from unprotected knives attached to cylinder on planer on which employé was working, evidence held to support a reasonable inference of negligence by master as a proximate result of the injury.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT \Rightarrow 218(3)—DANGEROUS MACHINERY — PLANING MACHINE — ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Newly hired employe did not assume risk of working on planing machine with cylinder with attached knives, though cylinder was in plain view, where its dangerous character was not obvious and employe did not know and had no opportunity to learn thereof.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT \Rightarrow 177—INJURY TO EMPLOYE — NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT.

In action for injuries to employe, who slipped on floor and cut his hand in cylinder, defense that injury was caused by negligence of fellow servant employed to sweep floor was not available, where there was no evidence that fellow servant disobeyed instructions by failing to sweep floor when required to do so by master.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by R. J. Henry against Norris Bros., Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McCullough, Martin & Blythe, of Greenville, for appellant.

B. A. Morgan and Martin & Henry, all of Greenville, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries. The negligence alleged was an unsafe place to work, unsafe machinery, and in causing him to work on an unsafe machine without warning him of danger.

In appellant's argument, it is said:

"Plaintiff entered defendant's employment September 25, 1917, at 6:40 a. m. and about 3:30 p. m. had his hand badly cut in an unprotected planer. He had been put to work upon this planer at about 11 a. m. Two worked the planer, one pushing the pieces of timber and the other pulling. They were making shuttles. They stopped 40 minutes for dinner, so that plaintiff had worked the planer for about four hours when he was hurt."

The other facts can be stated in considering the exceptions.

At the close of the evidence the defendant moved for the direction of a verdict, which was refused. The jury found for the plaintiff, and from the judgment entered on their verdict the defendant appealed.

I. The first exception complains that there was error in not directing a verdict, because "there was no evidence to support a reasonable inference of negligence, which was the proximate cause of the injury." This exception cannot be sustained. There was evidence that this was the first day the plaintiff had worked in the mill; that when the plaintiff was transferred to the planer he knew nothing about the machine upon which he was required to work; that he was given no instructions; that he was not warned of the danger; that, while the cylinder to which knives were attached was unprotected and in plain sight, yet that he did not see it except when it was in motion; that when it was in motion (3,000 revolutions a minute), it looked smooth; that the fact that it had knives upon it was not apparent, and the plaintiff did not know and was not warned of the dangerous place on the machine; that plaintiff's fellow servant, who was working with him on the machine, got a splinter in his hand, and called him, or plaintiff thought he did, and he started to go around the machine, slipped on the floor, and his hand went on the cylinder and was badly cut.

[1, 2] There can be no doubt that it is the duty of the master to warn an immature or ignorant employe of the danger. Gadsden v. Power Co., 80 S. C. 248, 61 S. E. 960. There was abundant evidence that the machine was dangerous, and that no warning was given. A verdict therefore could not have been directed.

[3] II. "There was no evidence sufficient to support a reasonable inference of negligence as a proximate cause of the injury." This exception cannot be sustained. There was, in addition to the above, evidence that other employes had been injured by this machine before the accident here complained of. The foreman said that he had told Mr. Norris:

"It looks like we would have to fix something to keep them fellows from sticking their hands into the cutter."

There is a conflict of evidence as to whether the knives could have been protected or not, but, whether protection could or could not have been had, the duty to warn a novice of the unprotected danger was apparent. There was a conflict of testimony in regard to a warning, but that was a question for the jury.

[4] III. "The plaintiff assumed the risk." While the cylinder was in plain sight, yet there was evidence that the dangerous character of it was not obvious, and that the plaintiff did not, as a matter of fact, know the source of the danger, and had no opportunity to know it. This exception cannot be sustained.

IV. That a verdict should have been directed on the ground of contributory negligence. The appellant admits that this is not its strong point. The admission is well made, and this exception cannot be sustained.

[5] V. Appellant next claims that the negligence, if, any, was that of a fellow servant.

This cannot be sustained. The negligence here referred to is that of the man employed to sweep the floor. The negligence of the sweeper, to be available, would be in failing to sweep when required to do so by the master. There was no evidence here that the sweeper failed to obey instructions.

The sixth exception was abandoned.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MORTON v. TOLBERT. (No. 10151.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 4, 1919.)

1. COSTS \S 254(4) — APPEAL — RECORD.

The case not conforming to the rule, the evidence not being given in narrative form, and much of it being wholly unnecessary, disbursements will not be allowed; both sides being responsible for the record.

2. EJECTMENT \S 9(2) — NECESSITY OF TITLE.

One in possession of land has right to retain possession against all the world, except the true owner, and so need not show title to recover of one removing her from possession.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County.

Action by Sue E. Morton against B. R. Tolbert, Jr. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

D. H. Hill, of Abbeville, for appellant.

J. Moore Mars, of Abbeville, for respondent.

FRASER, J. [1] This case does not conform to the rule. The evidence is not given in narrative form, and much of it is wholly unnecessary. As both sides are responsible for the record, no disbursements are allowed. The appellant's argument thus states the case:

"The plaintiff brought this action to recover the possession of two small tracts of land, aggregating nine acres. The complaint was served on the 13th of September, 1917. According to the allegations of the complaint the plaintiff claims that she is the sole owner of the premises in fee simple, and that during the year 1912 the defendant entered thereon, and unlawfully ousted the plaintiff from possession.

"The case was tried before his honor, Judge Shipp, and a jury, and the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the possession of the whole of the premises.

"The defendant has appealed, charging error in the presiding judge in not granting a non-suit at close of plaintiff's case, and also charging error in the presiding judge not having directed a verdict at the close of all the testimony. The grounds of the motion for a nonsuit and for a direction of verdict are set forth in the 'case,' and need not be repeated here.

"The points made by the appeal are: (a) That there was no proof that the premises sued for in the complaint are included in the chain of title put in evidence, and under which plaintiff undertook to prove that she was the owner in fee simple of the premises sued for; (b) that, even if it should be admitted for the sake of argument that the premises sued for in the complaint are included in the chain of title introduced by plaintiff, still this chain of title only shows that plaintiff is the owner of a part interest in the premises, as a tenant in common, with other parties, not parties to the action, and under the allegations of the complaint the plaintiff could not recover, for the reason that under the circumstances the jury had no alternative but to find either in favor of plaintiff or against her, and a verdict in her favor for the whole was manifest error."

[2] There was abundant evidence to carry the case to the jury. Appellant manifestly overlooks the fact that the respondent alleged that she was not only the owner in fee of the land in dispute, but that she was in possession of the disputed land, and that the appellant invaded her possession and ran her tenants off. One in possession of a tract of land has the right to retain the possession against all the world, except the true owner. Nicholson v. Villepegue, 91 S. C. 234, 74 S. E. 506.

The appeal is dismissed.

LIDE v. HARTSVILLE OIL MILL
(No. 10153.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 4, 1919.)

1. CORPORATIONS \S 433(1) — AGENCY — JURY QUESTION.

In action for value of cotton seed delivered by plaintiff to defendant's alleged agent, where defense was that such person was not in fact defendant's agent, existence of agency held a question for the jury.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 1083(4) — HARMLESS ERROR — REVIEW — INSTRUCTIONS.

In action for value of cotton seed delivered by plaintiff to alleged agent of defendant, where defense was that there was no agency, court's refusal to charge on the law, whereby defendant could have been held on ground of ratification, was not error, where plaintiff did not claim ratification; the elimination of ratification being favorable to defendant.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Darlington County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by R. L. Lide against the Hartsville Oil Mill. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following are the exceptions referred to in opinion:

(1) Because from the undisputed evidence the relation between McDonald and the defendant was that of buyer and seller, not agency, and his honor erred in refusing the motion for a directed verdict and the motion for a new trial on said ground.

(2) Because there was no evidence that McDonald was the agent of defendant for the purchase and exchange of cotton seed, or that McDonald so acted for defendant, or that defendant held McDonald out to the public as such, and his honor erred in refusing defendant's motion for a directed verdict and the motion for a new trial on said ground.

(3) Because his honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's fourth request to charge, which was duly preferred, and in charging the jury in lieu thereof as follows: "Then comes a general statement of the law in respect to ratification of agency, which has no application here at all, and there is absolutely no use in consuming time in reading it"—said request being the following: "It is a settled principle of law that a principal is not liable for the unauthorized acts of his agent unless these acts are subsequently ratified by the principal. Therefore, even if you should find that the relation of agency existed between McDonald and the defendant, yet, before you could find the defendant liable, you would have further to find from the evidence, and the greater weight thereof, that McDonald was authorized by the defendant, and was held out to the public by the defendant as its agent for the purchase and exchange of cotton seed, or, if the acts alleged in the complaint were unauthorized, that the defendant subsequently ratified the same."

Specifications of Error.

(a) It was erroneous and highly prejudicial to refuse to charge the jury that a principal is not liable for the unauthorized acts of his agent unless these acts are subsequently ratified by the principal, because there was direct and emphatic evidence that defendant refused to ratify the very transaction alleged in the complaint when the same was called to its attention by the plaintiff.

(b) The jury were thus virtually instructed to disregard the following vital testimony of witness Lawton: "Q. Mr. Lawton, will you state whether or not Mr. Lide asked you the point-blank question whether he was your agent? A. That is my recollection. He said, 'Isn't Mr. McDonald your agent?' and I said, 'No; he is not our agent at all.'"

(c) There being no evidence that McDonald was authorized by defendant or was held out to the public by defendant as its agent for the purchase and exchange of cotton seed, it was prejudicial error to refuse specifically to charge the jury as requested in that respect.

(4) Because his honor erred in refusing to construe the written contract between defendant and McDonald which was admitted to be the only contract between defendant and the alleged agent; whereas, his honor should have construed said instrument in writing and directed a verdict accordingly.

(5) Because his honor erred in holding that there was any conflict of testimony, it being respectfully submitted that there was no conflict in the testimony, and therefore only a matter of law upon which it was the duty of the court to direct a verdict.

(6) Because, in any event, plaintiff in dealing with McDonald acted at his peril, and was bound to ascertain, not only the facts of agency, but the nature and the extent of the authority, it not being within the power of McDonald to bind defendant by evidence which he alone may have put forward as to his authority. There being no evidence at all imputable to defendant tending to show agency, his honor erred in refusing defendant's motion for a directed verdict.

We hereby agree that the foregoing is the case for appeal to the Supreme Court, and that a printed copy thereof shall constitute the return required by law.

Miller & Lawson, of Hartsville, for appellant.

E. C. Dennis and J. Monroe Spears, both of Darlington, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This was an action to recover $400, the value of certain cotton seed delivered by plaintiff to J. L. McDonald, the alleged agent of the defendant, for the purchase and exchange of cotton seed and whom it was alleged defendant held out to the public as its agent for said purchase, all of which defendant denied. The case was tried by his honor, Judge Memminger and a jury at the fall term of court, 1917, for Darlington county. The defendant moved for a directed verdict, which was refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for full amount claimed. After entry of judgment, defendant appealed, and by six exceptions alleged error, and asked reversal. Exceptions 1, 2, 4, 5, and 6 are all based upon the contention that the court should have directed a verdict for the defendant.

[1] An examination of the evidence discloses a great deal of testimony that should have been submitted to the jury, whether McDonald was the agent of the defendant generally, or acted as their agent in this particular case. There is no doubt that McDonald acted for them in getting Lide's seed, and turned the seed over to the defendant. There is evidence that defendant authorized McDonald to make a special agreement with Lide, with reference to the exchange of seed for meal. Lide acted with good faith, and had every reason, under the evidence in the case, to think he was dealing with the defendant, and not McDonald alone. The evidence was such that the court could not have disregarded it, and directed a verdict for the defendant as asked for. There was evidence that the defendant had permitted McDonald to appear as its agent for this particular trade with the plaintiff, and the plaintiff, in good faith, dealt with McDonald on the faith of this appearance, and, agency being a question of fact for the jury, and there being competent evidence on this issue in the case, his honor committed no error in submitting the case to the jury, and these exceptions are overruled.

[2] Exception 3, which imputes error in the court's refusal to charge defendant's fourth request, is overruled. When his honor eliminated ratification, it was favorable to the defendant. The defendant could have been held either as agent, or that it had ratified what had been done, but plaintiff did not claim ratification. His honor's charge fully covered the law applicable to the case, and is free from error in the particulars complained of. This exception is overruled.

FRASER, J. Little need be said of the facts in this case, as only two questions are raised in the argument. The other exceptions were abandoned at the hearing.

The plaintiff, an employé of the defendants, brought this action for damages for personal injuries. The trial judge refused to submit to the jury the questions of assumption of risk and contributory negligence, inasmuch as assumption of risk and contributory negligence had not been pleaded. From these rulings this appeal is taken. Both are affirmative defenses and must be pleaded in order to be available defenses. Neither was plead-

HUGHES v. GREEN. (No. 10154.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 4, 1919.)

GUARDIAN AND WARD §33—COLLECTION OF RENT—LIABILITY.

Guardian must collect rent from ward's real estate, and he is responsible therefor on failure to so do.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Union County.

Proceedings by D. Ambrose Hughes against T. A. Green, to open and set aside a settlement between guardian and ward. Decree of Probate Court affirmed by Court of Common Pleas, and respondent appeals. Modified.

J. Ashby Sawyer, of Union, and Carson, Boyd & Tinsley, of Spartanburg, for appellant.

Wallace & Barron, of Union, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This appeal arises from a proceeding commenced in the probate court for Union county, to open and set aside a settlement had between a guardian and his ward. The decree of the probate judge states:

"The respondent was the administrator on the estate of W. F. Hughes, deceased, and the guardian of the petitioner's estate; the latter being the sole heir and distributee of the said W. F. Hughes. The respondent has received his discharge, after a final settlement or return, as administrator, and has also filed his return, which he claims to be full and final, as guardian, but has never received his discharge as such guardian.

"This proceeding is brought to reopen and surcharge the returns filed by the respondent, both as administrator and guardian. As a matter of equity and justice, I have determined that this should be allowed; and I am moved to do this for the reason that, among other things, I feel that a judge of probate is, in part, at least, responsible for any wrong done in stating accounts such as these. Such matters are under his special supervision, as the respondent's attorneys contend, and the parties to such accountings rely very largely upon the advice and actions of the judge of probate.

"In the present instance I desire to say that I was never altogether satisfied with the accounts rendered by the respondent. Doubtless I should have called this to the latter's attention, but in some instances the accounts were sent me by mail, and in the final return these things were overlooked. It is these matters that, so far as I am able, I desire to correct in this decree."

I. The judge of probate finds that there was a final settlement, except as to two matters of rent. It is thus seen that the settlement between the guardian and his ward is opened on the ground that the probate judge has changed his mind as to the "equity and justice" of the final settlement between the parties. In Dunsford v. Brown, 19 S. C. 570, it was said, in a per curiam order for rehearing, that the settlement cannot be opened unless there has been misrepresentation, undue influence, imposition, or fraud in said settlement. There is no such finding in this case.

II. The judge of probate finds that the settlement was final, except as to two matters of uncollected rent, to wit, rent due by Rice and Goings. The Rice rent was paid and is out of the case. The guardian is responsible for the Goings rent. It was the duty of the guardian to collect the rent, and he did not do so. If the ward has agreed to take the account against Dr. Goings as cash, that might have raised another question. The finding is, and we cannot say it was error, that the ward did not take the account as cash.

The judgment appealed from is modified as above.

ARTHUR v. HOLLOWELL (No. 10152.)

1. DEEDS §83—RECORDATION—WITNESSES.

A deed which was in fact witnessed by two witnesses was properly recorded; the record hinging on the fact that it was so witnessed.

2. ACKNOWLEDGMENT §36(1)—VALIDITY OF RECORD—CLERICAL OMISSION.

Where deed was in fact witnessed by two witnesses, the mere fact that the notary omitted to declare in the probate that one of the witnesses was also present at the execution was not sufficient to invalidate the record, notwithstanding 17 Stats. 319, requiring, before recording, execution to be proved by a subscribing witness and Civ. Code 1912, § 3453, as to execution.

3. EVIDENCE §83(5)—PRESUMPTION—PERFORMANCE OF DUTY—NOTARY.

Where notary omitted to declare in probate to deed that one of the witnesses was present Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County.

Action by Anne Moore Arthur against R. L. Hollowell. From order sustaining plaintiff's demurrer to defendant's answer, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert Moorman, of Columbia, for appellant.

Weston & Aycock, of Columbia, for respondent.

GAGE, J. There is but one issue in the cause, and that of law. The defendant objects to taking the title tendered him by the plaintiff simply because a deed which constitutes a link in plaintiff's chain of title was put upon the record without warrant of law, and therefore was not notice to creditors of that conveyor. The defect in the deed suggested by counsel is that the probate of it was insufficient to have warranted the register of mesne conveyance to record it. The deed was executed by McNulty and Owens to Arthur, and the names of David and Feagan are put down as witnesses to the transaction. The probate runs thus:

"State of South Carolina, Richland County.

"Personally appeared before me, Aaron David, and made oath that he saw the within named W. E. McNulty and L. B. Owens sign, seal, and, as their act and deed, deliver the within written deed for the uses and purposes herein mentioned, and that he with _____ witnessed the execution thereof. Aaron David.

"Sworn to before me this 31st day of December, 1918. T. E. Eskew [L. S.]

"Notary Public for So. Car."

The indicated defect in the probate is the supposed failure of David to have sworn that he witnessed the execution with Feagan. That inference arises simply out of the omission of the notary to insert Feagan's name in the space left blank for it. Of course it required the use of a microscope to detect such an omission; and that suggests that the omission ought not to be counted of serious import.

[1] There is no suggestion that there were not in fact two witnesses to the transaction; indeed the defendant, who sets up the defect, alleges in the answer that the deed in question was "executed by McNulty and Owens, whose signatures are attested by David and Feagan as witnesses thereto." If the deed was in fact so witnessed by David and Feagan, then of course it was properly recorded, for record hinged on that fact. The only object the Legislature had in requiring before the record of it some proof that the instrument was what it seemed on its face to be was "for preventing of frauds." The Statutes so declare. 7 St. at Large, p. 232, par. 45.

And so solicitous was the Legislature in those early days about the integrity of the transaction that the statute required "proof of the signing, sealing and delivery thereof, to be made in open court, by the oath of two credible witnesses at the least." (The italics are supplied.) Same citation. That was in 1785; but in 1839 the Legislature relaxed the procedure, and provided that:

"The execution of every such writing shall first be proved by affidavit of a subscribing witness taken before some officer competent to administer an oath." 11 Stats. 80. (The italics are supplied.)

The act of 1880 prescribed a like procedure. 17 St. at Large, p. 319.

The statute of 1880 does not prescribe the form and words of the probate; that is the work of practice through long years, and it ought to be adhered to. But the statute does prescribe how the deed shall be executed; it shall be signed, a seal indicated, and "in the presence of and be subscribed by two or more credible witnesses." Section 3453, Civil Code.

[2] Reverting to the recording statute of 1880, supra, it requires the execution (above described) shall be proved by a subscribing witness before the deed shall go on record. Plainly the subscribing witness who shall make the oath must swear to the whole execution, which is that the maker signed, and that each witness signed. But it would shock the judgment to conclude that such a manifestly clerical omission as was clearly made in the instant case by the notary should invalidate the record of a deed.

[3] The probate is not the transaction, but only some evidence of it. If two credible persons witnessed the signing, sealing, and delivering by the maker, and the answer alleges they did, then the law is satisfied; the deed is genuine, and was entitled to be recorded. The omission of the notary to accurately state in the probate the whole transaction, by the failure to declare in it that Feagan also was present at the execution, is not sufficient to invalidate the record. The presumption is that the notary did what he was required by law to do, that he took proof that Feagan was also present, and that he only failed by oversight to state that fact in the record he made of the transaction.

We find no case in our books on the exact issue. These cases cited by the appellant from our reports are in no wise inconsistent with the conclusions we have announced.

The order below is affirmed.

HUFF v. EQUITABLE LIFE INS. CO. OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. (No. 3708.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Jan. 28, 1919.)

APPEAL AND ERROR \S 1002—VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

In an action upon an insurance policy containing the condition that no obligation is assumed by the insurer unless at the date thereof the insured is "in sound health," which is treated by the defendant as a representation falsely and fraudulently made, and the evidence is conflicting as to the condition of the insured's health at the time he was insured, and also as to the time he was examined and advised by a physician that he had chronic nephritis, some witnesses fixing the time before and others after the date of the policy, a verdict based on such conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by Susie Huff against Equitable Life Insurance Company of District of Columbia. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Geo. C. Beneke and Jno. J. Coniff, both of Wheeling, for plaintiff in error.

WILLIAMS, J. To a judgment of the circuit court of Ohio county in favor of plaintiff, defendant obtained this writ of error and assigns as error the overruling of its motion to set aside the verdict of the jury as contrary to the law and the evidence, as disclosed in the trial of the case, and grant it a new trial.

Plaintiff is the beneficiary in a life insurance policy issued to Arthur Huff on the 13th day of August, 1917, by the defendant. The insured died the 3d day of the following December, and this suit is brought to recover the amount due under the policy.

The defense is based on the following provision of the policy:

"No obligation is assumed by the company prior to the date hereof, nor unless on said date the insured is alive and in sound health."

The defendant contends that the record shows that the insured knew at the time he took out the policy he was not in sound health, but was afflicted with chronic nephritis or Bright's disease, and concealed the facts from its agent, and therefore obtained the policy through fraud and misrepresentations.

J. H. Jenkins, superintendent of the defendant company, testified that, where the amount of the policy was less than $300, no physical examination is made of the applicant, but that he is simply asked a number of questions as to the condition of his health by the company's physician. Dr. R. L. Dev-ereux says he went to Huff's house and filled out the inspection blank from answers made to him by the insured, and that he answered "No" to the question as to whether he suffered from certain diseases, including kidney diseases, and that he reported him as a good risk. This inspection took place August 5, 1917. Dr. C. J. Ryan testified that he had been called in to see the insured July 23, 1917, and the next day examined a specimen of his urine, and found him to be suffering with chronic nephritis, commonly known as Bright's disease; that he treated him up to the 16th of August, and told him as near as he could what his trouble was, but did not believe he realized how serious it was. The physician who prescribed for deceased on the 26th of November, during his illness, in his certificate of death, gave acute nephritis and valvular heart lesions as the cause of death.

Plaintiff testified that at the time her husband took out the policy he was working at the Wheeling Mold & Foundry Company, and as far as she knew there was not anything the matter with him. She says it was the last of August when Dr. Ryan was called; that there was not anything the matter with her husband when he went to Chattanooga, Tenn., in November. Luther Huff, brother of deceased, says he saw him nearly every day, and no physician was called to see him prior to the 13th of August, 1917; that he first took sick along the latter part of August; that he was working right along in the foundry at the time he was insured; and that he knew when he took sick, and it was not before he was insured. Warner Carrothers, another witness, says he knew the insured, and boarded with him during the month of August, 1917; that he knew when he was insured in the defendant company, and that he was then working in the foundry; that he never heard him complain before that time of being sick; that he looked to be healthy and all right; and that he did not take sick until after he was insured, but says he was sick along in October and November. Jessie Haley, another witness for plaintiff, says she knew the insured well for 10 or 11 years and, as she expressed it, "he appeared to be just the picture of health; he was a strong, healthy, portly looking man."
Says she knew when he took the policy. This witness lived in the same house with deceased, and says she knew nothing of his being sick prior to the 13th of August.

There is a conflict in the testimony as to when Dr. Ryan visited the insured and informed him that he had chronic nephritis.
He places the time as the 23d of July. But other witnesses fix the time as the latter part of August, after the policy was written.

There is also some apparent conflict in defendant's own evidence. The doctor who certified the death of deceased stated the cause thereof to be acute nephritis, whereas Dr. Ryan says he was suffering from chronic nephritis in July, nearly a month before he was insured. The evidence, therefore, presented a question of fact to be decided by the jury; and the court has no right to invade its province and reverse its finding if there is sufficient evidence to support it, even though the court, sitting as a jury, might have found otherwise.

As appears from the instructions to the jury, given on behalf of both the plaintiff and the defendant, of which no complaint was made, both parties tried the case on the same theory of the law applicable thereto.
For the plaintiff the jury were told that, if they believed from the evidence deceased answered truly, and to the best of his knowledge and belief, the questions propounded to him at the time of his application for insurance, they should find for the plaintiff. On the other hand, the jury were instructed, at the request of the defendant, that if they believed deceased was suffering from chronic nephritis or Bright's disease immediately before and after the issuance of said policy, and had knowledge of such disease at the time of his examination, and that his answers to the questions were untrue "and made with the knowledge of his own conditions," they must find for the defendant. Also, that if they believe, at the time of the delivery of the policy, deceased was "knowingly suffering from nephritis, or Bright's disease, which, if known to the defendant, would have caused the rejection of the risk, then the failure to communicate it to the company was a fraud upon the company," and their verdict should be for the defendant.

The theory upon which the case was tried renders it unnecessary for us to determine whether or not the condition in the policy, above quoted and relied on to defeat recovery, was a representation or a warranty.
The instructions given at defendant's request show that it treated it as a representation, and sought to prove that it was knowingly false and fraudulent. It cannot now complain, even if, properly interpreted, the condition should be held to be an absolute warranty, a question we do not decide.

It was for the jury to say, upon the conflicting evidence, whether insured died of chronic or of acute nephritis, and whether, if he had chronic nephritis, he knew it at the time he was insured. Recoveries from acute nephritis are frequent, while recoveries from chronic nephritis are seldom.

Finding no error, we affirm the judgment.

CANFIELD v. COLLINS et al. (No. 3479.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 28, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)*BOUNDARIES \S 46(3) — ESTABLISHMENT — GRANT.

An owner of two adjoining tracts of land having a common line may sell and convey any part of one or both tracts and fix the boundary therefor as he may elect, and if the calls in the deed, promptly recorded, locate the common boundary between the tract sold and that retained on a line slightly different from the old one, the line so fixed will prevail over the calls of a subsequent recorded deed conveying the tract so retained, though it purport to fix the common boundary line as formerly located.

Error to Circuit Court, Gilmer County.

Ejectment by F. M. Canfield against Almira Collins and husband. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded for retrial.

R. F. Kidd and L. H. Barnett, both of Glenville, for plaintiffs in error.

A. L. Holt and Lann & Craddock, all of Glenville, for defendant in error.

LYNOH, J. Frank M. Canfield brought ejectment to recover possession of a small triangular parcel of ground, containing about 1 acre, along the line common to a 69-acre tract owned by him and a 136.5-acre tract owned by the defendant Almira Collins, and secured the judgment of which she and her codefendant husband complain; they assigning as erroneous the giving of plaintiff's instruction No. 2 and the refusal of their instruction bearing the same number.

To understand fully their relevancy and applicability, or the lack of either, to the issues involved, a brief summary of the facts proved or admitted is necessary. Almira Collins acquired title to the 136.5 acres June 17, 1904, directly through Thursey M. Lynch, who was a daughter of Currence B. Conrad and intermarried with Charles Thompson, a son of Hugh Thompson, whom she survived, and afterwards with Vanlinden S. Lynch, who joined with her in the Collins deed, recorded November 10, 1904; and Canfield title to the 69 acres through two conveyances, one by Thursey M. Lynch and V. S. Lynch to N. E. Wiant, dated August 21, and recorded October 20, 1913, the other by Wiant to Canfield May 4, 1914, recorded June 4 of that year. The 69-acre tract is sometimes referred to in the record as containing 60 acres, but which, it is agreed, contained the larger area, 2 acres of which, located somewhere near the common line, were reserved in the Wiant deed, so that Canfield acquired and now owns only 67 acres of the 69-acre tract.

Although in the deed to Wiant other grantors joined with Thursey M. and V. S. Lynch, they did not do so because of any real interest possessed by them in the land granted, but merely in recognition of the right of the grantors named to dispose of the property and to avoid any question affecting the title thereto, and the case was argued and submitted as if Thursey M. Lynch was the immediate and unquestioned source of the title to both tracts.

Besides the division line, there are two and only two corners common to both tracts—one a rock, whose location and identity are established; the other a stake, not definitely identified or located. The two surveyors, of whom the court appointed one, either upon its own motion or by and with the consent of the parties, the other selected by the plaintiff and to some extent acting under his guidance and direction, did not agree upon the location of the second corner and found nothing by which they were able to identify it confidently. They did find some marked trees at the end of the line, or along it, and some portions of an old fence; but the marks were not well-defined or reliable, as the testimony seems clearly to indicate. Beall, whom plaintiff selected, ran from the rock on a course N. 38° E., and Lewis, whom the court appointed, on a course N. 39° E., the distance specified in the deed to the next corner. That corner each of them attempted to locate at the northeast end of the lines so run by them. This difference in degree resulted from Beall's adopting the course found in the decrees partitioning the lands of Hugh Thompson, out of which were carved in 1868 the two tracts of land now severally owned by the parties to this action, that course being N. 35° E., or S. 35° W., and, as corrected for variations, made the call as run by him. Lewis, however, took as the proper course that which he found in deeds made in 1902 and 1904 by Thursey M. Lynch, then the owner of both tracts, and her husband, one to R. C. Kerens, conveying the coal under the 136.5 acres, the other to Mrs. Collins, conveying the surface of the same tract, that course being S. 38°30' W., and, adding half a degree for variation, ran the line on this course as corrected.

The only reason or excuse for going back to the partition decrees is that both tracts were parts or parcels of the Thompson tract; the first being assigned to William L. Thompson, who conveyed it to Thursey M. Thompson, now Thursey M. Lynch, and she to Mrs. Collins. Thursey M. Lynch also acquired the 69 acres as the devisee of her father, Currence B. Conrad; that tract now being owned by the plaintiff, her remote grantee, less 2 acres, which she reserved.

The instruction of which the defendants complain told the jury—

"that if they believe from the evidence that the rock corner planted and agreed to, and as shown as the beginning corner of the disputed line on the map identified and filed in evidence by J. Ernest Beall, surveyor, as an original corner, and that the corner at the other end of the disputed line is not found, then the course and distance called for in the original partition of Hugh Thompson's estate shall govern."

This instruction ignores an essential element of the defense interposed on behalf of the defendant, and certainly supported by the following facts and circumstances, revealed upon the trial and clearly appearing upon the record and not controverted.

As we have said, Thurse M. Lynch was the source through which the parties acquired title. The coal underlying the surface of the 136.5 acres she sold in 1902 to Richard Kerens, trustee, and preliminarily to the execution of the deed May 30, 1902, the tract was surveyed, and the survey so made and the deed executed pursuant thereto recognized and adopted as the true division line of the two tracts, and as the correct or corrected course of the line in dispute, the call S. 38°30' W. 149.5 poles, or the reverse thereof, N. 38°30' E. Mrs. Lynch also conveyed to Mrs. Collins the surface of the 136.5 acres June 17, 1904, by the calls of the Kerens coal deed; and, in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, the rational, reasonable, and legal presumption is that as such grantee she entered into the immediate and actual possession of the land conveyed and every part of it, even to the full limit as described by the calls of the deed, a possession not disturbed or molested thenceforward to the date of the service of the declaration upon the defendant, September 17, 1914, a period of more than 10 years. She also endeavored to inclose the land by a fence along the common line soon after the date of her deed, and as plaintiff admits has held and now holds possession to the inclosure.

Whether by inadvertence or not, in the deed for the 69-acre tract made by Mrs. Lynch, her husband, and others to Wiant, plaintiff's grantor, August 21, 1913, more than nine years afterwards, the call for the controverted line was the same as that adopted in the decrees in the Thompson partition suit, instead of the call in the deed to Mrs. Collins. But the apparently complete and undisturbed possession of the defendant to the limits of the boundaries fixed by the call of her deed cannot be ignored, as it was ignored in the instruction of which she complains.

It is hardly necessary, because axiomatic, to say that, while Thurse M. Lynch owned both tracts and before she had conveyed either of them, her control over them was complete, her dominion absolute, and she could dispose of them in whole or in part as she might elect, and if she elected to sell part of either or both and retain the residue, she had ample and unquestionable authority to do so, and could convey by any course or call she might approve or her judgment dictate without regard to any previously established division line between them. In the exercise of her proprietary rights she could convey to the same grantee the land on either side of the common line, thereby entirely obliterating it, and if she had done so she could not, nor could any subsequent vendee of hers, complain or set up a title hostile to that voluntarily conferred upon the former grantee by a prior recorded deed; this upon the maxim that priority in time gives priority of right. Stewart v. Parr, 74 W. Va. 327, 334, 82 S. E. 259.

This would be the inevitable result, even if the intention of Mrs. Collins' grantors was to conform to the calls of the partition decrees, as perhaps it was, since the divergence is only 3½ degrees, and this chiefly because of magnetic variation. The rights of the parties are to be judged by the prior deed as it is while it remains unmodified and uncorrected, and not by what the subsequent grantee of the adjoining tract may conceive his rights to be, notwithstanding the prior grant and recordation. If the grantors chose to alter the 35-degree line, or give it any other direction, as they did by making it S. 38°30' W., that was a matter that concerned them, and no one else. It was this latter course, run apparently in 1902, that Lewis adopted as the basis of his survey, and, allowing half a degree variation, ran it as S. 39° W., while Beall adopted the old or partition call of 1863, repeated in the deeds of 1913 and 1914, under which plaintiff holds title, and added 3 degrees, making the course S. 38° W. As Mrs. Collins, the defendant, was the prior grantee of the common grantor, the course as given in the deed to her in 1904 is accorded priority over a different subsequent call.

To the extent any of the instructions propounded by plaintiff and given, and especially instruction No. 2, ignored or disregarded the legal principles stated, they were erroneous and prejudicial, and ought not to have been given. For virtually the same reason defendant's instructions should have been given. And as they were apparently vital to the issue tried by the jury, the ruling thereon requires a reversal of the judgment and the remand of the case for retrial.

UNDERWOOD v. UNDERWOOD.
(No. 3637.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 28, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. DIVORCE §158 — REMARRIAGE — COMMON LAW—EQUITY.

The common law does not forbid remarriage of persons absolutely divorced from one another, nor either of them, nor has a court of equity any inherent authority to inhibit it by a decree.

2. DIVORCE §158 — RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE—VALIDITY.

In so far as a decree of divorce from the bonds of matrimony inhibits or restrains, without statutory authority, either of the parties from remarriage, it is erroneous, and will be reversed on appeal.

3. DIVORCE §158 — RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE—EQUITY JURISDICTION.

A court of equity is not authorized to restrain the innocent party to a decree of divorce from the bonds of matrimony from remarrying within three years from the date of the decree.

4. DIVORCE §288 — APPEAL — COSTS.

If the defendant to the suit in which such a decree was entered made no appearance in the court below, nor in the appellate court, no costs are allowable in the latter court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Brooke County.

Suit for divorce by Robert Underwood against Elvinia Underwood. From a decree granting an absolute divorce, but restraining plaintiff from marrying again within three years from date of decree, he appeals. Decree in so far as inhibiting plaintiff's remarriage reversed.

R. L. Ramsay, of Follansbee, Erskine, Palmer & Curl, of Wheeling, for appellant.

POFFENBARGER, J. The decree complained of on this appeal granted the appellant a divorce from the bonds of matrimony, on the ground of willful desertion for more than three years, but, against his wishes, restrained him from marrying again within three years. There was no defense to his bill in the trial court, and the appellee has not entered an appearance here, in resistance of his effort to be relieved from the provision of the decree inhibiting his remarriage.

Section 14 of chapter 64 of Barnes' Code of 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, § 3648a) forbids marriage of the parties to a divorce suit, except to one another, within six months from the date of the decree, and authorizes the court to prohibit the guilty party from remarrying again, within a certain time to be fixed by the decree, not exceeding five years.

Section 12 of that chapter (Code 1913, § 3647) forbids marriage of either party to a decree of perpetual separation during the life of the other. Beyond these provisions, there is no statutory restraint upon the right of remarriage of divorced persons, nor any statutory authority in the courts to impose such restraint.

[1-4] The common law does not forbid the remarriage of such persons, nor is there any inherent authority in a court of equity to inhibit it. In re Crane, 170 Mich. 651, 136 N. W. 587, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 765, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1173; Barber v. Barber, 16 Cal. 378; People v. Hovey, 5 Barb. (N. Y.) 118; State v. Weatherby, 43 Me. 258, 69 Am. Dec. 59; Nelson, Div. & Sep. § 588; Blash, Div. §§ 655-659; 9 R. C. L. 437, Div. § 241.

For these reasons, so much of the decree as inhibits the plaintiff and appellant from marrying again within three years from the date of the decree must be reversed and annulled; but, since the wife made no defense in the court below and does not oppose modification of the decree here, and it does not appear that any objection was made in the court below, the provision complained of, nor that any effort has been made to have the decree modified in that court, no costs will be awarded to the appellant. The error is due either to his generosity or indiscretion in the drafting of a decree in his own favor, or misapprehension on the part of the court, not induced by the defendant.

Equity looks upon that as done which ought to be done, and where one who is indebted to another, and who is being pressed for the payment of such indebtedness, in order that such other may meet certain obligations which he has outstanding, agrees that he will himself acquire such outstanding obligations, and discharge the same with his indebtedness, and he does acquire such outstanding obligations of his creditor, equity will consider that his indebtedness was applied to the discharge of such obligations at the time he acquired the same.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hancock County.

Bill by Oliver S. Marshall against W. D. Porter, executor, etc., and James M. Porter and others. Decree for plaintiff, and last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 71 W. Va. 330, 76 S. E. 652.

E. A. Hart, of New Cumberland, for appellant.

Marshall & Forrer, of Parkersburg, for appellee.

RITZ, J. In 1886 the plaintiff purchased from one Jasper M. Porter certain real estate in the county of Hancock, and for the deferred installments of purchase money executed certain nonnegotiable notes. These notes were held by Porter until about the year 1893, when they were transferred to the defendant James M. Porter, who held them until the year 1907, when he transferred the same to his sister Fannie Porter McBride, who has since died, and who is represented in this suit by the defendant W. D. Porter as the executor of her will. After the death of Fannie Porter McBride, her executor threatened to execute a deed of trust given to secure these notes, and the plaintiff then brought this suit for the purpose of canceling the notes and canceling the deed of trust as a cloud upon his title to the real estate. The theory upon which he proceeds is that in the year 1893 and prior thereto the defendant James M. Porter became indebted to him in considerable sums of money, and that he importuned the said James M. Porter to make settlement with him of this indebtedness in order that he might meet his obligation to Jasper M. Porter on account of these notes; that James M. Porter in the year 1893 told him that he would acquire the notes himself from Jasper M. Porter, and would settle the indebtedness to the plaintiff in so far as the notes would cover the same in that way. As before stated, James M. Porter did acquire the notes at that time, and so advised the plaintiff, and the plaintiff believed, as he alleges, that the arrangement for settling the same with the indebtedness of James M. Porter to him was entirely satisfactory. After James M. Porter became the owner of the notes, the plaintiff at various times, as he testifies, attempted to have Porter cancel the same and deliver them to him, but Porter always delayed doing this, not upon the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to have it done, but upon the ground of inconvenience and like excuses. Plaintiff's contention was that the indebtedness of James M. Porter to him not only fully satisfied the notes at the time they came into Porter's hands, but was in excess of the amount of the notes, and he desired to have the notes canceled and the deed of trust removed as a cloud upon his title, and a decree for any balance said James M. Porter might owe him.

The case was heard by the circuit court, and the plaintiff's bill dismissed, but upon appeal to this court that decree was reversed, and this court held that the plaintiff was entitled to have the indebtedness of Porter to him set off against these notes; in other words, it was held that the plaintiff's contention as to the arrangement between him and James M. Porter was proved, and that he was entitled to relief thereon, and remanded the cause with the suggestion that it was one where a reference to a commissioner would likely be proper to ascertain the correct amount of the various items in the plaintiff's account, and to apply the same to the notes in question. See Marshall v. Porter, 71 W. Va. 330, 76 S. E. 653. After the cause was remanded to the circuit court it was referred to a commissioner, and the commissioner made a report finding that Marshall was entitled to have the notes canceled as fully satisfied, to have the deed of trust also canceled, and to have a recovery against James M. Porter for a small amount in addition thereto. The circuit court decreed accordingly, and this appeal is prosecuted.

[1] Some question is made as to the sufficiency of the proof to establish certain debts claimed by Marshall, or rather to establish the amount of them as they were found by the commissioner. Upon this question it suffices to say that there is evidence in the case fully supporting the commissioner's findings as to the amount of these particular debts, even though it may be in some instances controverted, and this court will not reverse the decree of the circuit court approving the findings of a commissioner upon controverted facts, unless such finding is clearly against the weight of the evidence. Such is not the case here. One of these items was for the interest of the plaintiff in an oil well, the legal title to which was in the defendant James M. Porter. It is shown that James M. Porter sold this well and took the money himself, and never accounted to the plaintiff for one cent, although it is admitted that the plaintiff had a considerable interest therein. The defendant James M. Porter has always refused, and even when he testified in this case refused, to say how much he got for this well, or to whom he sold it. The commissioner could do nothing but take the best evidence he could get as to this, and we think his findings are as advantageous to the defendant James M. Porter as he could reasonably expect, particularly in view of the fact that it lay in his power to make the matter absolutely certain.

[2, 3] In the circuit court, when the report of the commissioner came up for consideration, the defendant James M. Porter for the first time by exceptions set up the statute of limitations as a bar to any of the claims asserted by the plaintiff. In so far as these claims were applied to the discharge of the notes set up and referred to in the bill there is nothing in this contention. The agreement, which this court by its former decree found existed between the parties, was to apply this indebtedness of James M. Porter to Marshall to the extinguishment of these notes. Having found that that agreement existed, a court of equity looks upon that as done which ought to be done. We will treat the notes executed by the plaintiff, and which are sought to be canceled here, as satisfied and discharged as of the time James M. Porter and the plaintiff agreed that it should be done. Story's Equity Jurisprudence, § 81; Felch v. Hooper, 119 Mass. 52; Craig v. Leslie, 3 Wheat. 563, 4 L. Ed. 460. But does the statute of limitations apply to the decree in favor of the plaintiff for the excess of his indebtedness above the notes held at the time by the defendant James M. Porter? As before stated, these claims were set up by the plaintiff in his bill filed in this case, and while they were not particularized in that bill, they were gone into by particular items in testimony taken in support of it. The defendant James M. Porter at that time denied their validity, and denied that the plaintiff had the right to discharge the notes referred to in this case in that way, or to recover any of said claims. The parties, after full opportunity to offer all of the matters they had in support of their respective contentions, submitted the case for a decision, and this court on appeal held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover his claims in this suit. That decree established the validity of them, and the only thing left for determination was the amount thereof and their application to the notes in controversy. The defendant James M. Porter could not reserve one of his defenses. He had full opportunity to make all defenses at that time, and not having made his defense of the statute of limitations, then the finding of this court establishing the validity of the plaintiff's claims is res adjudicata, and we will not now reopen that question and allow him to plead the statute of limitations to prevent a recovery against him for the amount in excess of the notes which were canceled by the court's decree. It is fundamental that, where a party is sued, and he challenges the validity of the cause of action against him, he must put in all of the defenses he has thereto. If he fail to do so, he will not be allowed after a decree or judgment against him upon the merits to assert a defense which was available to him before the rendition of such adverse judgment or decree. Alderson v. Horse Creek Coal Land Co., 81 W. Va. 411, 94 S. E. 716, and authorities there cited.

It follows from what we have said that the decree of the circuit court of Hancock county complained of will be affirmed.

GEORGE DE WITT SHOE CO. v. ADKINS et al. (No. 3386.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Jan. 28, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⇐103(12)—POWERS OF TRAVELING SALESMAN—RETURN OF GOODS.

A traveling salesman has implied authority, as agent, to bind his principal by a stipulation in a contract of sale of goods, according to the vendee right to return the goods, within a reasonable time, if found to be unsatisfactory.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⇐103(12)—POWERS OF TRAVELING SALESMAN—RETURN OF GOODS.

But he has no implied authority to stipulate for an unconditional and unlimited right of return. It must be reasonable and usual in its character.

3. SALES ⇐168½(5)—STIPULATION FOR RETURN OF GOODS—CONSTRUCTION.

A stipulation for right of return of goods, if unsatisfactory, proved in general and indefinite terms, is properly construed as one allowing only a reasonable period of time for testing their desirability and fitness by inspection and sales, and the purchaser, after having sold an unreasonable portion of them, and kept the balance for an unreasonable period of time, cannot return the residue for credit on his account.

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Assumpsit by the George De Witt Shoe Company against E. E. Adkins and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and new trial awarded.

Jean F. Smith, of Huntington, for plaintiff in error.

J. W. Perry, of Huntington, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The important inquiries arising upon this writ of error to a judgment for the defendant, in an action of assumpsit for the price of merchandise sold and delivered, are (1) whether power to make a conditional sale of merchandise is within the apparent authority of a traveling salesman; (2) if so, whether such authority is unlimited; and (3) whether the evidence sustains the verdict.

Under an order taken September 9, 1910, by J. W. Koontz, its traveling salesman, the plaintiff made five shipments of shoes to the defendant, between that date and December 10, 1910, of the aggregate value of $619.63. The first and largest bill matured a few days before the last shipment was made. Nothing was paid on any of them, until after the claim had been placed in the hands of an attorney for collection. Evidence introduced by the plaintiff tends to prove a demand for payment of the first bill by a letter on December 6, 1910, and repeated demands for payment of it and the others as they fell due. On December 19, 1910, a draft was made for the amount of the first bill, which was returned unexplained. One of the defendants, in his testimony, denies having received any of the letters except one, and, on January 4, 1911, he wrote the plaintiff a letter, saying:

"We will pay you on the 20th as we have a pay day then; hope this will be satisfactory to you. We have to sell on those terms, and we will pay you sure then."

He admits presentation and dishonor of the draft. Out of these shoes, the defendants sold at retail, until May 4, 1911, when, having sold $293 worth of them, they boxed up and delivered to the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company the residue for shipment to the plaintiff, upon the assumption of their right under the contract to return them, because they were unsatisfactory. The plaintiff refused to accept them, on their arrival at their destination, Lynchburg, Va., and, in considerable subsequent correspondence, denied the right of the defendants to return them.

Not having produced the order on which the shipments were made, nor proved any excuse for nonproduction thereof, the plaintiff introduced testimony tending to prove that it was unconditional in its terms. On the other hand, the two members of the defendant firm and the wife of one of them swear positively that the goods were purchased, or the order given, with the understanding and agreement that the defendant should have the right to return them, if they should be found to be unsatisfactory. They further testified that the shoes were very unsatisfactory, and caused them a great deal of trouble with their customers; it having been necessary to make good a great many shoes returned on account of serious defects. In addition to its denial of the conditional character of the contract, the plaintiff introduced testimony tending to prove the shoes were regular and good values for the prices at which they were sold. For some reason not explained, the salesman who took the order was not put on the stand by either of the parties.

The case was submitted to a jury, without instructions, and they returned a verdict for the defendant, on which the judgment was rendered, after the overruling of a motion for a new trial.

[1-3] The prevailing, if not the universal, holding of the courts is that it is within the scope of the apparent authority of a sales agent, to stipulate with the vendee that the property sold may be returned to the vendor, if it is not satisfactory to the purchaser. Of course a vendor may agree with the vendee, that the latter shall take the goods upon trial and test them out and return them, or the unused portion of them, in case they prove to be unsatisfactory, for such a contract is neither illegal nor contrary to public policy. The liberty of contract obtaining in this country enables the owner either to give or withhold from his agent power to make such a contract on his behalf; and if an agent should make it for his principal, without authority, he would violate his agreement with his principal, but, according to the current of judicial authority, he would nevertheless bind his principal to the vendee, if the vendee had no knowledge of the limitation upon the agent's apparent authority. Secret instructions to an agent, inconsistent with his apparent authority, are not binding upon third parties dealing with him. Union Bank & Trust Co. v. Long Pole Lumber Co., 70 W. Va. 558, 74 S. E. 674, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 663; Bank v. Ohio Valley Furniture Co., 57 W. Va. 625, 50 S. E. 880, 70 L. R. A. 312; Rohrbough v. Express Co., 50 W. Va. 149, 40 S. E. 398, 88 Am. St. Rep. 849; Clark v. Gordon, 35 W. Va. 735, 14 S. E. 255; Bass Dry Goods Co. v. Granite City Mfg. Co., 119 Ga. 124, 45 S. E. 980; Ludlow-Saylor Wire Co. v. Fribley Hardware Co., 67 Kan. 710, 74 Pac. 237; Towle v. Leavitt, 23 N. H. 360, 55 Am. Dec. 195; Clews v. Reilly, 53 Hun, 636, 6 N. Y. Supp. 640; Hatch v. Taylor, 10 N. H. 538; Mechem, Agency, § 854.

An agent has implied authority to fix the price and terms of sale and agree upon such incidental matters as the time and place of delivery, provided he does not go beyond what is reasonable and usual, in the stipulations he makes respecting such things, and his principal is bound by what he does, within these limitations, even though he acts without authority, if the person who deals with him is not cognizant of his want of authority. A stipulation in a contract of sale of personal property, binding the principal to take back the property, if it proves to be unsatisfactory, is held to be usual and reasonable, and therefore within the agent's apparent authority. Eastern Mfg. Co. v. Brenk, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 97, 73 S. W. 538; French Piano Co. v. Cardwell, 114 Ga. 340, 40 S. E. 292; Zaleski v. Clark, 44 Conn. 218, 26 Am. Rep. 446; Oster v. Mickley, 35 Minn. 245, 28 N. W. 710; Babcock v. Deford, 14 Kan. 408.

As to the existence of a stipulation for return of the goods, if found to be unsatisfactory, there is no preponderance of evidence against the verdict. It is all oral and conflicting, the witnesses for the plaintiff only denying the authority of the salesman to make a conditional sale and the existence of a return provision in the order, and three witnesses swearing the sale was a conditional one, while the law supplies the agent's authority. While they do not define it, the witnesses for the plaintiff admit its maintenance of a return goods department. The letter in which the defendants promised to pay is general and indefinite in its terms and purport. Hence, it is not necessarily inconsistent with their position. As the order for the goods was not produced, nor its complete contents established, there is no proof of a written contract. If it had been put in evidence, it might have been no more than a memorandum or an incomplete contract, not precluding oral proof of terms and conditions not stated in it. Rymer v. South Penn Oil Co., 54 W. Va. 530, 48 S. E. 559; Johnson v. Burns, 39 W. Va. 658, 20 S. E. 686; Cream City Glass Co. v. Friedlander, 84 Wis. 53, 54 N. W. 28, 21 L. R. A. 135, 36 Am. St. Rep. 896.

The evidence is insufficient, however, to sustain the kind of a return contract the defendants claim. It is general and indefinite in its terms, and, properly construed, it means that the purchasers were to take the goods upon trial, with the privilege of return after a reasonable time for a test of their fitness for the trade for which they were conditionally bought. One witness states the contract in these terms:

"If the shoes did not give satisfaction or any number that did not give satisfaction, we were to return them."

Another says the agent said:

"If these shoes don't prove to be the shoes I say they are, and don't give satisfaction, all you have got to do is to box these shoes up and send them back at our expense."

The third one says:

"The contract was that the shoes were to give perfect satisfaction, if not, we were to box them up and return them."

Nothing in this language imports intention to permit an unlimited and unrestricted right of return. Inspection was one of the tests to be made and that required very little time. Determination of fitness by sales required more time, but not an unlimited or unreasonable period. A month or two was amply sufficient. These goods were retained seven months, and almost half of them sold, before the return of the residue. As this provision of the contract was inserted for the benefit of the defendants, and they were relying upon it, as a ground of defense, it was incumbent upon them to prove and define it, and they have proved no more than a stipulation for right of return, which, presumptively, was the usual and customary return privilege after a fair test of fitness. If it was more than that, they should have said so, and the jury could not supply the lack of evidence by their verdict. Retention of trial goods, after a reasonable test has been made, amounts to an election to keep them. Zipp Mfg. Co. v. Pastorino, 120 Wis. 176, 97 N. W. 904.

An agreement for an unlimited and unrestricted right of return, if made, was not within the implied authority of the agent. Under it, he could do only what was reasonable and usual. Power to stipulate for a limited right of return constitutes no ground of argument for authority to allow such right without a limit. The reasonableness of a stipulation may depend upon its extent, as well as its character or subject-matter, and there is no authority for the proposition that an agent has implied power to put an unreasonable provision in his principal's contract.

It follows, from these principles and conclusions, that the judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded.

JEFFERSON v. SIMPSON. (No. 3624.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 28, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. WILLS §68—CONTRACT TO MAKE WILL—BREACH—REMEDY.

Assumpsit is a proper remedy for a breach of contract to make a will.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE §86 — WILLS §56—CONTRACT TO MAKE WILL—CONSTRUCTION.

A contract to make a will is controlled by the same rules and principles and enforceable as other contracts.

3. WILLS §59—CONTRACT TO MAKE WILL—CONSIDERATION.

An agreement made singly or in connection with another to sacrifice an old home, to sell and dispose of one's property, and to remove to the home provided by the other party to the contract in order to furnish him companionship during the remainder of his natural life constitutes a sufficient consideration for his promise to make a will bequeathing to the promisee a sum certain out of his estate.

4. WILLS §58(1) — CONTRACT TO MAKE WILL—CERTAINTY—ACTION FOR DAMAGES.

Such a contract is sufficiently definite and certain in its terms to be enforceable in a suit by the promisee against the executor of the promisor for damages for the breach thereof by the promisor.

5. WILLS §58(2) — CONTRACT TO MAKE WILL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

A case in which the evidence is held sufficient to support a parol agreement to make a will.

6. EVIDENCE §278 — DECLARATIONS AGAINST INTEREST—ADMISSIBILITY.

Declarations of the promisor subsequent to the making of a contract to make a will, being against interest, are admissible in evidence, not as sufficient in themselves to prove the fact, but as corroborative of the evidence of witnesses to the contract.

7. EVIDENCE §236(1), 271(16)—SELF SERVING DECLARATIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

But evidence of contrary declarations made to other witnesses, being self serving and not in the presence of the other party to the contract, are inadmissible.

8. WILLS §68—CONTRACT TO MAKE WILL—BREACH—DAMAGES.

The measure of damages in a suit for breach of a valid contract to make a will is the sum stipulated in the contract or the value of the property contracted for.

Error to Circuit Court, Marshall County.

Action by Martha Jefferson against J. G. Simpson, executor, etc. Demurrer to declaration overruled, judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. C. Simpson and Martin Brown, both of Moundsville, for plaintiff in error.

J. Howard Holt, of Moundsville, for defendant in error.

MILLER, P. Numerous points of error are relied on by defendant to reverse the judgment below against him for $3,980.00. The first is that his demurrer to the declaration and to each count thereof should have been sustained. There are six counts. The fourth and fifth are nothing more than the common counts in assumpsit, and as to which no defects are specifically pointed out, and we perceive none. But the remaining counts it is urged are bad in point of pleading, (1) because of want of averment of a sufficient consideration for the alleged promises on the part of the decedent Samuel Francis; (2) that the several statements of the contract pleaded are too indefinite, uncertain and inadequate to be enforceable, even in a court of equity.

The contract of decedent substantially alleged in each of the four counts under review is that in consideration that the plaintiff with her husband W. H. Jefferson, farmers residing on their farm in Marshall County, would sell and dispose of their horses, cattle, hogs and farming implements, quit farming and move to the city of Moundsville and there reside with him at his home and provide him companionship for and during the remainder of his natural life, according to the first count, he would give plaintiff the sum of $4,000.00 to $6,000.00, payable out of his personal estate at the time of his death, and that he would provide therefor in his last will and testament. The second count with slight variation as to consideration, is the same as the first. The third predicated on the same consideration alleges the promise of decedent to pay plaintiff all expenses, costs and losses incurred by her and her husband in so disposing of their stock of horses, cattle, hogs, farming implements, etc., and all money expenses incurred in carrying out their contract, and which losses are specifically alleged, and also the loss which the said W. H. Jefferson would sustain by lack of employment, stated at $2,000.00, and aggregating more than the sum recovered. The sixth and last count also based on the same consideration avers more specifically a promise on the part of the decedent that he would give and bequeath to the plaintiff out of his estate the sum of from $4,000.00 to $6,000.00, payable to her out of his estate at his death. Each of said counts avers full performance by plaintiff and her husband of the said contract on their part, and the breaches thereof by the decedent as averred in each count, and lay her damages at the sum of $6,000.00.

[1] That one may maintain assumpsit on a contract to make a will when founded on a good and valid consideration, is not con-troverted. The authorities so hold. 40 Cyc. 1070; Hotsinpilller v. Hotsinpilller, 72 W. Va. 823, 825, 79 S. E. 936, and cases there cited.

[2, 3] Was the contract here pleaded based on a good and sufficient consideration? We think it was. The contract as alleged involved sacrifice by plaintiff of her previous home on the farm, of property thereon, changes of friends and neighbors, and her husband of profitable employment, and to that extent at least of means of support, and gave to the other party therein companionship during his natural life, however long that might be lengthened out in time. There can be no doubt of the sufficiency of the consideration, especially when viewed in the light of the relationship and situation of the parties disclosed by the evidence.

Contracts to make wills are controlled by the same rules and principles and are enforceable as other contracts. Davidson v. Davidson, 72 W. Va. 747, 750, 79 S. E. 998, and cases cited. A gain to the promisor is as adequate a consideration to support a contract as the loss of the promisee. Jackson v. Hough, 38 W. Va. 236, 240, 18 S. E. 575; Rowan v. Hull, 55 W. Va. 335, 340, 47 S. E. 92, 104 Am. St. Rep. 998, 2 Ann. Cas. 884.

The incurrance of some risk and trouble at the instance of the promisor singly or in connection with another at the instance of the promisor constitutes a valuable consideration. County Court v. Hall, 51 W. Va. 269, 41 S. E. 119. And it has been decided by the highest authority that an agreement for companionship constitutes a sufficient consideration for a promise to make a will. Howe v. Watson, 179 Mass. 30, 60 N. E. 415; Burdine v. Burdine's Ex'r, 98 Va. 515, 36 S. E. 992, 81 Am. St. Rep. 741; Schutt v. Missionary Soc., 41 N. J. Eq. 115, 3 Atl. 398.

[4] Is the contract alleged sufficiently definite and certain in its terms to be enforceable? There can be no doubt, we think, on this proposition. As the promise of the plaintiff is definite and certain, the only thing that can be regarded as uncertain is the amount of money promised by the decedent, $4,000.00 to $6,000.00. But the least sum promised was $4,000.00. This was the sum less the value of the property given by the will which plaintiff recovered. Agreements to give by request all the property of the testator have been held sufficiently definite. Burdine v. Burdine's Ex'r, Howe v. Watson, and Schutt v. Missionary Soc., supra. The contract to pay $4,000.00 to $6,000.00 is certainly a promise to pay at least a sum of $4,000.00.

[5] The other ground urged for reversal is that the contract alleged is not proven. In this we think counsel is in error. Plaintiff proved by her daughter, present at the time, previous conversations relating to the contract, and that the contract finally agreed upon between her mother and Samuel Francis was substantially in all respects as alleged, and that the contract was in all respects fully performed on the part of the plaintiff. Moreover, numerous witnesses swear positively that Francis declared to them after the time of the making of the contract the substance of the agreement as alleged and that he had made provision for his sister in his will as agreed. And one witness, a notary public, testified that he had prepared at least two wills for Francis in which provisions were made for Mrs. Jefferson, giving her practically if not quite all of his property, which then consisted mainly of personal estate. The evidence considered in the light of all the acts and conduct of the parties subsequently to the time of the making of the contract establish the fact of the contract beyond question of doubt.

[6] But it is urged that the evidence of decedent's declarations and of the making of the wills subsequent to the date of the contract, was improperly admitted over defendant's objection. The proposition is not sustained by the authorities. None are cited which support it. The fact of the making of the subsequent wills providing for plaintiff, while not of itself sufficient to establish the contract, is nevertheless corroborative in character and admissible on that score. Burgess v. Burgess, 109 Pa. 312, 317, 1 Atl. 167. And the alleged declarations of Francis subsequent to the making of the contract, he being dead and they being against his interest, were admissible, we think, as tending to establish the fact of the contract. Bartlett v. Patton, 33 W. Va. 71, 10 S. E. 21, syl. 8, 5 L. R. A. 523; High's Heirs v. Pancake, 42 W. Va. 602, 26 S. E. 536; 1 R. C. L. 502; Daggett v. Simonds, 173 Mass. 340, 53 N. E. 907, 46 L. R. A. 332.

[7] Another contention in connection with the last proposition and as calling for reversal is that the court improperly excluded the testimony of witnesses for defendant of other declarations of the deceased testator as to contrary declarations made by him. The rulings of the court thereon, both to the exceptions to the introduction thereof and for a new trial based on their exclusion, were fully justified under the rule that all such declarations were made in the absence of the other party to the contract, were self serving, and properly excluded on both grounds. Crothers' Adm'r v. Crothers, 40 W. Va. 169, 20 S. E. 927; 4 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Rep. 344.

[8] The next point we will consider is the conflicting theories presented by the rulings of the court on instructions given and refused, and the motion of defendant for a new trial overruled, as to the true measure of damages in cases of this character. The court in substance told the jury by the only instruction proposed by plaintiff that if they found the contract proved as alleged, they should find for the plaintiff on account of the promises of defendant's testator not less than four thousand dollars, but to subtract therefrom the value of the bed and bedding left to plaintiff by the will of said testator. This instruction amounted to telling the jury that the true measure of damages in the case was the amount stipulated in the contract. There can be no doubt in the world, we think, that in the absence of fraud, mistake, duress, or some other fact, where the parties are competent to make the contract, the amount stipulated or the value of the thing contracted for constitutes the true measure of damages for the breach thereof. 3 Sutherland on Damages (4th Ed.) § 706; 3 Elliott on Contracts, § 2220; 8 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 683, 684; 13 Cyc. 168; Mullen v. Cook, 69 W. Va. 456, 71 S. E. 566. The amount stipulated in such cases will be regarded as the estimate of the parties of the value of the services rendered or to be rendered. In contracts for companionship, the loss to the other party in the performance thereof is often incapable of being measured in dollars and cents. In such cases the estimate of the parties and the sum stipulated is the only true measure of recovery. This is not the case supposed by defendant's counsel where no price has been stipulated or the contract is incapable for some reason of enforcement and where the rule is as contended by him, that the value of the services rendered is to be determined on a quantum meruit.

Respecting the defendant's instructions: No. 12, given, we think sufficiently and fairly presented to the jury the theory of the defendant applicable to the facts in the case. It put the burden of proof of the contract on plaintiff and told the jury that in such cases the contract alleged must be sustained by evidence, clear, positive and convincing. It also presented the theory of the defendant that the contract alleged had been fully performed by the decedent in his life time by the conveyance of a house and lot in the city of Moundsville to a daughter of the plaintiff. We have examined carefully all the defendant's other instructions refused by the trial court, and on familiar principles find no reversible error in the rulings of the court thereon.

For the reasons given we are of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed.

STATE v. CENTRAL POCAHONTAS COAL CO. et al. (No. 3497.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 28, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TAXATION ¶684(2)—TAX SALE—RETURN AND RECORD—VALIDITY.

Under the law as it stood in 1875 a sale of land by the sheriff for the nonpayment of the taxes thereon is void, where the record does not show that the sheriff returned his report of such sale within ten days thereafter.

2. ESTOPPEL ¶37 — TAXATION ¶855 — CONVEYANCE OF FORFEITED LAND—TITLE OF GUARANTY.

A deed made by the commissioner of school lands under the provisions of the Acts of 1872-73, c. 134, in regard to the sale of forfeited, waste, and unappropriated land, is a grant from the state. Such deed vests in the grantee therein all of the title possessed by the state, and in case the state subsequently acquires an adverse title by forfeiture or otherwise, it will be estopped to assert the same against its grantee in such school commissioner's deed.

3. TAXATION ¶853 — DECREE OF REDEMPTION—EFFECT.

A decree of redemption in a suit to sell forfeited lands for the benefit of the school fund, brought under the provisions of chapter 105 of the Code of 1913 (secs. 4433-4454), is in effect a grant by the state of the land redeemed to the party redeeming the same.

4. TAXATION ¶853 — SALE OF FORFEITED LANDS—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

One who has been in possession of land for more than ten years under a decree of redemption entered in a suit brought to sell such land as forfeited under the provisions of chapter 105 of the Code of 1913 (secs. 4433-4454), and has paid the taxes regularly assessed against such land during such time, becomes vested with the title of an adverse claimant to such land under the provisions of section 3, art. 13, of the Constitution, when the same is purchased by the state for the nonpayment of the taxes assessed against the same in the name of such adverse claimant, and is not redeemed within one year after such purchase as provided by law.

5. EQUITY ¶302—AMENDED AND SUPPLEMENTAL ANSWER—ALLOWANCE.

It is not error to allow a defendant to file an amended and supplemental answer, where the matter set up therein is of such character that it is necessary that the same should be before the court for a proper determination of the matters involved in the suit, and is not contradictory of the matter alleged in the original answer.

6. TAXATION ¶518, 730 — ASSESSMENT AGAINST JOINT OWNERS—REDEMPTION.

Where a tract of land is assessed upon the land books in the name of the joint owners as a whole, a payment by one of the joint owners of a portion of the taxes corresponding with his interest in the land will not redeem such interest from the delinquency, and a purchase by the state of such land at a sale of the same for such delinquent taxes will vest the title to the whole thereof in the state upon a failure of the former owners to redeem the same within one year, even though the sheriff advertises for sale and purports to sell only an undivided interest.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Suit by the State of West Virginia against the Central Pocahontas Coal Company, Lewis

B. Cook, and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants Lewis B. Cook and others appeal. Affirmed.

A. D. Preston, of Beckley, Wm. R. Thompson, of Huntington, M. P. Howard, of Pineville, and Brown, Jackson & Knight, of Charleston, for appellants.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., for the State. Anderson, Strother, Hughes & Curd, of Welch, and Price, Smith, Spliman & Clay, of Charleston, for appellees Central Pocahontas Coal Co. and others.

BITZ, J. This suit was instituted for the purpose of having sale of a tract of 905 acres of land for the benefit of the school fund. There are two sets of claimants to this land, to wit, the Central Pocahontas Coal Company, claiming it under a deed from John V. Bouvier and others; and A. D. Preston and others, claiming it under a title derived from the commissioner of school lands of Wyoming county. This tract of 905 acres is a part of a larger grant of 480,000 acres made by the commonwealth of Virginia in the year 1795 to Robert Morris. This 480,000-acre grant, together with another grant of 320,000 acres lying adjacent thereto, passed in the year 1852 under various deeds to Michael Bouvier, with the exception of 50,000 acres which had been theretofore conveyed away. Several people were interested with Michael Bouvier, and under an agreement among them the land, remaining, after excluding the 50,000 acres which had theretofore been sold, was surveyed, and it was found that instead of there remaining 750,000 acres of the two surveys, there was only 157,500 acres thereof. This was divided into tracts, one of which was to be conveyed to each of the interested parties, upon the payment of certain sums specified in the contract. Accordingly Bouvier conveyed two of said tracts, to wit, 63,000 acres and 17,850 acres to John Herman in the year 1853; a 15,750-acre tract he conveyed to Oakes Terrill, Jr., and another 15,750-acre tract to Richard Warren. Both of these conveyances were made in the year 1853. This left remaining a tract of 36,750 acres, which was to be conveyed to Eustache Bouvier, and a tract of 8,400 acres, which was to be conveyed to William A. Bull, upon the performance by these parties of the conditions of the contract referred to. The 36,750-acre tract was in 1865 conveyed to Jonathan Patterson through an arrangement with Eustache Bouvier, which it is not now necessary to advert to, leaving title to 8,400 acres remaining in Michael Bouvier. The tract of land in question is a part of this 8,400 acres. Michael Bouvier retained this tract of land until his death in 1874, when it passed to his devisees under his will. It appears that for the years 1869 to 1876, inclusive, this tract of land was returned delinquent for the non-payment of the taxes thereon, and was offered for sale by the sheriff for such delinquent taxes, and purchased by the state at each of said sales. From 1877 until 1890 the tract of land was not on the land books in the name of Bouvier or his devisees, and in the year 1890 the commissioner of school lands of McDowell county, in which county the larger part of the land lay, filed a bill, asking to have sale thereof for the benefit of the school fund as forfeited for nonentry upon the land books for more than five years. In that proceeding Bouvier's executors filed a petition, asserting title to the tract of land, and asking leave to redeem the same from the forfeiture. This leave was granted, and it was redeemed, the taxes in arrears paid thereon, and the same re-entered upon the land books of McDowell county. At that time, and for some time thereafter, it was believed that this tract of land lay entirely in the county of McDowell, when in fact part thereof, to wit, a little over 900 acres, lay in the county of Wyoming. After this redemption in 1890 the land was regularly charged on the land books of McDowell county, and the taxes regularly paid thereon until the year 1908. In that year it was discovered that part of the tract lay in Wyoming county, to wit, 953 acres thereof. Upon discovering this fact this 953 acres was entered upon the land books of Wyoming county, and the taxes thereon duly paid for the year 1908 and each subsequent year by the Bouviers and those claiming under them, and the McDowell tract reduced in area by a like amount. A part of this 8,400 acres embracing the land in controversy in this suit was conveyed by the Bouviers to the defendant Central Pocahontas Coal Company, by deed of October 2, 1914.

The defendant Preston and his associates claim under a deed from the commissioner of school lands of Wyoming county made in the year 1887. It appears that in the year 1866 a deed purports to have been executed by Michael Bouvier to Henry L. Morris conveying the 480,000-acre grant and the 320,000-acre grant made to Robert Morris in 1795. This deed was placed on record in Tazewell county, Va., in the year 1875. A deed purporting to be executed by Henry L. Morris, dated in the year 1875, to Morgan H. Haskins, and conveying the same land, also was recorded in Tazewell county, Va. In the year 1879 these two deeds, or authenticated copies, were recorded in Wyoming county, W. Va. The deed from Michael Bouvier to Henry L. Morris was a forgery, and as soon as it became known to the real owners of the land it was attacked, and, in several suits brought for the purpose, has been adjudicated to be a forgery. The 480,000-acre grant under this forged title was conveyed to Jesse R. Irwin. The taxes were not paid upon the tract of land under the Irwin title, and in the year 1881 the commissioner of school lands of Wyoming county instituted a suit for the purpose of having sale of the 480,000-acre tract as forfeited to the state of West Virginia for the benefit of the school fund. The land was decreed to be sold in this proceeding, and was offered for sale, but it appears that the first sale reported was not confirmed by the court, for the reason that the price was inadequate, and the court thereupon directed the commissioner of school lands to have the tract subdivided into 640-acre parcels, and to again offer the same for sale. In accordance with this direction some 50 or more tracts were laid off, and when they were offered for sale they were largely purchased by John W. McCreery and L. B. Cook. At any rate, the subdivisions which it is contended include the tract of land in controversy in this suit were purchased by McCreery and Cook. In 1887 deeds were made to the said Cook and McCreery conveying the tracts of land so purchased by them, including the parcels which it is claimed cover the land involved here. In addition to including the land involved in this case the purchases made by Cook and McCreery included a large part, if not all, of the 36,750-acre tract conveyed by Bouvier to Patterson, as above stated. Upon the discovery of this fact Patterson's successors in title, to wit, Francis Lasher and others, trustees, instituted a suit for the purpose of cancelling the school land commissioner's deed as a cloud upon the Lasher title. In this suit the school land commissioner's deed was canceled and held to convey no title, because of the fact that the tract of land purported to have been sold by the state of West Virginia for the failure of Jesse R. Irwin to pay the taxes had no existence; that the deeds under which Irwin held were forgeries, and no title passed thereby. Preston and his associates, however, claim that this adjudication only affected the rights of McCreery and Cook so far as the deed to them covered the Lasher land. They claim that they have ascertained that this tract of 905 acres is not part of the Lasher tract and is within the 8,400-acre tract. With this view they had placed upon the land books of Wyoming county a tract of 905 acres which it is claimed by them was conveyed to Cook and McCreery by the commissioner of school lands in the year 1887, being the residue of the land contained in that conveyance, excluding the part thereof covered by the Lasher deeds. In the year 1910 they failed to pay the taxes upon this tract of land charged in their names, and the same was returned delinquent for the nonpayment of these taxes, and sold by the sheriff of Wyoming county, and purchased by the state. It was not redeemed within one year, in which the former owner had a right to redeem before the title became vested in the state, and this suit was thereupon brought by the commissioner of school lands to subject the same to sale for the benefit of the school fund.

The defendant Central Pocahontas Coal Company claims that the defendants Preston and others have not now, and never did have, any title or interest in this tract of land. They claim: First, that no title ever became vested in Jesse R. Irwin under the forged deed from Bouvier to Morris; second, that no title became vested in Cook and McCreery by the deed from the commissioner of school lands in the year 1887; and, third, that even though Cook and McCreery did get title under the deed of 1887, this title became vested in the Bouviers under the provisions of the Constitution as soon as it became vested in the state for the failure to pay the taxes in 1910. It is earnestly insisted by Preston and his associates that the Bouvier land was forfeited and the title thereto vested in the state in the year 1881, at the time of the institution of the suit by McClure, commissioner of school lands, for the purpose of having sale of the 480,000-acre Morris grant, and that when the sale was made by the commissioner of school lands the purchaser acquired all of the title of the state of West Virginia in the lands covered by the deeds made by said commissioner, whether the same was acquired by the state through the Irwin title, or from any other source, and that because this 905 acres of the Bouvier 480,000-acre tract was included in the deed made by the commissioner of school lands to Cook and McCreery, the title thereto being at the time forfeited and vested in the state, it passed to and became vested in Cook and McCreery under that deed.

On the other hand, it is contended that in the year 1881, at the time of the institution of the suit by the commissioner of school lands of Wyoming county, the Bouvier title had not been forfeited. It is admitted that this land was returned delinquent for the nonpayment of taxes for the years 1869 to 1876, inclusive, and that it was sold by the sheriff for those years and purchased by the state, but the contention is that those sales and each of them were absolutely void and passed no title to the state of West Virginia. It is admitted that this land was off the land books thereafter until the year 1890, when it was redeemed by the Bouviers, the back taxes paid, and the tract placed upon the land books in McDowell county, where it was then believed the whole tract lay, and that subsequently, in 1908, upon discovering that 953 acres was in Wyoming county, that amount was entered upon the land books of Wyoming county. But it is said that the fact that this land was off the land books after the year 1876 had not the effect of forfeiting the title thereto and vesting the same in the state in the year 1881, when the school land suit was brought, for the reason that it was on the land books in the name of Irwin and his associates for part of that time, and that notwithstanding the Irwin title was a forgery, if the land was charged on the land books in the name of Irwin, it would prevent the title thereto from becoming forfeited and vesting in the state, inasmuch as Irwin purported to claim under the same title as Bouvier; and it may be said, further, that in the year 1881, at the time of the institution of the school land proceeding, the land had not been off the land books in the name of Bouvier for five years. The defendant Central Pocahontas Coal Company contends that this was the true status of the Bouvier title in 1881, and that the state of West Virginia, at the time of the institution of that proceeding, had no right, title, or interest, of any character, in the tract of land now sought to be sold, for the reason that the Irwin title was a forgery, and no rights could be acquired thereunder, and the Bouvier title had not at that time become forfeited for nonentry for as much as five years, and the sales made thereof by the sheriff were void and of no effect, and, this being true, the circuit court of Wyoming county was entirely without jurisdiction to entertain a suit to sell the tract of land, and any proceedings had by it were coram non iudice. The contention is further made, however, that even though the Bouvier title was forfeited and vested in the state in the year 1881, and the deed from McClure, commissioner, to Cook and McCreery, made in 1887, did have the effect to vest in Cook and McCreery the state's title to so much of the Bouvier tract as was included in that deed, still Preston and his associates are not entitled to redeem the land in this proceeding for the reason that the deed from McClure, commissioner, to Cook and McCreery was a grant from the state of West Virginia, and should be treated as such; that the decree of redemption made by the Bouviers in 1890 was likewise a grant from the state of West Virginia for their tract of land, and that the parties stood in the position of holding conflicting titles to the same tract of land, so far as the McClure deed included any part of the Bouvier land. Of course the Cook and McCreery deed was the senior grant and was superior, and their title would be good unless they lost the same in some of the ways provided by law, and the Central Pocahontas Coal Company contends that this is just what they did. It is shown, and not attempted to be contradicted, that the Bouviers and those claiming under them had possession of the 8,400-acre tract for a long time, much more than ten years, before the return of delinquency of the Cook and McCreery tract for the taxes in 1910, and that while it may be that this possession was not in Wyoming county, and was not within the interlock, still, this being a contest between the state and the Bouvier interests, it is not material upon what part of the tract the Bouviers had possession, just so that it was upon the tract granted to them by the state under the redemption proceeding, and their contention is that the very minute the title of Cook and McCreery vested in the state by reason of the return of delinquency for the taxes of 1910, and the sale and purchase thereof by the state under that delinquency, this title became transferred to them under the provisions of the Constitution.

[1, 2] Did the state have any title to the land in controversy at the time of the institution of the proceeding against the 480,000-acre tract in Wyoming county in 1881? Of course, the forfeiture of the Jesse R. Irwin forged title conferred no title upon the state, and if the Bouvier title was not at that time forfeited, then the state did not have any title at that time. If the sales made by the sheriff of McDowell county of the Bouvier tract for nonpayment of taxes for the years 1869 to 1876, inclusive, were void, and the state acquired no title thereunder, and this title was not forfeited for nonentry upon the land books for more than five years, then the same was not vested in the state at that time. The contention is made that the sales made by the sheriff for the years 1869 to 1876, inclusive, are void, for the reason that it does not appear that the sale list was returned to the clerk's office within ten days after the sales were made. Certificates of the clerk are filed in the record in this case, showing that it does not appear when these sale lists were returned to the clerk's office, and, as held in State v. Harman, 57 W. Va. 447, 50 S. E. 828; as the law stood then, a sale was void where the record did not show that the sale list was returned to the office of the clerk within ten days, and the date of such return noted thereon. We are therefore constrained to hold that no title vested in the state of West Virginia by reason of the sales made by the sheriff for the delinquencies for the years 1869 to 1876, inclusive. Was the Bouvier title forfeited to the state in 1881 for nonentry upon the land books for more than five years? This tract of land was charged on the land books in the year 1876, and it is quite patent that in 1881, at the time of the institution of the school land proceeding by McClure, commissioner, five years had not yet elapsed, and there could have been no forfeiture or vesting of the title in the state in 1881 for that reason. The proceeding was instituted by McClure in the fifth year, and not after the five years had expired. The forfeiture does not become complete, and the title does not vest in the state unless the land remains off the land books for five years. The state has no more title at any time during the five-year period than it would have if the land had been regularly kept on the land books and the taxes paid thereon.

But the defendant Central Pocahontas Coal Company contends that, even though the Bouvier land was not on the land books for more than five years, the fact that the Morris tract, including the land in controversy in this suit, was charged on the land books in the name of Irwin and his associates for some of these five years would prevent a forfeiture to the state, even though the Irwin title was void because based upon a forgery, and this seems to be the law. Kelley v. Dearman, 65 W. Va. 49, 63 S. E. 693; Chilton v. White, 72 W. Va. 545, 78 S. E. 1048. But does the fact that the state had no title to any part of the land in 1881, when the proceeding to sell the same was begun, make any difference? It is admitted that the Bouvier title was forfeited and vested in the state in 1887 when the deed from the commissioner of school lands to Cook and McCreery was actually made. It must be borne in mind that this proceeding was brought under the Acts of 1872-73, c. 134, and that the same was a purely administrative proceeding, and not in any sense judicial. McClure v. Matland, 24 W. Va. 561. It was the method adopted by the state of divesting itself of the title to land which came to it by forfeiture or by purchase for delinquent taxes. The Legislature could have as well conferred the authority to make these grants upon any other officer as upon the commissioner of school lands. There were certain preliminary inquiries to be made in order that the officer upon whom the duty of making the conveyance devolved might be fully informed of the real condition of the title, but these inquiries were in no sense judicial. The former owner of the land had no interest therein; he had no right to be a party to the suit. It is true the state permitted him to redeem the same, or in effect become the purchaser for the amount of taxes in default, but this was not a right given to him under the law as it then was, but simply a chance that he had to take advantage of if he would get the benefit of it. If he redeemed the land before the state sold it, he got his title back, but if the state sold it without his knowledge before he redeemed it, his title was gone. This being the nature of the proceeding by which the commissioner of school lands conveyed to Cook and McCreery, it would seem that any title vested in the state at the time the grant was made in 1887 would pass thereby. It is in no wise different from a case in which the state would make a second grant of land which it had theretofore granted. Any part of the first grant, the title to which should become vested in the state by forfeiture or otherwise, would pass to the grantee in the second grant. Further than this, even though the state's title was not good at the time of the grant, and conceding that the grant must be construed as taking effect at the time the proceeding was instituted for that purpose, the deed made by the commissioner of school lands would, under the contention of the defendant Central Pocahontas Coal Company, convey no title as a matter of fact, but the state could not say this. The state offered the land for sale. This offer to sell presupposes title thereto in the state; and, after it has received the purchase money and made a deed therefor to the purchaser, it cannot be heard to dispute that title, and any title subsequently coming to the state by forfeiture or otherwise from a source other than the grantee in the deed, would inure to the benefit of such grantee. It is the application of the same doctrine that is enforced in the case of a transaction between individuals. If one make a deed to real estate to which he has no title, and subsequently acquires title thereto, he will be estopped from claiming said real estate against his grantor, and so the state in a proceeding like this, even though it had no title at the time of the conveyance, would be estopped to set up a subsequently acquired title against its own grantor. State v. King, 64 W. Va. 610, 63 S. E. 495. It follows from this conclusion that when the Bouvier title became forfeited, as it did a short time after the year 1881, it passed to the grantees of the state in the Cook and McCreery deed, or at any rate the state in this proceeding cannot claim that Cook and McCreery did not own this land.

[3, 4] But does this conclusion help Preston and his associates in this case? In 1890 confessedly the Bouvier title was forfeited, and so much of this Bouvier land as was acquired by the deed from McClure, commissioner, became vested in Cook and McCreery by reason of that deed, so that at the time of redemption by the Bouviers it may be said that the Bouvier title to the 905 acres here involved was vested in Cook and McCreery, at least in so far as the state of West Virginia was concerned. What was the effect, however, of the redemption by the Bouviers in 1890 in the suit brought by the commissioner of school lands to sell the Bouvier land as forfeited? The Bouviers in that proceeding claimed to own the 8,400 acres of land. The court decreed that they were entitled to redeem the same, and they did pay all the taxes found to be due the state thereon, and have paid the taxes assessed against the same ever since. Under the holding of this court in the case of State v. Jackson, 56 W. Va. 558, 49 S. E. 465, such a redemption was a grant of the land from the state; it was the same in effect as though a grant had been made by the state to the party redeeming. So that, even under the contention made by Preston and his associates, they had a grant from the state by reason of the deed from McClure, commissioner, in 1887, which covered the 905-acre tract involved in this suit. The Bouviers had a junior grant from the state covering the very same land. It must be borne in mind in this case that the contest here is between the grantee of the Bouviers and the state, and is not between Preston and the Bouviers. The state is here asserting the right to sell this tract of land, claiming that the title is vested in it. The Bouviers are contending, upon the other hand, that the state cannot sell this land because it granted the same to them in 1890, and has collected the taxes thereon from them ever since. They claim and show that they have been in possession of the 8,400-acre tract for much more than ten years prior to the return of delinquency of the Cook and McCreery title, and their contention is that just as soon as the Cook and McCreery title became vested in the state by reason of their failure to pay taxes, the sale thereof by the sheriff, and the purchase thereof by the state, it was immediately transferred to and vested in the Bouvier interests by virtue of the constitutional provisions contained in section 8 of article 13. The fact that the possession of the Bouviers is not clearly shown to be upon the tract of land now in controversy, being only a part of the grant to them by the state in 1890, can make no difference. Their possession within the bounds of the 8,400-acre tract is undisputed. As before stated, their controversy is with the state of West Virginia. They say to the state, You have granted us this 8,400-acre tract of land, and by the Constitution it is provided that if we will go upon it and take possession of it and pay the taxes thereon, any subsequent title which may become vested in you will immediately upon the vesting thereof become transferred to us. We think it quite clear, therefore, that even though Cook and McCreery acquired title to this land under the deed of 1887 from McClure, commissioner, the minute that title became vested in the state of West Virginia it was transferred to and became the title of the Bouvier interests.

[5, 6] After the issue was made up in this case by the filing of the answers of the defendants, and after the commissioner had reported on the matters involved, the defendant Central Pocahontas Coal Company was permitted to file an amended answer, in which was set up the invalidity of the tax sales made by the sheriff of McDowell county of the Bouvier lands for the years 1869 to 1876, inclusive, and in which was also set up the fact that the 480,000-acre grant to Robert Morris was on the land books for some of the years between 1876 to 1881 under the Irwin forged title. The appellants objected to the filing of this answer, and they assign the action of the court in permitting it to be filed as ground for reversing the decree. It is quite true that the matter set up in this answer existed at the time the original answer was filed, but the defendant avers that it was not advised thereof, and that it came into the possession of the information since the filing of its original answer. As to when a defendant in an equity suit will be permitted to file an amended answer is largely discretionary with the trial court. If it appears that the matter set up in the amended answer is such as should be presented to the court in order for a full hearing and determination of the rights of the parties, and is not contradictory of the matter set up in the original answer, ordinarily permission will be granted to file such an amended answer. Story's Equity Pleadings, § 902. While it may be true that the defendant did not know these facts at the time it filed its original answer, it is clearly true that it might have known them by an investigation of the records, but still it seems that where the matter set up in the amended answer is such as the court should have before it in order for a fair determination of the controversy, such amendment will be allowed. We do not think the court abused its discretion in this case in permitting the amended answer to be filed. If the parties adversely interested desire an extension of time in order to meet the new matter set up in the amended answer, ordinarily it should be granted them. In this case no such time was granted, nor was it asked, and it was not error for the court to proceed with the hearing of the cause without granting time to meet the new matter set up in the answer when such time was not asked by any party adversely affected thereby.

Preston and his associates now contend that the sale made by the sheriff for the taxes of 1910, at which the state became the purchaser, was void for the reason that the sheriff only purported to advertise a seven-eighths interest in the tract of land, and returned only a seven-eighths interest therein. The whole tract of land was assessed on the land books in the name of Preston and his associates for the year 1910. One of the joint owners paid one-eighth of the taxes, he claiming to own a one-eighth interest in the land, and the sheriff then advertised for sale a seven-eighths interest in the land, and returned as sold to the state a seven-eighths interest therein. Under our decisions in the cases of Toothman v. Courtney, 62 W. Va. 167, 58 S. E. 915, and Caretta Railway Co. v. Fisher, 74 W. Va. 115, 81 S. E. 710, an undivided interest in a tract of land cannot be placed upon the land books and assessed for taxes, for the reason that the lien of the state for taxes goes to the whole of the tract and to every part thereof, and it was held in those cases that such an assessment was void, and that a deed based thereon was likewise void. That is not the case here, however. The assessment was of the whole tract of land, and the irregularity was in the advertisement for sale and the sheriff's return of the sale. Undoubtedly under the decisions above cited the state's lien for taxes existed on every part of this tract of land even after the payment of one-eighth of the taxes by one of the interested parties. That only reduced the amount which the state was entitled to collect, and did not in any wise affect the security or change the lien existing thereon, and when this land was sold in satisfaction of this lien and purchased by the state, the state purchased all of the land upon which the lien existed. The irregularities existing in the advertisement and in the return of the sheriff did not affect the validity of this sale. Section 32 of chapter 31 of the Code (sec. 1090) provides that all of the title of the former owner shall vest in the state upon a purchase by it at a tax sale without a deed therefor, giving to such a purchase the same effect as a purchase under a conveyance by deed would have were the land purchased by an individual, and the curative provisions of section 25 of chapter 31 (sec. 1084) apply to sales made to the state. State v. McEldowney, 54 W. Va. 695, 47 S. E. 650. That section provides that all such title and interest as was vested in the person or persons charged with the taxes thereon for which it was sold, at the commencement of or at any time during the year or years for which said taxes were assessed, shall be transferred to the purchaser, in this instance the state, notwithstanding any irregularity in the proceedings under which the same was sold, unless such irregularity appear on the face of such proceedings of record in the clerk's office, and be such as to materially prejudice and mislead the owner as to the portion of his real estate sold, and when and for what year sold, or the name of the purchaser, and not then unless it be clearly shown that but for such irregularity the former owner of the real estate would have redeemed the same. The irregularity here appeared upon the face of the record in the clerk's office, but can it be said that it materially prejudiced and misled the owners? They were bound to know that the payment of a part of the taxes did not discharge the state's lien as to any part of the land, but only reduced the amount to be collected. They knew, because it is the law, that the state had the same right to sell the whole of the land for part of the taxes as it had to sell it for the whole thereof. The record showed a proper assessment against the whole tract, and that Sanders had paid one-eighth of the taxes. Instead of the record misleading them, it informed them as to the exact facts, and these facts under the law did not relieve the land, or any part of it, of the lien for taxes. Surely if these curative provisions are to be given any effect they must be applied to a case like this. It is urged that this conclusion is not consistent with the holding in the case of Shrewsbury v. Horse Creek Land Co., 78 W. Va. 182, 88 S. E. 1052. There were other sufficient grounds for setting aside the sale in that case, and the procedure there was somewhat different from the procedure in this case. It is true that in that case the sheriff undertook to sell an undivided interest, after part of the taxes had been paid by one of the joint owners, but the purchasers, before taking a deed, had an ex parte partition made of the land and took a deed for the part they assigned to themselves. It was held that they could not do this, as this was in effect discharging the state's lien as to part of the land, and that could not be done. The holding in that case goes no farther than that. Had the purchaser taken a deed to the whole of the land and treated the sheriff's attempt to sell a part of it as an irregularity, the holding in that case might have been different. There is some language in the opinion that might bear the construction contended for when read without relation to the facts being considered. The language of an opinion must always be read in the light of the facts in the instant case, and qualified so to make it apply to those facts. It cannot be given any broader meaning or more extended application. Being thus guided in the construction of that opinion, it is not inconsistent with the conclusion we have reached in this case.

We are of opinion that there is no error in the decree of the circuit court of Cabell county complained of, and the same is affirmed.

ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—EVIDENCE.

This was a suit in equity by the grantor against the grantee in a deed to land, to enjoin a suit at law by the latter against the former for breach of warranty, for reformation of the deed, and for other relief. The defendant demurred and answered. Her demurrer was overruled, and she excepted pendente lite, assigning error on the judgment overruling the demurrer in a cross-bill of exceptions. Upon the trial the verdict was for the defendant. The plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted. In his bill of exceptions he complains of certain rulings upon the admissibility of evidence, of certain charges given by the court to the jury, and of refusal to charge as requested. None of the special assignments of error show cause for reversal, and the evidence authorized the verdict.

CONKLIN v. CONKLIN et al. (No. 801.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 14, 1919.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 14, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CONSPIRACY §11—DIVORCE §167—VACATION OF DECREE—FRAUD—NEGLIGENCE IN FAILING TO DEFEND.

A husband filed suit for divorce against his wife, a nonresident of the state. The petition for divorce alleged the mental incapacity of the wife at the time of the marriage, unknown to the husband. The wife had both actual and legal notice of the pendency of the divorce case, but failed to appear and defend the same. Fourteen years after final decree, granting to both parties a total divorce, the wife filed an equitable suit against the husband and others, alleged to have been in conspiracy with him in the prosecution of the divorce case, to set aside the decree and to recover damages, alleging, in effect, that the ground upon which the decree was granted was fictitious and false, and so known to the defendants at the time of the filing of the suit for divorce, and that she failed to defend the divorce case because the husband and one of his alleged coconspirators fraudulently represented to her, at or about the time of the filing of the suit for divorce, that the decree would be sought and obtained upon the ground of desertion on the part of the wife. The wife had not in fact deserted the husband. Held, that the fraud charged is insufficient to relieve the plaintiff from the imputation of negligence in failing to defend the divorce suit, and that the petition, considered as a suit to cancel the decree of divorce or to recover damages, was properly dismissed upon demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Suit by Mary L. G. Conklin against G. H. Conklin and others. General and special demurrers to petition sustained, and suit dismissed, and plaintiff excepts and brings error. Affirmed.

On October 30, 1917, Mary L. Greer Conklin filed a petition in equity in Richmond superior court against George H. Conklin, Boykin Wright, Oswald R. Eve, Alonzo F. Purdy, as administrator with the will annexed of Daniel B. Dyer, late of Richmond county, deceased, Turner C. Vason, and Dr. H.

H. Malone, all of Richmond county, Ga., the Dyer Investment Company, and the Augusta-Aiken Railway & Electric Corporation, also of Richmond county, Ga., and Dr. Henry D. Allen, of Baldwin County, Ga. In substance the plaintiff alleged as follows:

On July 28, 1900, she was married to George H. Conklin in Fulton county, Ga., "but lived with him as his wife only a very short while, because of his drunkenness and his cruelty to her." She went with him to his home at Augusta, with the intention of living with him, but she found it impossible, "because of his dissolute habits and his cruelty to her, which caused her health to break down and precipitated a nervous condition and insomnia." Daniel B. Dyer (a lifelong friend of her family) and George H. Conklin proposed to her that she go to a summer hotel in Baldwin county for the remainder of the summer, and she readily assented, "as a relief from the horrors of the condition in which she found herself as the wife of George H. Conklin," and on August 3, 1900, she was placed under the care of the defendant Dr. H. D. Allen at his institution in Baldwin county. She was kept at Dr. Allen's institution, against her will, until October 17, 1900, when she was taken therefrom and placed by her brother in the Battle Creek (Mich.) Sanitarium. Dr. Allen maintained to her brother that his institution was not an insane retreat, and that petitioner "was not in any manner insane, but was suffering merely from a nervous breakdown." On May 12, 1902, the defendants entered into a conspiracy to "injure, ostracize, and damage petitioner by means of a fictitious judicial proceeding, which purported to culminate in a total divorce between petitioner and George H. Conklin, * * * in the superior court of Richmond county, Ga., on the 28th day of October, 1903." The petition for divorce filed by Conklin against her contained the following false allegation: "That at the time of said marriage said defendant [referring to the present plaintiff] was a lunatic, mentally incapable of contracting marriage," which fact was unknown to him at the time of the marriage. He also alleged that the plaintiff had been removed from Dr. Allen's sanitarium to a distant state; that when last heard from she was residing in the city of Chicago, Ill.; that on May 12, 1912, in Richmond superior court, an order was passed reciting that she was a nonresident of the state, and that it was necessary to perfect service upon her by publication; and it was accordingly so ordered. In compliance with said order a notice, bearing test in the name of the judge and signed by the clerk, was published and a copy of the publication was mailed to petitioner "when she was studying at the University of Chicago, in Chicago, Ill." Said notice contained the proper caption, and was addressed to the plaintiff, requiring her "to be and appear at the next October term of the superior court of Richmond county, Ga., to be held on the third Monday in October, 1902, to answer a petition for divorce," filed by George H. Conklin as plaintiff against her as defendant. On January 19, 1903, an order was passed in the divorce proceeding, appointing Turner C. Vason as guardian ad litem for petitioner; and on the same day he accepted the appointment in writing. The first verdict for a total divorce was returned on April 25, 1903, and the second verdict was returned on October 28, 1903, and a decree was rendered, granting to both the plaintiff and the defendant a total divorce, and restoring to defendant in that suit her maiden name. "At or about the time of the filing of the pretended divorce petition in Richmond superior court," Conklin and Dyer (the latter having died before the filing of the present suit) represented to petitioner and certain members of her family that the divorce "was being procured on the ground of desertion on the part of petitioner. Petitioner and her family believed this representation, [and] were justified in believing it at that time."

After the decree had been rendered in the divorce suit, petitioner and her family were led by Conklin and Dyer to believe that the divorce had been granted on the ground of desertion, and petitioner had no knowledge to the contrary until "about the 10th day of May, 1917. She had no positive knowledge of any injury to her because of said conspiracy and false testimony [referring to the testimony upon which the divorce was granted] until the 28th day of June, 1917." On or about June 25, 1914, petitioner met a wealthy, cultured, unmarried man of 50 years, Mr. F. W. Andros, of South America, and became engaged to marry him. Thereafter she advised Mr. Andros that she had resided in Georgia and had been married and divorced in Georgia. Subsequently Mr. Andros learned, from the record in the divorce proceeding, of the ground upon which the divorce had been granted, and forthwith broke his engagement with plaintiff, without explanation, to her injury, mortification, and humiliation. Andros was a man of great wealth, and as his wife she would have received all the necessities and luxuries of life. On June 28, 1917, Andros advised her of his reason for breaking his engagement with her. In November, 1912, H. W. Freeman, a wealthy widower, residing in Massachusetts, was about to employ petitioner as a companion for his children; but when he learned that she had been divorced he held up the employment until he investigated the record in the divorce case, then refused to employ her, thinking that she had once been insane. Had she procured the position with Mr. Freeman, she would have been well cared for, and, in addition to her board and $40 per month as a salary, would have been given the necessary time in which to "work at her profession as an author. The false and infamous record in the divorce suit of George H. Conklin against Mary Greer Conklin in Richmond superior court made possible only by and through the nefarious plans and designs of the conspirators herein named as defendants" was the sole cause of the plaintiff's failure to procure the position with Mr. Freeman and to consummate an advantageous marriage to Mr. Andros. Said record likewise reflects upon her as a writer of books and magazine articles, to her financial injury and loss. The motive of the defendants, other than Conklin, in conspiring with him, is set forth in the petition, and the failure of the guardian ad litem to defend the suit, and his participation in the conspiracy, are alleged.

By amendment to the petition it was alleged that no process was attached to the di-vorice suit, for which reason the whole proceeding was void, the plaintiff [defendant therein] not having waived, by appearance or otherwise, this alleged defect in the proceeding for divorce. She prayed that the verdicts and decree in the divorce suit be set aside for the fraud as already alleged, that all orders entered therein be vacated and canceled, that she have a judgment against the defendants in the sum of $200,000, and for process. Copies of the divorce suit, with all orders therein, and of the verdicts and the decree, are incorporated in the petition.

Each of the defendants filed demurrers, both general and special, raising similar questions of law. The principal grounds of demurrer were:

The petition sets forth no cause of action. The plaintiff had actual and constructive notice of the pendency of the divorce suit, and is bound by the decree rendered therein. The cause of action for damages, if any, is barred by the statute of limitations. The allegations made in the suit for divorce are privileged. The allegations charging conspiracy are vague, irrelevant, and amount to conclusions of fact and of law. The damages prayed are too remote and speculative, and the facts alleged fail to show that the defendant corporations authorized, ratified, or in any way participated in the alleged conspiracy.

The court sustained the demurrers and dismissed the action. The plaintiff excepted.

Hill & Adams, of Atlanta, L. D. McGregor, of Warrenton, and E. H. Clay, of Marietta, for plaintiff in error.

Barrett & Hull, Jos. B. Cumming, J. O. C. Black, Callaway & Howard, C. H. & R. S. Cohen, Archibald Blackshear, Henry O. Roney, and A. F. Purdy, all of Augusta, and Allen & Pottle, of Milledgeville, for defendants in error.

GEORGE, J. (after stating the facts as above). In the view we take of this case it is unnecessary to consider and decide the several grounds raised by the special demurrers, and for that reason we have omitted from the statement of facts the allegations of the petition charging in detail the formation of the conspiracy, and the several acts of the various defendants in the execution of it, particularly those allegations against the defendant corporations, made for the purpose of showing their connection with the conspiracy. The Constitution of this state provides:

"Divorce cases shall be brought in the county where the defendant resides, if a resident of this state; if the defendant be not a resident of this state, then in the county in which the plaintiff resides." Civ. Code, § 6538.

The petition in the divorce suit alleged that the plaintiff, George H. Conklin, was a resident of Richmond county, Ga., and that the defendant, Mary Greer Conklin, had returned to her former home in Winfield, Cowley county, Kan., but that when last heard from she was residing in the city of Chicago, state of Illinois. That petition therefore alleged that the defendant in that suit was a nonresident of the state. Section 2951 of the Civil Code provides:

"The action for divorce shall be by petition and process, as in ordinary suits, filed and served as in other cases, unless the defendant be nonresident of this state, when service shall be perfected as prescribed in this Code in causes in equity."

Section 5552 of the Civil Code requires the clerk of the court to annex to every petition, unless the same be waived, a process, signed by the clerk or his deputy, bearing test in the name of a judge of a court, and directed to the sheriff or his deputy, requiring the appearance of the defendant at the return term of the court. Section 5553 provides:

"If the defendant in an equitable proceeding does not reside in the state, service of the petition or any order of the court may be made by publication."

Sections 5556 and 5557 provide for the manner and mode of service of the petition on a nonresident defendant by publication. Under these sections the judge of the court in which the suit is pending may order service to be perfected by publication in the paper in which the sheriff's advertisements are printed, twice a month for two months. The published notice shall contain the name of the parties plaintiff and defendant, with a caption setting forth the court and term and character of the action, and a notice directed and addressed to the party defendant, commanding him to be and appear at the next term of the court, and shall bear test in the name of the judge and be signed by the clerk of the court. Where the residence or abiding place of the nonresident is known, the party obtaining the order for the service of the petition by publication shall file in the office of the clerk, at least 30 days before the term next after the order for publication, a copy of the newspaper in which said notice is published, with said notice plainly marked, and thereupon the clerk of the court shall at once inclose, direct, stamp, and mail said paper to said party named in said order, and make an entry of his action on the petition. Under section 5558 it is made the duty of the judge trying the case—

"to determine whether such service has been properly perfected, and to write an order to that effect upon the petition in said case as showing service thereof, which shall also be entered upon the minutes of the court."

The provisions of sections 5556, 5557, and 5558 were, according to the allegations in the present suit, fully complied with in the divorce case. The plaintiff in the present suit alleges in effect that she received the notice as required by the Code section, and she makes no attack upon the validity of the several sections of our Code providing for service by publication upon a non-resident party defendant. Moreover, she admits actual notice of the pendency of the divorce case, and alleges that she was advised by the plaintiff in that case and one of the alleged conspirators that the suit was brought upon the ground that she had deserted her husband. We are of the opinion that, as defendant in the divorce case referred to, she was served with the notice of the suit and process of the court as required by the laws of this state.

It is to be observed that she did not desert her husband. It is true she consented to leave him, "as a relief from the horrors of the condition in which she found herself," and to go to a summer hotel, according to the allegations of the petition. She distinctly alleges that the separation was due to her husband's "drunkenness and his cruelty to her." She therefore knew that her husband was seeking a divorce upon a false ground, conceding that she was ignorant, as a matter of fact, of the requirement of the law of this state that desertion, in order to constitute a ground for divorce, must be continuous for a term of three years. She certainly knew that she had not willfully deserted her husband, and under our Code (sections 2945-2947) "willful and continued desertion by either of the parties for the term of three years" shall be sufficient to authorize the granting of a total divorce. If the husband by his conversation and conduct compelled the wife for her safety to leave him and his home, he, and not the wife, was guilty of willful desertion. In no event, according to the allegations of the petition, can it be said that Mrs. Conklin deserted her husband. We do not hold that the divorce suit referred to in this case was a collusive one, because, so far as disclosed by the petition, she did not consent to the bringing of that suit, nor did she in any wise assist, encourage, or aid in its prosecution. She did, however, exercise the legal and moral right to keep silent when she was confronted with the knowledge that her husband had brought the suit for divorce against her upon a false ground. So far as she now discloses, she was willing that the husband be granted a divorce upon the ground that she had deserted him. Indeed, her only complaint is that the husband sought and obtained a divorce upon the false ground of the mental incapacity of the wife at the time of the marriage.

Our conclusion is that she is in no position to ask a court of equity to set aside a decree for divorce which she understood was to be granted upon a false ground, merely because a decree was in fact granted upon a different ground which she also alleges to be unfounded and untrue in fact. It is true that the charge in the petition for divorce of the mental incapacity of the wife at the time of the marriage is a serious charge, and one calculated to do the wife much harm, if in fact untrue. If the wife was mentally capable of contracting at the time of the marriage, as she insists, and if the suit was brought as a result of a conspiracy and the divorce obtained upon false testimony, as charged in the petition, the wife has been grievously wronged. The fact remains, however, that she knew of the suit, had legal notice of the pendency of the suit, makes no attack upon the constitutionality of the statute providing for service of such notice by publication, and cannot now be heard to complain that the judgment which she knew was being sought upon a false ground was obtained upon a different ground. She is precluded by her laches. Had the husband, or any one acting for him, represented to her that the divorce suit would be dismissed, or that no judgment or decree would be taken therein, the present case would be different. The plaintiff here would then occupy the position of a suitor who had been misled by the fraudulent conduct of the opposite party, and if she had a valid defense to the suit, equity would grant her the relief now prayed, and place her in position to defend that suit. It is to be noted that she does not now complain of the decree, but her complaint is directed to the allegations of the petition and the proof in support thereof upon which the decree was in fact rendered. She does not occupy the position of a diligent litigant, with a valid defense to an action, who has been misled by the fraud of the opposite party, and thereby prevented from making that defense. If she stood in that position, she might invoke the aid of a court of equity.

From the foregoing it follows that the decree in the divorce case, rendered on October 28, 1903, in Richmond superior court, is a valid decree, binding upon both parties thereto. Nothing alleged in the petition will enable the plaintiff to have that decree canceled. If, therefore, a wrong was committed upon her by the several defendants named therein, it must be held that her lack of knowledge of all the matters and things of which she now complains, and her failure to defend the suit, were due to negligence; and she cannot now, after the lapse of 14 years, maintain the present suit, either for cancellation of the decree or for recovery of damages for the alleged tort. The demurrers to the petition were properly sustained, in our opinion, for the reasons stated.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(23 Ga. App. 390)

FORREST & GEORGE ADAIR v. SMITH.
(No. 9748.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 16, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BROKERS ⇨71—LEASE CONTRACT—CONDITIONS.

Where a renting agent, acting for the owner of the property, enters into a contract of lease with a tenant, it is not competent to ingraft on the terms of the agreement stipulations relating to the mutual obligations arising out of the contract between the agent and the owner, so as to bind the latter thereby, since stipulations of this character are foreign to the subject-matter of the lease contract, and do not concern the parties to that agreement.

2. BROKERS ⇨71—LEASED PROPERTY—INDORSEMENT BY OWNER.

But where, at the instance of the agent and without the practice of any fraud upon his part, the owner of the property, with actual knowledge of the terms and provisions thus contained, enters his own indorsement upon the contract of lease as signed by the agent and by him presented to the owner for approval, then the stipulations referred to become mutually binding upon both the agent and the owner as an agreement thus arrived at by and between them.

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⇨81(4)—LEASE CONTRACTS—RIGHTS OF PRINCIPAL—NOTICE.

Where an agent who occupies such a confidential or fiduciary relationship to his employer presents to the latter for approval such a contract, which he has made on behalf of his employer with a third person, and which relates to the business and purposes of his employment, but which also contains a stipulation foreign to the subject-matter of the lease, concerning and affecting the rights and interests of the employer and the agent as to matters arising out of the contract, before the employer will be bound to his agent by virtue of his approval of the stipulations thus embraced in the writing, it is essential that he should have had actual knowledge that such provisions were therein contained.

4. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⇨84—REVOCATION OF AGENCY—POWER CORROBORATED WITH INTEREST.

"Generally, an agency is revocable at the will of the principal. The appointment of a new agent for the performance of the same act, or the death of either principal or agent, revokes the power. If, however, the power is coupled with an interest in the agent himself, it is not revocable at will; and in all cases the agent may recover from the principal, for an unreasonable revocation, any damages he may have suffered by reason thereof." Civ. Code 1910, § 3575(1). The interest of the agent, above referred to, must lie in the subject-matter of the agency, and not merely in the profits which are to result from the exercise of the power; that is to say, in a case like the instant one, the agent must have an interest in the contract of rental, and not merely in the contract of agency by virtue of which he is to be compensated for his future services in the collection of the rents. The work and expense of an authorized agent in finding a tenant and securing a lease could be taken as sufficient to establish such an interest in the contract of rental.

5. ASSIGNMENTS ⇐18, 19—CHOSES IN ACTION—STATUTE.

While, as a general proposition, all choses in action arising upon contract and involving property rights may be assigned so as to vest title in the assignee (Civil Code of 1910, §§ 3653, 3654), there is a well-recognized exception to this rule, which applies in those instances where the contract involves a relation of personal confidence, such as to show that the party conferring the rights must necessarily have intended them to be exercised only by him upon whom they are actually conferred. Tifton, etc., Ry. Co. v. Bedgood, 116 Ga. 945, 43 S. E. 257; Cowart v. Singletary, 140 Ga. 435, 446, 79 S. E. 196, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 621, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1116; 5 C. J. 880, §§ 46, 47. But even though the subject-matter of a contract might of itself in a sense indicate that it is intended to be personal in its nature, the parties thereto can nevertheless, by the express terms of the agreement, manifest a different purpose and intent (5 C. J. 875); and thus, where the contract is within itself and by its own express terms made assignable, a contrary purpose will not, as a matter of law, be set up and enforced, unless from a consideration of the entire instrument such a contrary construction is clearly demanded. Where the agreement in fact provides that the service may be performed either by the contracting party himself, or by such other person as the contract may be assigned to, in order that a construction contrary to such expressed intent can be inferred as a matter of law, it must appear from the nature of the contract that the performance of the obligation by another would be essentially different in result from what had been contracted for.

6. ASSIGNMENTS ⇐90 — LEASE CONTRACT — DUTY OF ASSIGNEE.

Where a rent contract, after having been procured and effected at the trouble and expense of an agent, has been approved for him by the owner, with actual knowledge on the owner's part of a stipulation therein providing that a stated commission from the rent shall go from him to the agent, and stating that the rent shall be paid to the agent named, "its successors or assigns," an assignee of the contract, upon his acceptance thereof, will ordinarily assume the burdens and acquire the benefits provided for by the terms of the agreement. See Alden v. Frank Improvement Co., 57 Neb. 67, 69, 77 N. W. 369.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Suit by Forrest & George Adair against L. A. Smith, executor. Judgment for plaintiffs, and, from a judgment sustaining a certiorari and rendering final judgment for defendant, plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Forrest & George Adair, real estate and renting agents, sued Jasper N. Smith for certain commissions claimed to be owing to them. Charles P. Glover Realty Company, as the agent of Smith, prepared and executed a lease of a building owned by him to Marbut & Young, for a period of five years, at a monthly rental of $50; which lease was signed "Chas. P. Glover Realty Company, Agent, by Eugene S. Kelly, Vice President," and by the lessees. Thereafter the lease was presented by the Chas. P. Glover Realty Company to Smith for approval, and he made thereon the following entry: "Approved, Jasper N. Smith." The pleadings of the defendant allege, and the evidence in support thereof indicate, that Smith, by reason of his age and infirmity, was unable to read over the contract; but the evidence for the plaintiffs authorized the municipal judge, who upon the trial sat as both judge and jury, to find that the defendant actually knew, when he approved the agreement, that the following stipulation was contained therein, "It is agreed by all parties hereto that the above-stipulated rental shall be paid to Chas. P. Glover Realty Company, agent, its successors or assigns, and Chas. P. Glover Realty Company is to receive a commission of five per cent. of said rental for the time specified in this contract, the same to be paid by the owner," although the defendant himself testified that he had not authorized Glover Realty Company to make a lease containing any such clause, and did not know it was in it, and relied on the company to prepare a proper lease, and signed it without reading it. The defendant testified:

"Glover Realty Company had my business because Mr. Aycock was a stockholder and manager of their rent department, and was attending to my business."

Aycock swore that the defendant let him put it in the hands of Glover Realty Company because the defendant liked Aycock, and had paid him to attend to his business, and Aycock was manager of the rent department, and the defendant thought he would look after it properly. Glover Realty Company in writing, "for value received," transferred and assigned to the plaintiffs, Forrest & George Adair, "their heirs, successors, or assigns, any and all rights the said Chas. P. Glover Realty Company now has, or may hereafter have to receive a commission of five (5) per cent. of the rentals agreed to be paid as specified in the attached contract of lease dated November 1, 1915, between Chas. P. Glover Realty Company, as agent for Jasper N. Smith as lessor and G. F. Marbut and R. G. Young as lessees together with any and all rights the said Chas. P. Glover Realty Company now has or may hereafter have to have the stipulated rentals provided for in said attached contract paid to it, and together with all right, title, interest, claim, or demand that said Chas. P. Glover now has or may hereafter have or acquire against the said Jasper N. Smith, or the said G. F. Marbut, or the said R. G. Young, under or by virtue of any of the terms, conditions, or agreements of the said attached contract of lease." Forrest & George Adair gave Smith written notice of the assignment, and that they asserted a right to collect the rentals and receive the commission; and they gave the tenants written notice of the assignment, and demanded that the rentals be paid only to them. Smith told the plaintiffs that Aycock was attending to his business, and that he (Smith) had a perfect right to do as he pleased, and that, while he had no objections to the Adairs, he had not employed them, and for this reason he repudiated the assignment of the contract. After the assignment the defendant first placed the business with another firm, who collected the rents and received the commissions, and this arrangement continued until Aycock went into the renting business for himself, after which the rents were collected by him, and he in turn received the commissions.

The case was tried before one of the judges of the municipal court of Atlanta. The defendant defended on the grounds hereinafter stated. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and the defendant sued out certiorari upon the following grounds: (a) Said judgment is contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it, and is therefore contrary to law. (b) Said judgment is contrary to the weight of the evidence and is therefore contrary to law. (c) Because the evidence showed that petitioner had revoked the agency of Glover Realty Company, and said agency was revocable under the law. (d) Because the agency given to Glover Realty Company was not coupled with any interest in the subject-matter of the agency, and was therefore revocable under the law. (e) The evidence showed that petitioner desired the special and peculiar services of Glover Realty Company, because Mr. C. G. Aycock was a stockholder in said company, and manager of its rent department, and the agency was given to Glover Realty Company on that account, and the authority of that company could not be delegated to its assigns without his permission and consent, which he had never given. (f) Because Glover Realty Company could not legally turn over the collection and custody of his rents to any one except such person as he might himself designate. (g) Because contract rights coupled with liabilities or involving a relation of personal confidence between the parties cannot be transferred to a third person by one of the parties to the contract, without the assent of the other. (h) Because the clause in the lease contract on which the plaintiffs relied did not state that any commission should be paid to any one except Glover Realty Company; and did not make it payable to their assigns. (i) Because the mere use of the word "assigns," in the part of said clause relating to collection of rents, did not make the contract assignable when it called for personal service. (j) Because a right of action is not assignable if it does not involve, directly or indirectly, a right of property. (k) Because Glover Realty Company had no property right or interest in petitioner's property or rents, and that a right to commission is not an interest in the property. (l) Because the clause quoted in paragraph 4 of plaintiff's petition was not a contract between Jasper N. Smith and Glover Realty Company, but was only inserted in a contract between Jasper N. Smith (acting through his agent Glover Realty Company) and Marbut & Young. (m) Because petitioner's agent, Glover Realty Company, was not authorized to make lease contracts with tenants containing any such clause as that quoted in paragraph 4 of plaintiff's petition. The duty of Glover Realty Company was to act in behalf of petitioner's interest and not to enter into contracts with tenants for the benefit of said agent and sacrificing the interests of said agent's employer. (n) Because there was no consideration moving from Glover Realty Company to petitioner, or from Marbut & Young to Glover Realty Company, or to petitioner, or from or to any other person, for any contract of petitioner to turn over the right to collect his rents to any person to whom Glover Realty Company might assign its alleged rights without petitioner's consent. (o) Said Adairs did not assume and could not have been compelled to perform the duties of Glover Realty Company, unto petitioner, or to bear any liabilities unto petitioner on account of said assignment. (p) Because the said clause was void for lack of mutuality and want of consideration. (q) Because the commissions sued for were, at the time of said assignment, a mere possibility of having a future commission, which could not be legally sold or assigned.

The superior court sustained the certiorari and rendered final judgment in favor of the defendant. The plaintiffs except to the judgment of the superior court, and assign error thereon upon the ground that it is contrary to law, contrary to evidence, and without evidence to support it.

A. A. & E. L. Meyer, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

E. M. & G. T. Mitchell, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-8] Something may properly be said in elaboration of the last two divisions of the syllabus. The clause in the lease agreement making the rent payable either to the Glover Realty Company or to its successors or assigns cannot be construed, as was done in Swarts v. Narragansett Electric Lighting Co., 28 R. I. 436, 59 Atl. 111, as words merely descriptive of the persons who might take an interest in or incur a liability under the contract, but must be taken as affecting the terms of the contract itself. Here the words as plainly employed designate the person or persons who shall "execute" the contract, and are not intended to be merely descriptive personæ, and to pertain only to who might acquire a right or incur a liability thereunder. See, also, Schlessinger v. Forest Products Co., 78 N. J. Law, 637, 76 Atl. 1024, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 347, 138 Am. St. Rep. 627. But while in the proper construction of a contract which might otherwise be taken as having been intended to be personal in its nature and therefore nonassignable, heed must thus be given to the actual and different intent as evidenced by the language used; still we do not mean to say that even the actual incorporation of general words of assignment must always and necessarily show that the real intent of the agreement was not to procure the benefit of a personal and peculiar service. As was stated by the late Justice Lumpkin in Cowart v. Singleary, cited in the syllabus:

"Certain classes of contracts are inherently nonassignable in their character, such as promises to marry, or engagements for personal services, requiring skill, science, or peculiar qualifications."

As an example of an engagement calling for such special, personal, and peculiar skill or qualifications, Chief Justice Stiness, of the Supreme Court of Rhode Island, in Swarts v. Narragansett Electric Lighting Co., supra, instances an agreement whereby one obligates himself to paint a portrait for another. In such a case, even were the word "assigns" added to the name of the party upon whom the obligation itself is imposed, it still could not be thought or held that the mere addition of such word could reasonably manifest an intention to render assignable a contract which in its very nature was inherently personal and utterly incapable of thus being made so. While it might be truly said that the services involved in the instant case call for the exercise of integrity and ordinary business capacity (and the same might be said as to almost any engagement), still it cannot be contended that they involve the exercise of any special and peculiar talent, or that their performance by another would be essentially different in result from what had been contracted for. When the assignee of the contract collects the rent and turns it over to the owner, the service is precisely and in all respects the same as if the work had been accomplished by the original agent. Here, as always, it is the intent of the parties, as shown by the contract, which at last must govern; and while it might be altogether reasonable to suppose that an owner might desire some particular person for some particular reason, to execute such a service, still there is no reason why the law would forbid or prevent his making a contrary agreement authorizing the agent to assign the contract of service to another; and, where the contract as made plainly expresses such a purpose, it should be considered that he intended to do that which he actually did, unless it be that the work provided for, if performed by another, would be essentially different from what has been contracted for. The question has not been an altogether easy one to decide, since all of the arguments, both in justice and under the law, do not seem unmistakably to point the same way. But under our view of the law, when the contract as agreed upon by the owner made the rent payable either to Glover Realty Company or to such other person as the contract might be assigned to, the owner (so far as his liability for commissions is concerned) lost the power to select for the service one of his own particular and peculiar choice, even though it be granted that the service might, in a sense, otherwise and ordinarily be properly considered as personal in its nature. It might well be said that the agent's power of assignment would not authorize him to require the owner to accept in his stead the services of one who was dishonest, or one who was incompetent to perform even such an ordinary task; but no such question as this is made by the record, and the defendant in fact has made specific disclaimer of any such ground of defense.

It is our opinion that the judge of the superior court erred in sustaining the certiorari and rendering final judgment in favor of the defendant.

Judgment reversed.

WITHERINGTON v. LAURENS COUNTY FARMERS' CO-OP. WAREHOUSE CO.
(No. 9912.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 16, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. BAILMENT §27—WAREHOUSEMEN §25(8)
—EXCUSES FOR DELIVERY—ADVERSE TITLE
—LEGAL PROCESS.

While the general rule is that a warehouseman, as a depository for hire, will not be allowed to set up an adverse title in another as an excuse for his failure to deliver the property to his bailor on demand, and while it is incumbent upon the warehouseman to show the exercise of ordinary diligence, where such failure to deliver has been shown, still it is a general rule that a bailee, in an action against him by the bailor for the recovery of property deposited with him, may set up as a good defense that the property was taken from him upon legal process fair on its face; provided that the bailee did not fail in any duty in connection therewith which he properly owed to his bailor, and that the bailor, if not a party to that proceeding, had been given full and ample notice thereof. Thus, in an action by a bailor against his bailee, where the bailee shows that a suit for the property had been instituted by another, and that he had promptly notified his bailor of the institution of such action, and was proceeding to defend therein the right and claim of his bailor to the property, the fact that he then proceeded, with the knowledge of his bailor, to surrender the property to the levying officer, in accordance with one of his options under the law in such cases, would not amount to a conversion on his part such as to render him liable in an action of trover instituted by his bailor, but his course and conduct as outlined would be sufficient to support a finding in the bailee's favor that he had exercised the degree of ordinary diligence required of him. See Jensen v. Eagle Ore Co. (47 Colo. 306, 107 Pac. 259), as reported in 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 681, 19 Ann. Cas. 519, together with the general note upon the subject thereto appended; *Smith v. 2. ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The admission of the testimony complained of in the second ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial was harmless, and the remaining grounds of the motion are without substantial merit.

Error from City Court of Dublin; T. M. Hightower, Judge.

Trover by J. H. Witherington against the Laurens County Farmers' Co-operative Warehouse Company. Judgment for defendant and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Larsen & Crockett, of Dublin, for plaintiff in error.

R. Earl Camp, of Dublin, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, J. Witherington bought of Hodges two bales of cotton and stored them for hire with the defendant warehouse company. Subsequent to such storage, the warehouse company was sued in trover for the cotton by Summerlin, who claimed to be the true owner and entitled to the possession thereof by reason of the relationship of landlord and cropper existing between himself and Hodges, from whom Witherington had purchased the cotton. Upon the institution by Summerlin of this proceeding in trover against the warehouse company, the latter notified Witherington thereof, and, in the presence of Witherington, surrendered possession of the cotton to the sheriff, after which it was proceeding to defend the interests of Witherington in the action brought by Summerlin. While this proceeding of Summerlin's was still pending, Witherington made demand upon the warehouse company for the cotton, and, upon its failure to deliver same, brought the present action in trover against it.

Judgment affirmed.

SHORES-MUELLER CO. v. FITZPATRICK et al. (No. 9765.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 15, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. PLEADING §194(1), 259—DEMURRER TO ANSWER—GROUNDS—AMENDMENT TO PLEA.

The demurrer to the seventh paragraph of the original answer, which paragraph claimed a credit for certain boxes therein alleged to have been charged but not received, should have been sustained, as the account attached to the contract sued upon included no such item. The court likewise erred in allowing an amendment to the plea which set up a parol agreement at variance with the written contract sued upon, since the amendment failed to allege explicitly that the additional agreement was either in writing or made after the execution of the written contract.

2. NEW TRIAL §68—GROUNDS—VERDICT CONTRARY TO EVIDENCE.

The evidence failed to show that certain credits allowed by the jury by virtue of an alleged agreement between the purchaser of the goods and one who was described as a "representative" of the plaintiff were authorized, in view of the total lack of any testimony tending to show that the alleged representative had authority to modify the written contract or make the alleged agreements. The verdict returned necessarily depended upon the allowance of these credits and was therefore unauthorized, and the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

8. OTHER QUESTIONS.

In the light of the rulings made, it is unnecessary to pass upon the remaining questions raised by the record.

Error from Superior Court, Warren County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Suit by the Shores-Mueller Company against C. R. Fitzpatrick and others. Demurrer to paragraph of original plea overruled, motion for new trial overruled, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

L. D. McGregor, of Warrenton, for plaintiff in error.

M. L. Felts, of Warrenton, for defendant in error.

WADE, C. J. [1] 1. Suit was brought against Fitzpatrick and English upon a guaranty entered into by them in behalf of one Norris for the faithful performance of a contract touching the sale of merchandise and a proper accounting therefor. The petition alleged that the balance due on said contract amounted to $805.49 principal, and the itemized statement attached thereto as an exhibit included divers and sundry articles and things, but nowhere referred to or mentioned as an item of charge against the purchaser any boxes whatsoever. The original plea of the defendant alleged in the seventh paragraph thereof that—

"Said W. J. Norris is charged with 297 oak special boxes by plaintiff, and said boxes were not received, and should be credited on the account of said Norris."

Subsequently there was an additional allegation, made in an amendment to the plea, with reference to the said 297 boxes, as follows:

"That at the time W. J. Norris accepted the goods purchased from Shores-Mueller Company said plaintiffs agreed to allow him to return all boxes in which goods were shipped and to give him credit for same at twenty-five cents each. Subsequently thereto and in the fall of 1914, said W. J. Norris undertook to get the said plaintiff to accept a return of said boxes for credit, and whereupon the plaintiffs refused to accept same. That said Norris held said boxes and still holds them for credit on his said account and defendants should be allowed a credit for the value of said boxes in the sum of $74.25."

Paragraph 7 of the original plea was demurred to upon the ground that the plaintiff was not attempting to recover of the defendants any amount whatsoever for 297 oak special boxes, as alleged in that paragraph, and therefore said paragraph should be stricken. The court overruled this demurrer, and, in so doing, erred. The amendment to the answer claiming credit for the boxes, under an agreement made by the plaintiff company at the time that Norris "accepted the goods," was likewise demurred to, upon the ground that this amendment sought to vary the terms of the written contract sued upon by setting up a parol agreement in conflict therewith, and furthermore was deficient in that it failed to definitely allege the number of boxes which the defendants claimed Norris had offered to return to the plaintiff company. The last objection we think is without merit, since the amendment expressly alleged that Norris had offered to return boxes aggregating in value $74.25 at the agreed price of 25 cents per box, from which by easy calculation it could be determined how many boxes were included in his offer. We think, however, the amendment was subject to the objection that it sought to vary the terms of the written contract by setting up a parol contemporaneous agreement. While it is not alleged explicitly that this agreement by the plaintiff company, to allow the return of all boxes in which goods were shipped and give credit therefor at 25 cents each, was made at or before the time the written contract was executed, and in fact the allegation is that this agreement was made "at the time W. J. Norris accepted the goods purchased" from the plaintiff, nevertheless it is not clearly averred that the agreement in reference to the return of the boxes was made "subsequently" to the execution of the contract, nor is it averred that this agreement, whether made contemporaneously or subsequently, was in writing; and, the burden being upon the defendants, who did not deny the existence and validity of the contract forming the basis of the suit, to set up a legal and sufficient reason for any modification thereof (under the familiar rule that pleadings are to be construed most strongly against the pleader), we must interpret the allegations as made in the amendment to mean that the agreement was in parol and was made "at the time" the contract was signed, when constructively at least the goods were "accepted" by Norris. The validity of the contract could not be attacked by inference merely. The court therefore erred in overruling the demurrer to this amendment.

[2] 2. Aside from other particulars in which the evidence submitted in behalf of the defendant is somewhat unsatisfactory, it is enough to say on the general grounds of the motion that the verdict returned was necessarily arrived at by the allowance of certain credits claimed by Norris for alleged overcharges, freights, and breakage, by virtue of an understanding or compromise agreement which he testified was made and entered into between him and "a representative" of the plaintiff company, who came to see him in reference to his indebtedness to the plaintiff and canvassed with him matters in dispute. There was positive proof in behalf of the plaintiff company that—

No "agent, representative, officer, member or any one else authorized to act for Shores-Mueller Company ever orally or in any [way] except by written statement or instrument entered into any contract or agreement with W. J. Norris or either of the defendants C. R. Fitzpatrick or W. E. English, and no one was ever authorized to have any oral conversation with said W. J. Norris, C. R. Fitzpatrick or W. E. English prior to the time that the demand was made upon them for the payment of the balance due the Shores-Mueller Company."

Norris testified as to a definite agreement between himself and a representative of the plaintiff company, whose name he did not remember, as to the amount of claims for breakage, etc., to be allowed; but no testimony was presented to show that this representative (if indeed he was in fact a representative of the plaintiff company) ever presented any credentials whatsoever to establish his authority to even collect from Norris, and there is an entire absence of testimony showing authority on his part to make deductions or allowances or any agreements which might have the effect of modifying the written contract, and no evidence showing or tending to show that the alleged agreements had with this representative were ever in fact ratified thereafter by the plaintiff company. It is clear therefore that the verdict was not authorized by the evidence, for at least some of the items, deducted by the jury from the total claim of the plaintiff company, were not established by proof as proper credits on the account.

It is true that there was testimony from Norris to the effect that he had received a letter from the plaintiff company which had been lost or destroyed, in which they offered in reference "to the boxes * * * to take them back at certain amount," which "amount" he had forgotten, but which he testified made due the sum "set out here," and further that, when he had a sufficient amount of boxes to make a shipment to the plaintiff, the plaintiff declined to take them, and he had some of these boxes yet. This testimony, while apparently tending to establish that the alleged agreement to accept the return of certain boxes was made subsequently to the execution of the written contract and was likewise a written agreement, does not make it appear how many boxes the plaintiff company so agreed to accept, or even the price (except by inference) to be paid therefor. While the evidence was not apparently objected to, and was therefore before the jury for what it may have been worth, considering its indefinite character, this fact does not remove the error committed by the trial judge in overruling the demurrer to the answer which failed to show precisely whether the agreement pleaded touching the return of the boxes was in writing or in parol and was made before, at the time, or subsequent to the execution of the contract.

[3] For the reasons above suggested, we think the trial judge erred in overruling the demurrers to the answer and the amended answer of the defendants, and likewise in thereafter overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

ORUMLEY v. STATE. (No. 10104.)

Jan. 23, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW §1156(3)—APPEAL—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

"The state having made a counter showing to the alleged newly discovered evidence, this court cannot say that the trial judge abused his discretion in overruling the grounds of the motion for a new trial based on such evidence." Champion v. State, 21 Ga. App. 656, 94 S. E. 828 (4); Cohen Co. v. Brown, 21 Ga. App. 668, 94 S. E. 811; Blount v. State, 18 Ga. App. 204, 89 S. E. 78 (4); Hayes v. State, 16 Ga. App. 334, 85 S. E. 253 (1); Fouraker v. State, 4 Ga. App. 692, 62 S. E. 116 (1); Bradford v. Brand, 132 Ga. 642, 64 S. E. 688.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §366(4)—EVIDENCE—RES GESTE.

Complaint is made that the only eyewitness to the difficulty which resulted in the homicide was allowed to testify that after the shooting "Mr. Crumley turned and left and went back across the bridge, the other way from where the shooting was done. I went down there then to where Mr. Fitzgerald was. He didn't get up; he still lay right there. When I was looking at the place where he was shot, Mr. Fitzgerald told me that he was shot bad, that he was killed, and he told me to go and get him some water, and I went and got him a hat of water and gave it to him, and he taken a bad spell of throwing up, and after that it seemed like he revived up a little from what he was. When I was talking to Mr. Fitzgerald about I hoped he would be all right, he says, 'No, he has killed me,' and he says, 'You know he has killed me for nothing,' said, 'when I was trying to get that gun away from him.'" It appears from the evidence in the record that at the time of the shooting the witness was about 25 feet from the participants; that the shooting occurred on the road near a bridge over a creek where there is a "fill"; that after the last shot the deceased fell and rolled down the embankment, and then occurred what is quoted above. It is true that the evidence does not show in minutes how long after the shooting the words complained of were uttered, but it does appear that it was almost immediately thereafter, and made while the witness was examining the wound of deceased, and the statements of deceased, of which complaint is made, seem to have been "natural and spontaneous," a part of the transaction, "free from all suspicion of device or afterthought," "an outburst of the feelings, and not a mere narration of a past event." In the decision in the case of Louisville, etc., Ry. Co. v. Buck, 116 Ind. 566, 19 N. E. 453, 2 L. R. A. 520, 9 Am. St. Rep. 883, it is said: "It is not always easy to determine when declarations having relation to an act or transaction should be received as part of the res gestæ, and much difficulty has been experienced in the effort to formulate general rules applicable to the subject. This much may, however, be safely said, that declarations which were the natural emanations or outgrowths of the act or occurrence in litigation, although not precisely concurrent in point of time, if they were yet voluntarily and spontaneously made so nearly contemporaneous as to be in the presence of the transaction which they illustrate and explain, and were made under such circumstances as necessarily to exclude the idea of design or deliberation, must, upon the clearest principles of justice, be admissible as part of the act or transaction itself." To support this proposition a large number of cases are cited. The courts of final resort in a number of states have held that "a condition of severe bodily injury, unmitigated by medical or other attendance, makes it probable that a statement made while this condition continues is spontaneous." We therefore hold that the court did not err in allowing in evidence, as a part of the res gestæ the statements of the deceased, of which complaint is made, especially under the charge of the court in reference thereto. "When the precise time which intervened between the homicide and the statements cannot be ascertained, it may be left to the jury to determine whether they were made without premeditation or artifice, and without a view to the consequences, or were merely made to color the transaction." Hart v. Powell, 18 Ga. 636. That decision was followed and cited in City of Galveston v. Barbour, 62 Tex. 172, 50 Am. Rep. 519.

3. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨741(1)—STATEMENTS OF DECEASED—WEIGHT.

The statements of the deceased having been properly admitted in evidence, the weight to be given them is a matter for determination by the jury, and there was no error harmful to the defendant in the excerpt from the charge complained of in the sixth ground of the motion for a new trial.

DAVIS v. CITY OF ROME. (No. 9673.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. Jan. 14, 1919. Rehearing Denied Jan. 23, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COURTS ⇨488(1) — SUPREME COURT'S TRANSFER OF CAUSE—EFFECT.

The writ of error in this case having been originally filed in the Supreme Court, and that court having by formal order transferred it to this court, the transfer of the case is equivalent to a holding by the Supreme Court that the constitutional questions which the plaintiff in error attempts to raise by the writ are not properly made.

2. JUDGMENT ⇨476—COLLATERAL ATTACK—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

Under the ruling made by the Supreme Court in Marks v. Rome, 145 Ga. 399, 89 S. E. 324 (2), the charter for that municipality establishes a recorder's court. Furthermore, if one in point of fact has been tried, convicted, and sentenced by the municipal authorities sitting as a recorder's court, and the defendant at time of the trial raised no objection as to the competency of the tribunal sitting as such, and entered no exception to the judgment thus rendered, he cannot, in an action subsequently brought against the city for the fine paid and the value of the services rendered under the sentence imposed, and for the alleged tortious and illegal acts of the subordinate municipal officers, done while he was in their custody, collaterally attack the competency of the court rendering judgment against him. Mayor, etc., of Brunswick v. Sims, 14 Ga. App. 315, 80 S. E. 730. See, also, Bartlett v. Columbus, 101 Ga. 300, 28 S. E. 599, 44 L. R. A. 795.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⇨724, 731, 754 —GOVERNMENTAL FUNCTIONS—LIABILITY.

In so far as the petition shows, the alleged tortious acts complained of relate solely to the conduct of the city's subordinate officials done in the illegal performance of its governmental functions, and do not in any wise relate to any act done in connection with the corporate affairs of the municipality. For acts done in the performance of purely governmental functions, however illegally the authority may be exercised, the municipality is not liable. Thus, even though the sentence as imposed by the recorder might have been wholly void, and although the alleged acts of the warden might have been both tortious and illegal, the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer interposed by the defendant municipality. Attaway v. Cartersville, 68 Ga. 740; Gray v. Griffin, 111 Ga. 361, 368, 36 S. E. 792, 51 L. R. A. 131; Doster v. Atlanta, 72 Ga. 233; Hammond v. County of Richmond, 72 Ga. 188; Bartlett v. Columbus, 101 Ga. 300, 28 S. E. 599, 44 L. R. A. 795; Gillmor v. Salt Lake City, 32 Utah, 180, 89 Pac. 714, and notes in 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 537, 13 Ann. Cas. 1016, 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 1193, 1194. Nor can a municipality ratify the unlawful acts of its subordinate officials done in pursuance of its governmental functions, so as thereby to make itself liable for such acts. *Calwell v. ATLANTA OIL & FERTILIZER CO. v.

PHOSPHATE MINING CO.
(No. 9865.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 29, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1213—FORMER RECORD—ISSUES OF FACT—NONSUIT.

It was held when this case was formerly before this court (Phosphate Mining Co. v. Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Co., 20 Ga. App. 660, 93 S. E. 532) that certain issues of fact were presented by the record then under consideration which should be submitted to a jury for determination at a subsequent trial under the second count of the petition. The entire former record having been introduced in evidence at the trial now under review, notwithstanding there was other and additional evidence, the same issues of fact necessarily remained for the jury, and the trial judge therefore erred in directing a verdict.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1195(1, 3)—LAW OF CASE—RULING ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—ISSUES.

The former decision of this court is the law of this case, and necessarily controlled the subsequent trial so far as the decision was applicable to the issues then presented by the pleadings and the evidence. In that decision it was expressly held that none of the questions there decided arose on the trial of the first count of plaintiff's petition, and the affirmance of the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial on this count therefore did not operate to determine or foreclose the issues presented by the second count, which were thus expressly excepted.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Suit by the Phosphate Mining Company against the Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Company. Trial on second count of petition, and directed verdict for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

D. W. Blair, of Marietta, and King & Spalding, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Evins & Moore and Jones & Chambers, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

WADE, C. J. The Phosphate Mining Company brought suit against the Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Company, alleging the breach of a contract in which the plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendant to buy certain phosphate rock to be delivered to the defendant f. o. b. at the mines of the plaintiff in the state of Florida, for an agreed price of $3.50 per ton, of 2,240 pounds, at times and in quantities specified, to wit, 1,000 tons during the year 1909, 6,000 tons during the year 1910, and 6,500 tons during the years 1911, 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, and 1916. Certain amounts of the rock contracted for were delivered to the defendant in accordance with the terms of the sale agreement, and the first count in the petition alleges that in accordance with the contract the plaintiff was ready to deliver, and did in fact tender, to the Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Company during each of the months of June, July, August, and September, 1912, its monthly quota of 542 tons of phosphate rock as stipulated by the agreement, but that the defendant refused to receive the same or pay the contract price therefor. It is further alleged in this count that the contract price of said rock f. o. b. at the mines of the plaintiff in the state of Florida was $3.50 per long ton during the months of June, July, August, and September, 1912, and that the market price of said rock at the time and place of delivery during these months was $2.50 per long ton, wherefore the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1 per long ton, or $2,168 on the 2,168 tons tendered and refused during these months.

The second count of the petition alleges that September 25, 1912, the plaintiff received a written notice from the defendant to the effect that the defendant was unable to carry out the terms of the entire contract, and declined to give any shipping instructions in regard to the movement of any rock in the future, and that from time to time thereafter the defendant avowed its intention not to conform to the terms of said contract, and therefore breached the same in toto; that the Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Company renounced the contract in toto and breached the complete contract to the end of its term by reason of which breach the plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $27,626, as the difference between the cost of manufacturing and the contract price as set out in the contract would net to the plaintiff a profit of that amount if the plaintiff were allowed to fulfill and carry out the terms of said contract to its expiration. By amendment the month of April was substituted for June in the first count, and the amount claimed in the second count was changed to $41,439.

The case was tried on both counts at the January term of the superior court, 1916, and the trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff on the first count for $1,734.40, and on the second count for $1 only. A new trial was made by the plaintiff, and the same being overruled, the case came to this court on exceptions to the refusal of the plaintiff's motion for a new trial, and on July 26, 1917, this court rendered a judgment affirming the judgment of the lower court in part and reversing it in part on the main bill of exceptions, and affirming the judgment on the cross-bill of exceptions filed by the Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Company. The original judgment of this court simply reversed the judgment of the court below on the main bill of exceptions, but this judgment was, on motion of counsel for the plaintiff and by consent of counsel for the defendant, amended, as will appear from the judgments themselves, taken from the minutes of this court, to wit:

"Phosphate Mining Co. v. Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Co. This case came before this court upon a writ of error from the superior court of Fulton county; and, after argument had, it is considered and adjudged that the judgment of the court below be reversed because the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

"Wade, George, and Luke, JJ., concur."

The amended judgment was as follows:

"Phosphate Mining Company v. Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Company, and vice versa. Upon consideration of these cases after rehearing it is ordered that the judgments rendered therein on July 26, 1917, be hereby adhered to, except that the judgment on the main bill of exceptions is by consent of counsel affirmed in so far as the recovery had upon the first count of the declaration is concerned. It is further ordered that the entry of judgment on the main bill be hereby vacated, and that in lieu thereof the following be now entered:

"July 26, 1917. The following judgment was rendered: Phosphate Mining Company v. Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Company. This case came before this court upon a writ of error from the superior court of Fulton county; and, after argument had, it is considered and adjudged that the judgment of the court below be affirmed as to the recovery had upon the first count of the plaintiff's petition; and that it be reversed as to the second count because the court erred in refusing a new trial.

"Wade, George, and Luke, JJ., concur."

The application on which the original judgment was amended was as follows:

"Now comes the Phosphate Mining Company, plaintiff in error on the main bill of exceptions in the above case, and moves that the judgment of the court rendered herein on the 26th of July, 1917, be amended by the court directing that the judgment of the superior court of Fulton county on the first count of the plaintiff's petition in the court below be affirmed. This 15th day of August, 1917.

"[Signed] Evins & Moore,

"Attorneys for Movant.

"We consent to the foregoing.

"[Signed] King & Spalding,

"Attorneys for Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Co."

This application was duly filed in office on August 17, 1917, and was made a part of the record in the case.

The case was accordingly sent back for a new trial on the second count of the petition, and was again tried on April 8, 1918, during the March term of Fulton superior court. At that trial the entire record of the case, including the brief of the evidence adduced at the former trial, was introduced, besides other testimony tending to show the market value of phosphate rock at the various times when under the contract between the parties the defendant had bound itself to receive and pay for certain specified amounts—this last testimony being positive and undisputed, as the term covered by the contract had expired before this trial, and the testimony as to market value on the various dates was no longer opinion evidence merely. At the conclusion of the entire evidence the court on motion directed a verdict in behalf of the plaintiff, for $39,060.39, over the objection of the defendant, the defendant insisting that the court had no right to withdraw the case from the jury, but that the issues of fact therein should be submitted to the jury for determination, and that the court had not the right to assess the damages, and that the amount claimed as damages was not correct. The defendant excepted to the direction of the verdict, upon the ground that under the facts of the case and the decision of the Court of Appeals therein (20 Ga. App. 660, 93 S. E. 532), the case should have been submitted to the jury upon the several issues raised by the pleadings, as, under the evidence in the case, issues were presented for determination by the jury, and that the court erred also in fixing the amount of damages, and in withdrawing that issue from the jury, and in holding that the testimony demanded a finding for $39,060.39, and in directing a verdict therefor. There were other assignments of error which need not be referred to or considered.

[1] When this case was formerly passed upon by this court (20 Ga. App. 660, 93 S. E. 532), the opinion delivered in behalf of the court by George, J., made the following explicit and distinct ruling:

"While one who repudiates an executory contract before the time of performance has arrived cannot call upon the opposite party to make forward contracts for his benefit, for the purpose of lessening the damages of the party at fault, nevertheless, if the opposite party accepts the tender of the breach, he is bound to abate his damages by reason of circumstances of which he ought reasonably to have availed himself. Rhoem v. Horst, supra [178 U. S. 1, 20 Sup. Ct. 780, 44 L. Ed. 953]; Civil Code 1910, § 4398. The tender of an anticipatory breach does not change the time at which the damages are to be estimated, nor affect the general rule of damages; but if the tender is accepted by the opposite party, that party acts thereafter under the rule of avoidable consequences. * * * While the fact that the buyer of fertilizer material had sold its factory and discontinued its business, which fact was communicated to the seller, raised no legal obligation on the part of the seller to consent to a rescission of the contract, or to accept the buyer's transfer of the contract to its successor, yet, under the circumstances appearing in the present record, and in view of the special provisions of the contract, it was for the jury to decide whether the seller had in fact consented to the transfer of the contract."

It will be observed therefrom that this court indicated that one of the issues of fact for determination in the case was whether or not if in fact the Phosphate Mining Company accepted the tender of the breach of the contract by the Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Company, the first-named company had properly complied with its obligation to abate the damages by reason of circumstances of which it ought reasonably to have availed itself. In other words and in simple plain English, did the Phosphate Company, after acceptance of the tender of the anticipatory breach of the contract, make the proper legal effort to lessen or mitigate the damages which might be expected to flow to it from the breach of the contract? The decision held that under the circumstances appearing in the record then before the court, "and in view of the special provisions of the contract," an issue of fact was created for decision by the jury as to whether or not the seller had in fact consented to the transfer of the contract from the Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Company to another corporation. It is clear, from a reference to the record of the former trial, that the court, in referring to "circumstances appearing in the present record," meant such circumstances as might tend to support a finding that the Phosphate Company had impliedly or otherwise consented to the transfer of the contract. In the eleventh division of the former decision this court again made clear its ruling that certain issues were involved in the second count of the plaintiff's petition which should be submitted at the next trial to a jury, the following language being used:

"The errors complained of in the cross-bill of exceptions will not require a reversal of the judgment, but since the issues involved in the second count of the plaintiff's petition are to be again submitted to a jury, instructions appropriate to the facts appearing in the record, and not inconsistent with the rulings made in the seventh and eighth divisions of this decision, should be given to the jury."

Obviously, then, under the distinct ruling of this court now under discussion which became the law of this case equally binding upon this court and the trial court wherever applicable, the trial judge was required to submit to the jury for determination certain questions of fact, and consequently it was error on his part to disregard these instructions and direct a verdict.

[2] It is insisted by the defendant in error that the court did not err in directing a verdict, since the last trial occurred after the expiration of the contract, and the undisputed evidence as to the market value of the commodity on the dates specified by the contract was no longer opinion evidence merely, but was definite and positive testimony as to actual facts, from which the court could make an exact computation; and that there was no error in directing a verdict for the further reason that notwithstanding the ruling in the seventh, eighth, and eleventh divisions of the former decision of this court in this case, to the effect that certain issues of fact should be submitted to the jury for determination at another trial of the second count of the petition, these issues were res adjudicata, because they must necessarily have been considered and passed upon by the jury in arriving at a verdict in favor of the plaintiff on the first count of the petition, and the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial on the first count had been affirmed by this court. The entire record of the former trial was introduced in evidence at the trial now under review, in order to establish the fact that all the issues, except merely the value of the commodity at the various times named in the contract, had been adjudicated by the verdict on the first count and the opinion of this court and the affirmance of the judgment sustaining that verdict. It is unnecessary to examine the record of the previous trial in connection with the verdict returned on the first count of the petition, and in connection with the judgment of this court sustaining the verdict on that count, in order now to determine whether at the last trial the judge could correctly hold as an original proposition from an inspection of the entire previous record that the issues raised under the second count had been necessarily involved also in the determination by the jury of the respective rights of the parties under the first count. This court has expressly determined judicially that—

"None of the questions discussed in the foregoing divisions of this decision [which include the questions referred to in the seventh, eighth, and eleventh divisions of the decision] arose on the trial of the first count."

In other words, whether right or wrong, and whether an inspection of the record might or might not support the view that the identical issues referred to in the seventh, eighth, and eleventh divisions of the former decision were in fact involved in the trial of the first count of the plaintiff's petition, it has been definitely decided, and that decision is irrevocably fixed, that these issues did not arise on the trial of the first count. Much might be said to support the view that in fact the questions which it is insisted were determined by the judgment affirming the verdict on the first count were not actually involved therein, considering the alleged date when the breach of the contract was tendered and all the facts, circumstances, implications, and deductions which might be determined from the entire record; but satis superque est, to repeat what has already been said, that the former judgment of this court is the law of the case, and this court has positively and definitely held that under the pleadings and the evidence at the former trial, the issues which the court then held should be submitted to a jury at another trial on the second count of the petition, did not arise or were not involved in the trial of the first count. The entire eleventh division of the former decision is as follows:

"The petition in the instant case contained two counts. On the first count, predicated on the theory that under the terms of the contract between the parties the defendant company failed and refused to receive and pay for a certain quantity of phosphate rock, which under the contract it had obligated itself to take, the plaintiff recovered a substantial verdict. On the second count, which was predicated upon an alleged anticipatory breach of the entire contract to the end of its term, the plaintiff recovered nominal damages only. None of the questions discussed in the foregoing divisions of this decision arose on the trial of the first count, and neither party is complaining in reference thereto. This court will, in its discretion, affirm the judgment of the court below refusing a new trial on the first count of the plaintiff's petition, and, on account of errors in rejecting evidence and in giving to the jury instructions not in accordance with the rulings announced in this decision, order a new trial only as to the issues involved in the second count. The errors complained of in the cross-bill of exceptions will not require a reversal of the judgment, but since the issues involved in the second count of the plaintiff's petition are to be again submitted to a jury, instructions appropriate to the facts appearing in the record, and not inconsistent with the rulings made in the seventh and eighth divisions of this decision, should be given to the jury."

Construing the entire opinion and the various paragraphs thereof in connection with each other, it is clearly evident that this court, in affirming the judgment refusing a new trial on the first count of the plaintiff's petition, based this affirmance on the consent of counsel for both parties, which appears in the foregoing statement of facts, and it is recited in that opinion that "neither party is complaining" of the verdict on the first count which was affirmed. Under the agreement of counsel, the language actually employed by this court in its former decision, and all the facts and circumstances of the case, it is obvious that the affirmance of the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial on the first count of the plaintiff's petition was without prejudice to the rights of either party touching the issues raised by the second count. The issues referred to in the seventh and eighth divisions of the former decision of this court have not, therefore, been adjudicated, so far as the second count of the petition is concerned, and under the former ruling of this court they should have been submitted to the jury for consideration, for while there was additional evidence offered at the last trial, the entire record of the first trial was in evidence, as has already been said; and since it has been determined by this court that the evidence adduced at the former trial raised certain issues for determination by the jury, it necessarily follows that these issues were again presented for solution by the jury when that identical evidence was presented, notwithstanding it was supplemented by other and further testimony.

We hold, therefore, that the trial judge erred in directing a verdict contrary to the direction given by this court in its former opinion. It is unnecessary to consider the remaining exceptions presented, or attempted to be presented, by the present record.

Judgment reversed.

The reasonable and necessary construction of the petition is that the proceeding was one to require the removal of an obstruction from a private way acquired by seven years' uninterrupted use through improved lands. Hopkins v. Roach, 127 Ga. 153, 56 S. E. 303. The ruling made in Johnson v. Williams, 138 Ga. 853, 76 S. E. 380 (2), is therefore not applicable.

2. PLEADING \S 406(5)—DEFECTS—PETITION AND ANSWER—WAIVER.

The petition set forth a cause of action. There was evidence sustaining the allegations as made. There was no demurrer challenging the legal sufficiency of the plaintiff's averments relative to the nature and character of the alleged obstruction. It was therefore not improper to try the case upon the issue thus made by the allegations of the petition and the denial thereof set up by the answer. *Southern Railway Co. v. WHITTIER MILLS CO. v. JENKINS.
(No. 9772.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 29, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

This was a suit in the city court of Atlanta for damages on account of personal injuries. No defense was entered at the first term, and a judgment by default for the plaintiff was at that time entered, upon proof being made by her as to the amount of damage sustained. During the term at which judgment was rendered the defendant moved to open the default and vacate the judgment, and the motion was denied. The defendant moved also for a new trial, which the trial judge granted, and under that motion the verdict and judgment were set aside. A bill of exceptions by the plaintiff complaining of the judgment granting a new trial was brought to this court, and in a cross-bill of exceptions the defendant assigned error upon the court's refusal to open the default. It was held by this court that the judge did not err, in the exercise of his legal discretion, in refusing to open the default, nor in setting the judgment aside on the defendant's motion for a new trial. When the case came on for another trial in the court below, the defendant made an oral motion to dismiss the petition, on the ground that no cause of action was set forth. This motion was overruled. A second motion to open the default had been filed immediately following the first grant of a new trial, and this motion was also overruled when the case came on for its second hearing. The second trial, for the purpose of determining the amount of damages, resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff in an increased amount. Exceptions are now taken to the refusal to dismiss the petition on the oral motion, and to the second refusal to open the default, and to the refusal of a motion for a new trial, in which it is complained that the verdict is excessive. Other exceptions are therein taken to rulings made at the second trial, all of which may be generally stated as presenting the question as to whether the statutory right to contest the amount of unliquidated damages in cases of default includes the right to contest the extent of the injuries, in contradiction of the averments made by the petition, and whether in contesting the amount of such damages the issue of contributory and comparative negligence, although excluded under the allegations as made by the petition, can be raised and submitted for the purpose of diminishing the amount of damages claimed. Held, the petition set forth a cause of action, and the court did not err in refusing to dismiss the case on oral motion.

2. JUDGMENT \S 150, 174—DEFAULT—VACATION.

The court did not err in refusing for the second time to open the default, although the judgment for the plaintiff had at that time been set aside under the motion for a new trial. The previous judgment was not a nullity, and never became such; but, having been legally rendered and not being void, although subsequently set aside as erroneous, its rendition fixed the continuing status of the suit as being in default.

3. EXCESSIVE VERDICT—REVIEW.

Under the allegations made by the petition, this court is unable to disturb the judgment in this case on the ground that the verdict is excessive. Realty Bond, etc., Co. v. Harley, 19 Ga. App. 186, 91 S. E. 254 (2), and cases there cited.

4. JUDGMENT \S 112 — DEFAULT — EFFECT — DAMAGES.

Where a suit for unliquidated damages becomes in default, the effect is the same as if every item and paragraph of the petition had been proved by testimony and judgment rendered thereon, save only as to the amount of the damages claimed; and while the defendant has the right to contest this, in doing so he is not privileged to deny or dispute any of the material facts so adjudicated against him. Civil Code 1910, §§ 5857, 5862; Lenney v. Finley, 118 Ga. 427, 45 S. E. 317; Southern Bell Tel. Co. v. Earle, 118 Ga. 506, 45 S. E. 319; Caldwell v. Freeman, 146 Ga. 469, 91 S. E. 544 (4); O'Connor v. Brucker, 117 Ga. 451, 43 S. E. 731; Pittman v. Colbert, 120 Ga. 341, 47 S. E. 948.

5. ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

Under the foregoing rulings, none of the assignments of error are sufficient to authorize this court to set aside the verdict and judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DEEDS ⇨117—LOGS AND LOGGING ⇨5—CONVEYANCE OF REALTY — PERSONALTY — CONVERSION.

Timber, when felled, cut, and stacked into cordwood, becomes personalty, and does not pass as a part of the realty upon the sale of the land upon which it lies. When, therefore, the owner of land, who was the owner of 43 cords of wood stacked thereon, sold said land and made to the purchaser a warranty deed conveying the land, the title to said wood did not thereby pass to such purchaser. There being no evidence of any contract of the sale of said wood, the title to the same remained in the vendor of the land, and he could recover such wood from the purchaser of the land by an action in trover.

2. LOGS AND LOGGING ⇨35—RECOVERY OF CORDWOOD ON LAND CONVEYED—EVIDENCE.

The court did not err in ruling out evidence that there was a tenant house on the place. Even if such evidence authorized the inference that at the time of the execution of the deed to said land it was occupied by a tenant having the right to cut and gather firewood, it did not negative the positive and uncontradicted testimony that the title to the particular wood in question was at the time of said sale in the plaintiff.

3. DIRECTED VERDICT.

The trial judge did not err in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

1. AMENDED PETITION.

The plaintiff's amendment to the tenth paragraph of her petition made at the trial term, was not such as materially to change the cause of action, and thus open the whole petition to demurrer at that time; nor did the court err in overruling the demurrer to that paragraph as amended.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨177, 247(1)—TRIAL ⇨296(4, 5)—CONCURRENT NEGLIGENCE OF SERVANT AND FELLOW SERVANT—LIABILITY—INSTRUCTION.

"Except in case of railroad companies, the master is not liable to one servant for injuries arising from the negligence or misconduct of other servants about the same business." Civ. Code 1910, § 3129. Nor is the master liable for injuries to a servant resulting from the negligence of the servant himself. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3131, 4428; Butler v. Atlanta Buggy Co., 10 Ga. App. 175, 73 S. E. 25; Wing v. Savannah Guano Co., 17 Ga. App. 534, 87 S. E. 827. It necessarily follows, therefore, that the master is not liable for injuries resulting to a servant from the concurrent negligence of the plaintiff himself and a fellow servant. The court therefore erred in charging the jury that "if the plaintiff was injured as alleged, and her injury, that is, the breaking of her arm, the consequent injury to her, damage to her, was caused by the negligence of the fellow servant and the negligence also of the plaintiff, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover." Although in other and different portions of the charge the judge correctly instructed the jury upon the questions here involved, he did not undertake to correct the erroneous charge above quoted; and a new trial must be granted. See Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Deas, 22 Ga. App. 425 (3), 427, 428, 98 S. E. 267.

3. TRIAL \S 260(1)—REQUESTED CHARGES—GIVEN CHARGES.

There was some evidence to authorize a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, though it did not require such a verdict. The requests to charge set out in grounds 2, 3, 4, 5, and 9 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, in so far as they were legal and pertinent, were sufficiently covered by the charge given; grounds 1, 6, 7, and 8, assigning error upon certain excerpts from the charge of the court, even though in some degree slightly inaccurate, are without substantial merit, when considered in connection with the context and the entire charge, as is also ground 10, which complains of the admission of certain testimony.

1. CONTINUANCE \S 46(2)—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—SURPRISE.

Where an amendment to the pleadings was offered and allowed, the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in overruling a motion made by the opposite party to continue the case on the ground of surprise, when the movant made no showing to the effect that he was "less prepared for trial, and how, than he would have been if such amendment had not been made, and that such surprise is not claimed for the purpose of delay." Civil Code, \S 5714; Ga. Life Ins. Co. v. Hanvey, 143 Ga. 786, 85 S. E. 1036 (2).

2. TRIAL \S 143—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where the existence of a fact was affirmed by positive evidence and denied by negative evidence, an issue was raised, and the trial judge committed no error in properly submitting such issue to the jury. Pendergrast v. Greeson, 6 Ga. App. 47, 64 S. E. 282; Innis v. State, 42 Ga. 474.

3. CHARGE OF COURT.

The assignments of error complaining of the charge of the court, as set forth in the second and fourth grounds of the amendment to the motion for new trial, are without merit. The charge was full and fair, and correctly presented all of the issues in the case to the jury.

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The testimony of plaintiff, however improbable, was not in "contradiction to the well-established physical laws of the universe." There was evidence to support the verdict, and no error of law was committed.

BROYLES, P. J. (concurring specially). In my opinion it is a very close question as to whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover under the evidence adduced. The great preponderance and weight of the evidence was unquestionably in favor of the defendant, and the slight evidence which favored the plaintiff was weak, unsatisfactory, contradictory in spots, and improbable. However, I cannot say that the verdict was unauthorized by any evidence; and since it has been approved by the trial judge, and no error of law appears to have been committed upon the trial, this court is without jurisdiction to interfere, and I must concur in the affirmance of the judgment.

On Motion for Rehearing.

BLOODWORTH, J. The motion for rehearing in this case is based upon the ground that the court overlooked the following evidence of defendant:

"He just handed me the deed and the other papers, and said, 'Sign here, right here,' and I thought I was signing a receipt for the deed. * * * He did not read to me this paper. I did not read the paper. Mr. Walker did not read it to me. I could not read it. No one read it to me."

[2] The court did not overlook the above-quoted evidence. It is a well established principle of law that, where the evidence of a party "bears two constructions, the one less favorable to his interest should be adopted." Burkhalter v. Oliver, 88 Ga. 478, 14 S. E. 704; Baggett v. Trulock, 77 Ga. 369, 3 S. E. 162 (3); Southern Railway Co. v. Hobbs, 121 Ga. 428, 49 S. E. 294; Horne v. Peacock, 122 Ga. 45, 49 S. E. 722 (2). In Western & A. R. Co. v. Evans, 96 Ga. 486, 23 S. E. 495, Justice Lumpkin said:

"A party testifying in his own favor has no right to be intentionally or deliberately self-contradictory; and, if he is so, the courts are fully justified in taking against him that version of his testimony which is most unfavorable to him. Being peculiarly in a position to state fairly and definitely the facts which he professes to know, he is under a duty of so stating them as to give a candid and intelligible account of what occurred. The courts are also authorized to give great weight to statements unwillingly made upon cross-examination, when these statements have every appearance of being the real truth, though reluctantly told."

On cross-examination the defendant said:

"I can write and read the English language. I can write some and read a little bit—nothing to amount to anything."

[3] In the evidence there is nothing to show that the defendant made any effort to read the note and found that he could not do so, or that at the time he signed it there existed any emergency which would excuse his failure to read, or that his failure to read was brought about by any "misleading artifice or device perpetrated by the opposite party, amounting to actual fraud such as would reasonably prevent him from reading it." On the contrary, it clearly appears that he signed the note upon presentation, without apprising himself of its contents otherwise than by accepting statements with reference thereto made by the representative of the opposite party, and between whom and defendant there existed no fiduciary or confidential relation. See Tinsley v. Gullett Gln Co., 21 Ga. App. 512 (2), 94 S. E. 892, and other cases cited in the opinion in the instant case.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW § 757(6), 823(2)—IMPEACHMENT—CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS.

The following excerpt from the charge of the court is complained of: "A witness may be impeached by contradictory statements previously made by him as to matters relevant to his testimony and to the case; and, where a witness has been so successfully impeached, it is your duty to disregard his testimony altogether." Standing alone, this excerpt is error, as the jury have a right to determine for themselves the credibility of a witness, even if they find he has been "successfully" impeached. Civil Code 1910, § 5884. When, however, this excerpt is considered with its immediate context, it does not require a new trial of the case. Immediately following the excerpt complained of, the judge added: "But whether a witness has been so successfully impeached or not, and what credit you will give to the testimony of each and every witness, is a matter entirely for you as jurors to determine." (Italics ours.)

In our opinion the excerpt complained of and the instructions just quoted, which immediately followed it, when considered together, clearly instructed the jury that, after all, even if they believed that any witness had been successfully impeached by proof of contradictory statements previously made by him as to a material matter, it was for them to determine what credit should be given his testimony. It was therefore not contrary to section 5884 of the Civil Code. See cases cited in Park's Ann. Code, under section 5884.

2. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The remaining special ground of the motion for a new trial is without merit.

3. RULING ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The verdict was amply authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). Where the judge makes an erroneous charge, it is presumably prejudicial, unless its harmful effect is removed and corrected in his language elsewhere, or unless it appears that such charge was harmless and did not affect the verdict. The judge charged the jury that, should they believe a witness has been "successfully impeached" by contradictory statements previously made, they should "disregard his testimony altogether." This is conceded to have been error. To my mind its harmful effect was not cured by the language immediately following it or appearing elsewhere in the charge. To tell the jury that "what credit you will give to the testimony of each and every witness is a matter entirely for you as jurors to determine" does not negative the idea that in passing upon the credit of a particular witness the jury is bound to reject his entire testimony when they disbelieve it in part. The testimony of the witness sought to be impeached was material to the defense, and if believed in part might have resulted in a different verdict.

The charge being erroneous and not cured, and upon the controlling issue in the case, I am of the opinion that a new trial should be granted.

BERRYTON MILLS v. PARHAM.
(No. 9864.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 29, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨149(1)—COM-PLIANCE WITH NEGLIGENT ORDER—RECOV-ERY.

"In order for a servant to recover for an injury on the ground that it resulted from his compliance with a direct order of his master, or of his master's representative, the servant must show that the order was a negligent one."

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨185(22) — NEG-LIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT—LIABILITY.

In this case the injury received by the plaintiff was the result of the negligence of a fellow servant, and it was error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Chattooga County; J. E. Rosser, Judge pro hac.

Suit by R. M. Parham against the Berryton Mills. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial overruled, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Denny & Wright, of Rome, for plaintiff in error.

Murray & Draper and Glenn & Napier, all of Chattanooga, Tenn., and Wesley Shropshire, of Summerville, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. Parham brought his action for damages against the Berryton Mills, a manufacturing corporation, to the March term, 1917, of Chattooga superior court, alleging substantially that he was injured by defendant in the sum of $10,000 on July 29, 1916; that he was employed some four months prior by the defendant, through one Gus Hudson, vice principal of defendant, as fireman of boilers; his regular duty under his employment was to fire the boilers, but he was required to perform such other services about said mill or plant as might be directed by defendant through said Hudson, foreman and vice principal; that on July 29, 1916, defendant had two boilers of approximate capacity of 150 horse power each; that these boilers are located in the boiler room of defendant's plant and are situated alongside and within a very few feet of one another, and are used for generating steam power to drive the machinery of the plant; that the boilers are connected by a pipe line through which the mud and sediment which accumulated in the boilers is drawn or allowed to escape; that along this pipe line are located two valves known as mud valves, one of which is located alongside and on the outside of each boiler, and by means of such valves the mud and sediment is forced by steam to escape from said boilers through said pipe line and into another waste line of pipe connecting about midway between said boilers, which also has a valve to open and close said waste pipe line; that the escape of steam is controlled by the valve nearest the boiler, and when the three valves are open, or waste valve closed and the other two opened, the steam from one boiler will escape into the other; that on said July 29th the plaintiff was directed by said vice principal, Hudson, to go into a boiler and fix a water pipe in one of the boilers which was leaking, the boiler having been cooled down; even that the plaintiff stated that he did not want to do so, for he did not know about the danger or anything about it, but he was assured by said vice principal, Hudson, that the place was safe, and that there was no danger, and Hudson directed him to enter and go right into the boiler and do the work; that he was not aware of the danger incident to said service, and, relying on the assurance of said vice principal, he entered said boiler, and entered on the discharge of said duties required of him therein; that he had not, and could not have had by the exercise of ordinary care, such means of knowing the risk as the defendant had; that while he was engaged in said work in the boiler, the fireman fired the other boiler under order of said vice principal, opened the mud valve nearest the boiler which was being fired by him, and allowed steam to escape into said pipe line connecting the boilers; that the defendant negligently and without proper care and inspection had left open the mud valve next to the boiler in which the plaintiff was engaged, performing service as directed, and that the steam entered the boiler in which he was engaged, and scalded, burned, and permanently injured him, causing him great pain and suffering; that the defendant had not exercised proper care to see that said valve was closed, or give him any notice thereof, or to warn him that the fireman was about to turn on steam, or any other warning whatever, and that the defendant did not inspect said valves, although it had full knowledge of his perilous position, and that no one was placed to guard said valve, and no direction was given to the fireman not to turn on the steam while the plaintiff was in the boiler; and that the defendant was negligent in failing to furnish and maintain a safe place for the performance of plaintiff's work.

[1, 2] The evidence in substance discloses that Parham had been employed for some time by the mills, sometimes firing these boilers and sometimes at other work. It became necessary to repair some of the tubes in one of the boilers, and the boiler was accordingly cooled off. Mr. Alexander, the only witness upon the question of cooling off this boiler, testified that he drew the fire from under it about 6:30 or 7 o'clock at night; that he then drained the boiler through the valve above described, and, after closing this valve, filled the boiler with cold water, and then drained this, repeating this several times; that he finally let the water out about 1 o'clock a. m. and then closed the valve on this boiler. After this, Mr. Hudson, Parham, and several others went to work on this boiler. At 5:30 a. m. this same fellow servant, Alexander, turned the steam on from the live boiler, burning and scalding Parham. At that time (5:30 a. m.) the valve on the dead boiler was open, though it was underneath the boiler and the work was being done from above, and though no one was shown to have been anywhere near this valve after Alexander testified that he closed it. The two valves, the one on the dead boiler and the one on the live boiler, which Alexander opened, were only a few feet apart, and both were in sight of Alexander when he opened the valve on the live boiler. According to the testimony of Parham, both valves were not within the view of Hudson, where he was working, nor was Alexander within his view when he opened the valve on the live boiler. The testimony of Parham and all other witnesses showed that there was a standing order to the fireman to always close these valves after blowing off one of the boilers.

What was the proximate cause of the injury received by Parham? It cannot be said that the order from the vice principal and the entering of the boiler at the time by Parham was negligence, for at that time there was no steam in the boiler, and there was nothing dangerous about the task. Was not the proximate cause of the injury the act of Alexander, the fellow servant, in opening the valve on the boiler which had steam in it, or the leaving open of the valve on the boiler in which Parham was working. If either be true, and this is the negligence relied upon, it seems to us that the case is controlled by the rule laid down in Civil Code 1910, § 3129, that—

"Except in cases of railroad companies the master is not liable to one servant for injuries arising from the negligence or misconduct of other servants about the same business."

In a case somewhat akin in principle to this case upon exceptions to a nonsuit, this court held that—

"It is the duty of a master to furnish to servants in his employ safe appliances for the work in which they are engaged; but when such appliances are furnished, and an injury to a servant is plainly attributable solely to negligence of fellow servants in the manner of using them or in failing to use them, the master is not chargeable therewith."

See Henderson v. Ocean Steamship Co., 15 Ga. App. 790, 84 S. E. 230. The plaintiff, however, says that he was complying with a command from the master to engage about the work in the boiler, as against his objection so to engage himself. This court has held that—

"In order for a servant to recover for an injury on the ground that it resulted from his compliance with a direct order of his master, or of his master's representative, the servant must show that the order was a negligent one under the circumstances. If the order was negligent, and the servant knew of the peril of complying with it, or if he had equal means with his master of knowing of the peril, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known thereof, then he cannot recover for an injury received in complying with the order."

See Simmons v. Southern Railway Co., 19 Ga. App. 524, 91 S. E. 917, and cases cited. See, also, Whiters v. Mallom Steamship Co., 97 S. E. 453. We are convinced that the evidence in this case, even when viewed most favorably to the plaintiff, shows conclusively that his injuries did not result from a negligent command of his master's representative, but were the result of the negligence of a fellow servant, for which, under the law, the master is not liable in damages. We have carefully examined all the assignments of error, and, upon a consideration of the case as a whole, we cannot see that the evidence makes a case entitling the plaintiff to a judgment for his injuries. It was error for the trial court to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

CHAPMAN v. STATE. (No. 9744.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 1, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)*1. CRIMINAL LAW \S 656(9), 762(3)—APPEAL.

While, ordinarily, it is reversible error for a trial judge, in any case, in his charge to the jury, or during its progress, within the hearing of the jury, to express or intimate his opinion as to what has or has not been proved (Civ. Code 1910, \S 4863; Pen. Code 1910, \S 1058), it is not a violation of the statute, where such expression or intimation of opinion occurs when the judge is discussing with counsel the admissibility of testimony, the propriety of a nonsuit, the discharge of a defendant for the lack of evidence to convict, the direction of a verdict, or similar matters in the progress of the trial, or is explaining his rulings upon questions of this nature. Especially is this true where the party complaining of such expression is the one who invoked the ruling which occasioned it.

Where prosecutor was a tenant of the land upon which the stolen corn was grown, and at the time of the larceny the corn had not been gathered, but was in the shuck, the title to the corn was in the tenant, and not in the landlord.

3. CRIMINAL LAW \S 1166½(12)—HARMLESS ERROR—COURT'S EXPRESSED OPINION.

In a prosecution for larceny of corn in the shuck, where no other than a verdict of conviction could have been rendered upon the evidence, any error in court's expression of opinion as to what had or had not been proved could not be prejudicial to defendant.

Error from City Court of Jefferson; J. A. B. Mahaffey, Judge.

Arch Chapman was convicted of larceny, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Ray & Ray, of Jefferson, for plaintiff in error.

S. J. Nix, Sol., of Jefferson, for the State.

BROYLES, P. J. The defendant was charged with the larceny of one bushel of corn in the shuck, the property of the prosecutor, O. P. Aiken. Upon the trial the undisputed testimony of a witness for the state showed that he caught the defendant in the prosecutor's cornfield, about 9 or 10 o'clock at night; that he saw the defendant break off more than a bushel of ears of corn and put them in a sack. The undisputed testimony of the prosecutor, Aiken, was that the stolen corn was his. He further testified that he rented the land upon which the corn was grown from W. H. Smith, and that Smith was to get half of the corn raised thereon for the rent of the land, but that it was his (Aiken's) corn until it was made and gathered.

[1, 2] It clearly appears from the record, and a fair inference therefrom, that when Aiken had given this testimony counsel for the defendant made a motion that the defendant be discharged, or that a verdict of acquittal be directed, or some similar motion, on the ground that the evidence of Aiken showed that one-half of the corn belonged to Smith, his landlord, and that therefore the allegations in the accusation as to the ownership of the stolen property were not sustained by the proof. The judge, in passing upon this motion, and in denying it, said: "I will have to rule this is Mr. Aiken's corn under the testimony." This language was excepted to by the defendant as an expression of opinion to the jury on a material issue in the case, in violation of section 1058 of the Penal Code.

We do not think the provisions of that section apply to the facts of the instant case. In Croom v. State, 90 Ga. 430, 17 S. E. 1003, the third headnote is as follows:

"Generally what the court says in stating to counsel the reason for denying a motion to exclude or rule out evidence is, if pertinent to the question raised by counsel, not error, although the reason given involve a statement as to certain testimony which is already in, or as to there being nothing in evidence showing that the circumstances are as the counsel claim."

In Realty Co. v. Ellis, 4 Ga. App. 402, 61 S. E. 832, the sixth headnote is as follows:

"It is not reversible error, under section 4334 of the Civil Code [of 1895; Code of 1910, \S 4863], for the judge, in discussing with counsel the admissibility of testimony, the propriety of a nonsuit, the direction of a verdict, or similar matters in the progress of the trial, or in explaining his rulings upon questions of this nature, to refer to the evidence or to the statements of witnesses, provided he does not go out of the line of legitimate discussion upon the point presented or use such language as to indicate apparent or actual judicial approval or disparagement of any witness or of any part of the testimony."

In Jones v. Pope, 7 Ga. App. 538, 67 S. E. 280, this court said:

"A trial judge can state his reasons for admitting or refusing to admit evidence, if such reasons are pertinent to the objections to evidence and the ruling made thereon; and this statement does not constitute such an expression of opinion as is violative of section 4334 of the Civil Code."

In Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Tift, 100 Ga. 86, 27 S. E. 765, the Supreme Court held that, in overruling a motion to nonsuit, the judge may, within appropriate limits, state, in the hearing of the jury, his reasons for his decision. See, also, to the same effect, Wyley v. Stanford, 22 Ga. 397 (3); Reinhart v. Miller, 22 Ga. 403 (10), 68 Am. Dec. 506; Milner v. State, 30 Ga. 137 (3), 139 (3); Perry v. Butt, 14 Ga. 699 (2), 705 (2); Scarborough v. State, 46 Ga. 26, 33; Claffin v. Continental Works, 85 Ga. 28, 11 S. E. 721 (6); Florida C. & P. R. R. Co. v. Lucas, 110 Ga. 121 (2), 124 (2), 35 S. E. 283; Brown v. State, 119 Ga. 572, 46 S. E. 833 (1); Hall v. State, 7 Ga. App. 115 (5), 119 (5), 66 S. E. 390.

In the Scarborough Case, Judge McCay said (on page 33) that:

"It would be impossible to carry on a trial if this section of the Code, prohibiting a judge from expressing any opinion as to what is proven, is to be construed as is contended for. A judge, in deciding as to admissibility of testimony, must always, to some extent, decide as to its weight, since often its admissibility depends on that, so he must often determine what has been proven so as to say whether certain other things may be proven. To decide a nonsuit, he must decide if there be enough proven to justify a verdict, etc. The only practicable rule is to treat the jury as possessed of common sense, and as capable of understanding what is addressed by the judge to them and what is not. He may not express to the jury any opinion; but if in the decision of any legal question, as it arises, he must pass upon facts, the statute does not apply. It must be reasonably construed." (Italics ours.)

In Oliveros v. State, 120 Ga. 237, 47 S. E. 627, 1 Ann. Cas. 114, Simmons, C. J., said:

"Expression of opinion as to the weight of evidence may or may not be error, according to the circumstances under which the opinion is expressed; but, even where error, it need not be a violation of Civil Code, § 4334. Again, speaking for myself, I think this court has given this section too broad and liberal a construction. It was doubtless enacted to correct a custom of the judges, which had descended to them from the common-law courts of England and this country, but which the Legislature thought was a usurpation of the functions of the jury. Whether this be true or not, we all think that, when an objection is made to evidence offered, the judge has a right, if he deems proper, to give the reasons for his decision on the objections; and such reasons so given, if pertinent to the objections made, do not constitute such an expression of opinion as to violate the Code section above cited." (Italics ours.)

Moreover, it has been held that, even where the expression of the judge's opinion occurs during his charge to the jury, this does not necessarily require the grant of a new trial. In Southern Insurance & Trust Co. v. Lewis, 42 Ga. 587, which was a suit on an insurance policy, the judge charged the jury that, in his opinion, the plaintiff had an insurable interest in the policy, and the Supreme Court, while stating that this was improper, and that the judge ought to have called the attention of the jury to the facts, and then said to them: "If you believe," etc., "then, in the opinion of the court, under the law, you will find that he had an insurable interest," nevertheless ruled that under the facts of the case—the case being clearly made out—this error was not sufficient ground for a reversal of the judgment. In Dexter Banking Co. v. McCook, 7 Ga. App. 436, 67 S. E. 113, this court held that:

"Where a particular fact is established by uncontradicted evidence, it is not error for the judge to assume or intimate that the fact has been proved."

This ruling in the Dexter Case was approved in Deen v. Wheeler, 7 Ga. App. 507, 517, 67 S. E. 212.

The undisputed evidence in the instant case showed that the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the prosecutor, Aiken, and W. H. Smith, the owner of the land cultivated by Aiken, and upon which the stolen corn was grown, and that Aiken was the tenant. It was further undisputedly shown that at the time of the larceny the corn had not been gathered, but was in the shuck and upon the stalks in the field. It followed, therefore, as a matter of law, that the title to the corn was in Aiken, and not in Smith. Teel v. State, 7 Ga. App. 600, 67 S. E. 699. Clearly, therefore, the contention of the defendant's counsel, made to the trial judge during the progress of the case, that the defendant could not be legally convicted, since the proof of the ownership of the stolen property did not correspond with the allegations of ownership in the accusation, and his motion that the defendant be discharged, or that a verdict be directed in his favor, or some other motion of the same import, was without merit, and was properly denied by the judge. In passing upon this motion, and in stating his reasons for his ruling thereon, the judge necessarily had to pass upon the evidence which had been introduced, and to express his opinion thereon, and, under the authorities above cited, the case falls within the exception stated in the headnote.

[3] Moreover, aside from the precedents cited, the particular facts of this case show that the granting of a new trial would be a mere idle and useless ceremony, and of no benefit whatever to the accused, since no other verdict than the one returned is legally possible on another trial. The defendant introduced no evidence and made no statement; no exception to the charge of the court, as to errors, either of omission or commission, was made; no exception to any ruling of the court upon the admission or exclusion of evidence was made; the undisputed evidence showed that the defendant was caught in the very act of the larceny charged, and that he made a free and voluntary confession of his guilt. No other verdict than the one rendered could possibly have been reached by the jury. The statement of the court, complained of, did not, therefore, prejudice or injure the cause of the defendant. We do not believe it was the legislative intent in enacting the statute, now codified in section 1058 of the Penal Code, to make its provisions apply to such a case.

Judgment affirmed.

BLOODWORTH, J., concurs.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). This was a conviction for simple larceny, the accusation alleging that the property stolen was one bushel of corn in the shuck, of the value of $2, and the property of O. P. Aiken. The evidence of Mr. Aiken was:

"It was my corn. It was my corn until it was made and gathered. Part of the corn was Mr. Smith's. * * * He was to get part of the crop. He was to get one-half of it."

Upon a ruling upon a motion made by defendant's counsel, the trial judge, in the presence of the jury, remarked:

"I will have to rule this is Mr. Aiken's corn under this testimony."

Section 1058 of the Penal Code, codified from what is commonly called the "dumb act," says in express words:

"It is error for the judge of the superior court, in any case, during its progress, or in his charge to the jury, to express or intimate his opinion as to what has or has not been proved, or as to the guilt of the accused; and a violation of the provisions of this section shall be held by the Supreme Court to be error, and the decision in such case reversed, and a new trial granted, with such directions as the Supreme Court may lawfully give."

This applies to trials in the city court of Jefferson. Acts 1903, p. 138. It is made mandatory on our court to grant a new trial when the trial judge has expressed his opinion on the facts. This rule is not altered merely because the fact stated as proved by the trial judge stands uncontradicted by testimony. The truth or falsity of the alleged fact is put in issue by the defendant's plea of not guilty, which plea is a denial of each and every allegation in the indictment against him. He is presumed to be innocent, and this presumption remains with him throughout the trial and until after the rendition of a verdict against him. His plea of "not guilty" and this presumption of innocence continue throughout the entire trial, to challenge and deny the case of the state, as alleged in the indictment and made in the evidence. Where there is no admission in judicio, the uncontradicted evidence of the state is thus denied, and an issue of fact is made.

It was a violation of this section of the Code for the trial judge to state, in the presence of the jury, that this statement of a witness, uncontradicted by the testimony, was true. He went "outside of the line of legitimate discussion upon the point presented [and used] such language as to indicate * * * actual judicial approval * * * of * * * part of the testimony." Realty Co. v. Ellis, 4 Ga. App. 402, 61 S. E. 832, cited in the majority opinion. In Cooper v. State, 2 Ga. App. 730, 59 S. E. 20, it was held that:

"A plea of not guilty, by one accused of crime, is an express contention on his part antagonistic to every fact necessary to be proved by the state in order to establish his guilt; and unless the accused admits one or more of the facts which it devolves upon the state to prove, such fact must be established by evidence. To assume that an important fact in the case on trial has been admitted, and to so instruct the jury when no such admission has been made, is reversible error."

Also in the case of Southern Express Co. v. State, 1 Ga. App. 700, 58 S. E. 67 (5), the court said:

"To assume in a criminal case that the testimony for the state is the truth, though such testimony be not contradicted by evidence for the defendant, and to charge the jury that such testimony is the truth and that there is no contention to the contrary, is violative of section 4834 of the Civil Code, and demands a new trial. The plea of not guilty, filed by the defendant is a contention on his part as to every material and essential fact necessary to establish his guilt, and implies a denial of every such fact."

Although the evidence demands a verdict of guilty, the law commands that it be set aside. The trial judge should have kept dumb, as the statute requires. It was not at all essential to his ruling upon the motion made by counsel for defendant for him to express himself on the facts as he did. We are enjoined in mandatory terms to set this conviction aside. Mandatory statutes must be obeyed, not evaded.

CRIMINAL LAW — 784(7), 824(9) — CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTION.

While in every criminal case, where the guilt of the accused depends wholly upon circumstantial evidence, it is the duty of the court, even in the absence of a written request, to charge the law of circumstantial evidence, it is immaterial what language is employed to convey this instruction, if every possible hypothesis arising from the circumstantial evidence, favorable to the defendant, be presented in concrete statement to the jury, and if they are instructed that if they believe any one of these hypotheses the defendant should be acquitted. Mangum v. State, 5 Ga. App. 445, 63 S. E. 543 (2); Barrow v. State, 80 Ga. 191, 5 S. E. 64 (3); Richards v. State, 102 Ga. 569, 27 S. E. 726; Jones v. State, 105 Ga. 649, 31 S. E. 574; *Bush v. Martha Reynolds was convicted of having possession and control of intoxicating liquors, and she brings error. Affirmed.

W. B. Mebane, of Rome, for plaintiff in error.

C. H. Porter, Sol. Gen., of Rome, for the State.

BROYLES, P. J. The defendant was charged with having possession and control of intoxicating liquors, and upon the trial the undisputed evidence showed that several half-gallon jars containing whisky were found on her enclosed premises, two of the jars being within five or six feet of a window of her house. The sole question left for the determination of the jury was whether the defendant knew of the presence of the whisky on her premises. She introduced no evidence, and in her statement denied having any knowledge that the whisky was on her premises. This evidence, in our opinion, raised more than a mere suspicion of the defendant's guilt, and was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that it excluded every reasonable hypothesis save that of her guilt.

Under the particular facts of this case, we do not think the court erred in failing to charge the exact language of section 1010 of the Penal Code upon the law of circumstantial evidence. The only possible hypothesis consistent with her innocence, arising from the evidence and her statement, was that she did not have any knowledge of the whisky being on her premises. The judge presented this hypothesis in concrete form to the jury, and instructed them that, before the defendant could be convicted, the state must show that she had a guilty knowledge of the whisky being on her premises, and that if it failed to do so she must be acquitted. Under the ruling in the cases cited in the headnote, we think the charge of the court sufficiently presented the principle of the law of circumstantial evidence applicable to the facts of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

BLOODWORTH, J., concurs.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). It is the well-settled law of this state that where a conviction depends entirely upon circumstantial evidence the trial judge must give in charge to the jury the law relative to the degree of proof necessary to convict upon such evidence. See Park's Penal Code, § 1010, and numerous citations under that section. It has been held, however, that, where the trial judge fails to expressly charge the law in reference to circumstantial evidence, but does, "fully and liberally to the defendant, instruct the jury as to the law of reasonable doubts, and the amount and character of testimony necessary to warrant a conviction," he fully complies with the duty incumbent upon him in respect to charging the law of circumstantial evidence. The above-quoted language is taken from the case of Barrow v. State, 80 Ga. 191, 5 S. E. 64 (3). The authorities which lay down this seeming exception are cases wherein the evidence either demanded a verdict, or so far authorized a verdict that the charge upon the law of circumstantial evidence would not have produced a different result. The very judge who rendered the opinion in the Barrow Case, supra (the oldest case cited and relied upon in the opinion of the majority of the court) said, in the case of Toler v. State, 107 Ga. 682, 33 S. E. 629:

"While the failure of the court upon a criminal trial, in which the evidence against the accused is entirely circumstantial, to instruct the jury concerning the rule applicable to evidence of this character would, in a close or doubtful case, be cause for a new trial, such failure will not require another trial when the guilt of the accused is clearly and convincingly proved, and the charge as to the amount and character of proof requisite to a lawful conviction is such as to leave no room for doubt that the verdict would have been the same even if the court had in terms stated to the jury that, in order to warrant a verdict of guilty, the evidence must not only be consistent with the guilt of the accused, but inconsistent with every other reasonable hypothesis. [Italics mine.]"

In Hamilton v. State, 96 Ga. 301, 22 S. E. 528, Judge Samuel Lumpkin, who wrote the opinions in both the Barrow and the Toler Cases, said, in the headnote thereto:

"When in the trial of a criminal case the evidence against the accused was entirely circumstantial, it was the duty of the judge, not only to charge upon the law of reasonable doubt, but also, whether so requested or not, to state to the jury the rule usually applicable in such cases, to the effect that the evidence must connect the accused with the perpetration of the alleged offense, and must not only be consistent with his guilt, but inconsistent with every other reasonable hypothesis."

Further on in his opinion in that case the learned judge said:

"The law upon this subject is very concise and aptly stated in 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, p. 879, from which we make the following quotation: 'Where the prosecution relies solely upon circumstantial evidence to secure a conviction, it is incumbent on the trial court to instruct the jury as to the law applicable to such proof. No particular form of language is required; if the ideas conveyed are correct and so expressed as to meet the comprehension of the jury, it is sufficient.' And see the cases there cited. In Barrow v. State, 80 Ga. 191 [5 S. E. 64], this court intimated [italics mine] that in a case in which the court ought to instruct the jury specifically as to the law of circumstantial evidence, a failure to do so might be cause for a new trial, unless the court did in fact substantially give the jury all necessary instruction as to the amount and character of proof requisite in such a case to justify a conviction. That was hardly a case of purely circumstantial evidence; but on the assumption that it could be so regarded, this court thought that the charge of the trial judge, who is now the Chief Justice of this court, in effect conformed to the rule above laid down. It would be easy to cite authorities in great number sustaining the doctrine announced in the headnote, but we are sure it will be accepted as good law without further support. [Italics mine.]"

In his reference to the Barrow Case, made in the Hamilton Case just quoted from, Judge Lumpkin seems to have weakened on his position taken in the former case. He refers to what was said in the Barrow Case on this point as an intimation, rather than as a decision, using the word "intimated," and further states that "it was hardly a case of purely circumstantial evidence." So much, therefore, for the Barrow Case, the evident source of this doctrine. Its author restricted and confined it to its own special and peculiar facts. In that case the court, in the opinion, referring to the charge of the trial judge said:

"He charged fully the law of reasonable doubt; warned the jury not to convict unless morally satisfied of her guilt; impressed this upon them by repeated statements to this effect; informed them that if, after an honest and impartial investigation, they were uncertain as to her guilt, they ought to acquit; instructed them they had the right to believe her statement in preference to the sworn testimony offered by the state; and concluded by saying she entered the trial with the presumption of innocence in her favor, that this presumption remained until the state rebutted it by proof, and that if the state had failed to do so she should be acquitted."

In the case of Jones v. State, 105 Ga. 649, 31 S. E. 574, also cited and relied upon in the majority opinion, suffice it to say that Mr. Justice Little, at the conclusion of the headnote therein, said:

"It would be otherwise if the evidence made the case close or doubtful, or if the account given of the manner in which the possession of the stolen goods was obtained was probable or consistent."

In the Mangum and Bush Cases, cited in the majority opinion, the charges were much fuller than in the case now under consideration. Both contained liberal cautions on reasonable doubt. In the Mangum Case the judge went so far as to define circumstantial evidence, charged more or less fully on presumption of innocence, and also used this expression:

"Whether dependant upon positive or circumstantial evidence the true question in all criminal cases is not whether it be possible that the conclusion at which the testimony points may be false, but whether there is sufficient testimony to satisfy the mind and conscience beyond a reasonable doubt."

This is the identical language of section 1013 of the Penal Code.

According to the view which I take of the evidence in the case now before us, the doctrine of the Barrow Case does not apply. I do not concede that the guilt of the accused is "clearly and convincingly proved." No liquor was found in the defendant's actual possession. Several small receptacles containing liquor were found on the defendant's premises, outside of her dwelling house. Only from the manner in which this liquor was placed, and the opportunity afforded thereby to charge the defendant with knowledge of its being on her premises, could she have been convicted. The circumstances were consistent with her innocence, and might not, in the minds of the jury, have excluded "every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused." Nor does it appear that "the court very fully and liberally to the defendant instructed the jury as to the law of reasonable doubt, and the amount and character of testimony necessary to warrant a conviction." The charge of the court in this connection was:

"In order to convict the defendant of this offense, it is necessary for the state to show to your satisfaction that the defendant had a guilty knowledge of the whisky in question being on her premises, if you believe any whisky was found on her premises. If the whisky was found on defendant's premises, and she had no knowledge of the whisky being there, then you will acquit the defendant."

Then, after the customary charge on the defendant's statement, the court concluded with a final instruction that:

"If you believe the defendant is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, you will convict the defendant; otherwise acquit her."

The court did not "charge fully the law of reasonable doubt." (Italics mine.) He made no reference to it in connection with his charge as to knowledge by the defendant of the presence of whisky on her premises. He did not "warn the jury not to convict unless morally satisfied of her guilt"; he did not "impress this upon them by repeated statements to this effect"; he did not "Inform them that if, after an honest and impartial investigation, they were uncertain as to her guilt they ought to acquit her"; and he did not charge "that she entered the trial with the presumption of innocence in her favor [and] that this presumption remained until the state rebutted it by proof." Nowhere were "the ideas [of circumstantial evidence] conveyed so as to meet the comprehension of the jury." Even assuming, as the majority in the case sub judice holds, that "The only possible hypothesis consistent with her innocence, arising from the evidence, was that she did not have any knowledge of the whisky being on her premises," the trial judge did not, in my judgment, instruct the jury "fully and liberally" as to the "amount and character of [this] testimony."

I do not dispute the doctrine of the Barrow Case, although it is confessedly obiter dictum. I am content to leave it with its author's stricture upon it in the Hamilton Case. Suffice it to say that if it is an exception to the general rule, for that reason it should be very cautiously applied. It should be confined and restricted to those cases only which clearly fall within its compass, and where a failure to apply the general rule was harmless.

Had the law of circumstantial evidence been given in charge to the jury, the defendant might have been acquitted. The jury might have concluded, from the manner in which the liquor was located upon her premises, that she had no knowledge of its existence. The jury might have concluded that the circumstances were not sufficient to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused.

The conviction depended entirely upon circumstantial evidence, and the verdict should be set aside and a new trial granted because of the failure of the trial judge to charge the law relative to the degree of proof necessary to convict when a conviction depends entirely upon such evidence. Lewis v. State, 6 Ga. App. 205, 64 S. E. 701.

ATLANTA & W. P. R. CO. v. MILLER.
(No. 9871.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 29, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL \S 296(3) — INSTRUCTIONS — CONSTRUCTION.

The trial judge having repeatedly charged, and the plaintiff's counsel having admitted in open court at the trial, that the plaintiff could not recover if at the time her husband was killed by the car of their railroad company he was not at the public crossing as alleged, the jury could not have understood the judge to mean the contrary by any of the instructions complained of.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 232(3)—FAILURE TO INSTRUCT—EXCEPTION.

Failure to give a certain instruction to the jury in connection with an instruction given, which was correct in itself, cannot be taken advantage of by excepting to the instruction given.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 1050(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The admission of testimony, the admissibility of which was doubtful, but which could not have been materially harmful, will not require a new trial.

4. TRIAL \S 260(1)—REFUSAL OF REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.

Failure to give requested instructions to the jury in the precise language requested is not cause for a new trial, where specific instructions to the same effect are given.

5. NEW TRIAL \S 150(4)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—AFFIDAVITS—NECESSITY.

It not appearing by affidavit of the movant for a new trial and of each of the counsel for the movant that they did not before the trial know of the existence of the alleged newly discovered evidence, and that it could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence on their part, the judgment refusing a new trial will not be reversed because of that evidence.

6. TRIAL \S 194(15)—INSTRUCTIONS — PROVISION OF JURY—NEGLIGENCE.

Refusal to give certain requested instructions as to what would constitute negligence was not error, that being peculiarly a question for the jury.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 1068(4)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—DAMAGES.

The instruction complained of as to the method of computation in reducing the gross earning capacity of a decedent to its present worth was harmless.

Error from Superior Court, Troup County; J. R. Terrell, Judge.

Action by Ada Miller against the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial overruled, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff sought to recover the value of the life of her husband, who it was alleged was killed by the negligent operation of the defendant company's cars at and upon a public crossing in the city of La Grange. It was admitted by her counsel upon the trial that if the deceased was not upon the public crossing at the time he was killed, she could not recover. The defendant denied liability, and contended that it was not negligent; that the deceased was not in the street when killed, but was some distance therefrom, in the yards of the defendant, on the track and leaning against the end of the car which ran over him, engaged in a conversation; and that his death was the result of his own negligent conduct. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $2,000. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and to this ruling exceptions are taken.

Brewster, Howell & Heyman, of Atlanta, and A. H. Thompson, of La Grange, for plaintiff in error.

Hill & Wright, Harvey Hill, and Arminius Wright, all of Atlanta, and Hatton Lovejoy, of La Grange, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The motion for a new trial assigns error upon the following excerpt from the charge of the court:

"There was no legal duty upon the part of the defendant to place a watchman either on the street crossing or on the box car which struck the deceased, if you believe that the deceased was not in the street and using it as a passageway, so far as relates to him, unless you find that failure to have been negligence upon the part of the defendant company."

While the language of the charge may be just here somewhat confused, we do not think that the excerpt, when considered in connection with the entire charge, constitutes harmful error and could properly require the grant of a new trial. That the jury could have been misled by the language of this isolated excerpt to the extent of believing that the defendant could be negligent in not having a watchman at the street or on the car, regardless of where the deceased was, or what he was doing at the time of the homicide, does not seem reasonably possible, in view of the plain and repeated instructions to the jury wherein the court stated to the contrary. At one point the judge charged as follows:

"If you should believe that the deceased was killed at some other place than a public crossing, if you believe from the evidence that the deceased was killed at a point not a public crossing, then you need not investigate further, but return a verdict for the defendant."

And again:

"So, gentlemen, you may consider the instructions I have given you, if you find from the evidence deceased was killed at a public crossing. But if you find from the evidence that he was not killed at a public crossing, that would end your investigation, and you would return a verdict in favor of the railroad company."

2. Error is assigned on the following excerpt from the charge of the court:

"It is contended by the plaintiff that the defendant was further negligent in that its servants kept no proper lookout ahead, and that no brakeman or lookout was stationed on its cars, or on the car which struck the deceased. I charge you that in looking to all the evidence, the circumstances, the scene of the homicide, and all of the surroundings, it is a question for you to determine as to whether or not ordinary care and prudence required that the defendant railroad company should have kept some one constantly on the lookout in front of its moving train to warn passers-by of danger, and whether or not a failure so to do was negligence upon the part of the defendant company. You may or may not determine that ordinary care and prudence on the part of the railroad company required this, or that the failure so to do constituted negligence on its part. But, if you should determine that ordinary care and diligence so required, and that the failure so to provide some one on the constant watch and lookout was negligence, and that such negligence contributed to or was the cause resulting in the homicide of the deceased, and that at the time, by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence upon his part, he could not have prevented the homicide, then that would make such a case as would authorize a recovery upon the part of this plaintiff."

The error assigned is not that these instructions are not abstractly correct, but that they were not applicable to the case being tried, without being properly limited, in that the jury would be authorized thereunder to find for the plaintiff, even though the deceased was at some place other than a public crossing at the time he was killed, or, if upon the crossing, was not using it as such. With this contention, however, we cannot agree. It was contended by the plaintiff that her husband was killed while attempting to cross the defendant's tracks at a public crossing, and that the defendant was negligent in not having some one on the lookout to warn him of the approaching cars. It was admitted in open court, and the judge repeatedly charged, that unless he was killed on the public crossing, she could not recover. The charge as quoted instructs the jury that it is for them to determine whether or not a failure on the part of the defendant to keep some one constantly on the lookout in front of its moving train, to warn passers-by of danger, was negligence upon the part of the defendant. In giving this charge the court instructed the jury that they were to look to all the evidence, the circumstances, the scene of the homicide, and all the surroundings, and, as stated, repeatedly instructed them that the plaintiff could in no event recover if her husband was not killed upon the public crossing, and at one point specifically instructed them that the defendant owed no legal duty to the decedent to place a watchman either on the street crossing or on the car which struck the deceased, if they should believe that the deceased was not in the street and using it as a passageway. The charge as given was applicable to the plaintiff's contention, and we do not think that the jury could possibly have given it the construction placed thereon by counsel for the defendant.

[2] 3. A charge embracing an abstractly correct principle of law applicable to the case is not rendered erroneous merely because of the failure of the court to charge some other and further legal and pertinent principle of law in connection therewith. Macon, etc., Railway Co. v. Barnes, 121 Ga. 443, 49 S. E. 282 (3); Smith v. Brinson, 145 Ga. 406, 89 S. E. 363 (2); Killian v. State, 19 Ga. App. 750, 92 S. E. 227. The third ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial comes within this general rule, and is therefore without merit.

[3] 4. The admission of the evidence complained of in ground 4 was of doubtful propriety, but could not have been materially harmful to the defendant, and therefore cannot afford a proper reason for setting aside the verdict and judgment.

[4] 5. Error is assigned upon the refusal of the court to charge as follows:

"A railroad track is a place of danger, and every one who goes on a railroad track is chargeable with knowledge of that fact, that it is a place of danger, and is under legal duty to exercise ordinary care to protect himself from injury by the operation by the railroad of cars and engines thereon. So under the law in this case, the husband of plaintiff was required to exercise ordinary care not to be injured when he went on the track of the defendant, whether he was on the public street or not. Even if under the evidence you should believe the place where the husband of the plaintiff was killed was on the public street, that would not excuse him from exercising ordinary care to avoid being injured."

The principle of law here involved was fully and repeatedly covered by the court in its charge to the jury. The court charged:

"Under the law in this case, the husband of the plaintiff was required to exercise ordinary care not to be injured, when he went on the track of the defendant, whether he was on the public street or not. Even if, under the evidence, you should believe that the place where the husband of the plaintiff was killed was in the public street, that would not excuse him from exercising ordinary care. He would still be under the duty of exercising ordinary care not to be injured."

Furthermore, in five or six other portions of the charge the court instructed the jury that the deceased was required to exercise ordinary care not to be injured, and that if he was killed by reason of his failure to exercise such care, the plaintiff could not recover. While the language used in the first part of the requested charge—"A railroad track is a place of danger, and every one who goes on a railroad track is chargeable with knowledge of that fact, that it is a place of danger, and is under legal duty to exercise ordinary care to protect himself from injury by the operation by the railroad of cars and engines thereon"—embodies a sound principle of law (Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 Ga. 708, 713, 39 S. E. 306, 54 L. R. A. 802), the failure to charge in the precise language requested is not cause for a new trial, where it appears that the principle involved was sufficiently covered by the general instructions given. Cosby v. Reid, 21 Ga. App. 604, 94 S. E. 824 (2), and cases cited. It may be that, in the opinion of the trial judge, the particular language above quoted, though embodying correct principles of law, forcibly stated, would nevertheless, if embodied in the charge, have appeared argumentative, and that for this reason he preferred to make a different statement of the same rules.

[5] 6. Ground 6 of the motion for a new trial being based upon newly discovered evidence, and it not appearing "by affidavit of the movant and each of his counsel that they did not know of the existence of such evidence before the trial, and that the same could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence," the judgment refusing the motion for a new trial on this ground will not be disturbed. Civ. Code 1910, § 6086; Pharr v. Davis, 133 Ga. 759, 66 S. E. 917; Southern Fertilizer, etc., Co. v. Carter, 21 Ga. App. 282, 284, 94 S. E. 310 (2b).

7. Error is assigned on the following instruction:

"If the injury occurred at a place where the public was accustomed at all times to pass over and across the tracks of the defendant railroad company with knowledge and consent of the railroad company, and if this fact is shown to have been known by the agent or servant in charge of the engine or cars which killed the deceased, then the servant or agent in charge of the engine or cars which struck and killed the deceased owed him the duty to exercise ordinary and reasonable care, to anticipate and discover his presence on the track, and ordinary care and diligence to prevent an injury to his person after discovery. * * * Then the company owed to the deceased, if he was at that point, not only to exercise ordinary care not to injure him after his presence on the track became known, but also to anticipate his presence and to take such measures as ordinary care would require to prevent injury to him in the event he was present. * * * Was this at a place constantly used by the public as a point of crossing the track, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant company, and was this fact known to the agent of the defendant company in charge of the engine or cars which killed the deceased? Was this a public crossing? These are questions for you to answer, and unless these questions can be answered in the affirmative, then the defendant company would owe the deceased no duty until his presence and peril became known to the servant and agent in charge of approaching locomotive or cars."

As has already been stated, counsel for the plaintiff admitted upon the trial that if the deceased was not killed while upon the public crossing alleged in the petition, there would be no liability upon the part of the defendant, and the plaintiff could not recover. Upon the trial no question was raised as to whether the street upon which the plaintiff claimed her husband was killed was in point of fact a public crossing, and the issue as to whether it was a public street is not involved. This being true, any inaccuracy in defining a public street, if there was such inaccuracy, could not have been harmful to the defendant. The contention of counsel for the defendant, that the charge as given permitted the jury to find in favor of the plaintiff if her husband, at the time he was killed, was not on the public crossing as alleged, is not well founded, for the court further charged the jury, in this same connection, as follows:

"So, gentlemen, you may consider the instructions I have given you, if you find from the evidence deceased was killed at a public crossing. But if you find from the evidence that he was not killed at a public crossing, that would end your investigation, and you would return a verdict in favor of the railroad company."

Moreover, if a more full and complete definition of a "public street" was desired, a timely and appropriate written request should have been presented.

[6] 8. Negligence being peculiarly a question for the jury, there is no merit in the exception taken in ground 8 of the motion for a new trial, relative to the request to charge. Civ. Code 1910, § 4863; Southern Railway Co. v. Grizzle, 131 Ga. 287, 288, 62 S. E. 177 (3).

[7] 9. The excerpt from the charge complained of in ground 9 of the motion, relative to the method of computation in reducing the gross earning capacity of a decedent to its present worth, is conceded by counsel for both plaintiff and defendant to have furnished no rule or guide by which the amount of the particular verdict or a verdict in any amount could have been arrived at, and it must therefore necessarily be taken as meaningless and harmless. In other portions of the charge the rule relative to this subject-matter was correctly stated. Florida Central, etc., R. Co. v. Burney, 98 Ga. 1, 26 S. E. 730.

Judgment affirmed.

LINDSEY v. INDEPENDENT ORDER OF PURITANS.INDEPENDENT ORDER OF PURITANS v. LINDSEY.

(Nos. 9690, 9731.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 29, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. INSURANCE — 679 — ASSUMPTION OF RISK — VALIDITY OF POLICY.

A life policy for $2,000 had lapsed before the death of the insured and before the defendant company, by written agreement, assumed the liabilities set forth in the insurance contract. The policy itself being void at the time the assumption of liability was undertaken by the defendant company, no liability attached against the original insurer, and hence none was assumed by the defendant company.

2. INSURANCE — 452 — LIFE INSURANCE — LIABILITY.

The other contract of insurance provided for the payment of 50 monthly installments of $20 each to the beneficiary upon proof of the death of the insured, but provided that if his death resulted solely from an "accident of travel," only 100 monthly installments of $20 each be paid to the beneficiary. It further provided that the beneficiary, "if the widow of the insured," should be entitled "after having received 100 monthly payments provided for above," to a continued benefit of $20 per month during the full term of her widowhood, to cease upon her remarriage or death. There being no proof that the death of the insured resulted from an accident of travel, the beneficiary was not entitled to the 100 consecutive monthly installments of $20 each provided for by the contract, and was not entitled to the continued benefit of $20 per month during her widowhood, which was only due and payable after the 100 monthly payment provided for in the event of accidental death should have been received by her. Both the payment of the 100 monthly installments of $20 each and the continued benefit of $20 per month during her widowhood depended, by the terms of the contract, upon the accidental death of the insured, resulting solely from an accident of travel.

3. DENIAL OF MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The verdict in favor of the defendant on the two counts based on alleged liability under the two separate policies of insurance was demanded by the evidence, and the trial judge did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by E. M. Lindsey against the Independent Order of Puritans. Judgment for defendant, motion for new trial overruled, plaintiff excepts and brings error, and defendant takes a cross-bill of exceptions. Affirmed on main bill of exceptions, and cross-bill dismissed.

Shipp & Kline, of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error.

Douglas & Douglas, of Atlanta, and Parker & Gibson, of Moultrie, for defendant in error.

WADE, C. J. On June 27, 1910, the National Life Annuity Association, a mutual benefit order, issued two certificates of insurance on the life of Ralph Clifton Lindsey, in which his wife was named as the beneficiary. One certificate (No. 2602) provided for the payment to Mrs. Lindsey, upon satisfactory proof of the death of the insured, of the sum of $2,000, in 100 consecutive monthly installments of $20 each; and provided, further, that in the event of the accidental death of the insured before attaining the age of 60 years, the amount payable should be $3,000, in 100 consecutive monthly installments of $30 each; but should the accidental death of the insured be caused solely by and result from accident of travel, the amount payable should be $4,000, in 100 consecutive monthly installments of $40 each. This policy or certificate further provided that the widow of the insured should be entitled, "after having received 100 monthly payments provided for above," to a continued benefit of $20 per month during the full term of her widowhood, but that this continued benefit should cease upon her remarriage or death. The other certificate (No. 2603) provided for the payment to the wife of the insured, upon satisfactory proof of his death, of "the sum of $1,000, in 50 consecutive monthly installments of $20 each"; and also provided that in the event of the accidental death of the insured before attaining the age of 60 years, the amount payable should be $1,500, in 75 consecutive monthly installments of $20 each; but should the accidental death of the insured be caused solely by or result from accident of travel, the amount payable should be $2,000, in 100 consecutive monthly installments of $20 each. This policy or certificate further provided that—

"The named beneficiary under this certificate, if the widow of the insured, shall be entitled, after having received 100 monthly payments provided for above, to a continued benefit of $20 per month during the full term of such widowhood; but this continued benefit shall cease upon the remarriage or death of the beneficiary."

[1] It appears, under the allegations in the first count of the plaintiff's petition, that the insured died on the 7th day of December, 1911, and proof of death was made under policy No. 2602 for $2,000, and the National Life Annuity Association began in February following to pay the $20 per month as stipulated therein, and continued to pay the same until that policy or certificate was assumed by the Independent Order of Puritans, of Pittsburg, Pa., on April 6, 1912, which assumption was in writing and attached to the policy or certificate; and that the Independent Order of Puritans continued the payment of $20 per month as stipulated in the policy or certificate until 50 payments had been made and thereupon ceased to make further payments. Plaintiff alleged that the defendant was due her the sum of $20 per month for each month beginning with February, 1916. The second count of the plaintiff's petition alleged the same facts as to the death of the insured and the assumption of the obligation of the National Life Annuity Association by the Independent Order of Puritans, arising under policy No. 2603 for $1,000; the obligation sought to be enforced under that policy being, however, the payment of $20 per month, to continue during the full term of the widowhood of the beneficiary, Mrs. Lindsey, and until her remarriage or death, based upon the averment that the plaintiff was still the widow of Ralph Clifton Lindsey. The only assumption of risk by the defendant company was evidenced by a writing executed with due formality, in which the defendant agreed to assume the insurance contract liabilities "as set forth in the contract to which this rider is attached, being No. 2602, issued by the National Life Annuity Association of Atlanta, Ga.," and this writing, denominated a "rider," was dated April 6, 1912, and was sent to the beneficiary by the defendant, to be attached to said certificate No. 2602.

The undisputed evidence showed that policy No. 2602 for $2,000 had elapsed and was absolutely void and of no effect a considerable time before its transfer and before the death of the insured, and that only the policy for $1,000 was in effect at the time of his death; and therefore it is apparent that no liability under the policy for $2,000 rested on the defendant company, unless its assumption of liability under and by virtue of the contract signed by it and which was by its terms to be attached to policy No. 2602 could or did of itself create such a liability or obligation. It is hardly necessary to say that if the policy for $2,000 was null and void at the time this assumption of liability was executed by the defendant, no obligation was thereby created against the Independent Order of Puritans. The original contract having been void absolutely by the failure on the part of the insured to pay the premiums or assessments provided for therein, there was no existing obligation on the part of the National Life Annuity Association of Atlanta, under this contract, in favor of the insured or his beneficiary at the time the assumption of liability was executed by the Independent Order of Puritans, and that assumption of liability merely declares that the defendant "agrees to assume the insurance contract liabilities as set forth [italics ours] in the contract to which this rider is attached, being No. 2602, issued by the National Life Annuity Association of Atlanta, Ga." Consequently, if the National Life Annuity Association had no liability under certificate No. 2602, the Independent Order of Puritans assumed none. Certificate No. 2602, as a consideration for the contract, provides for "the payment of $3.22 monthly premium, and the further payment of all premiums regularly and promptly as they become due on the first day of each calendar month hereafter." As this condition was breached by the insured, the policy had lapsed and become void, under the undisputed evidence, before the assumption of liability therein by the present defendant, and therefore no recovery could possibly be had thereunder.

There was evidence that this rider was issued by mistake and was intended for policy No. 2603 for $1,000; and to bear out this evidence, there was testimony from the plaintiff herself that the $20 coupons surrendered by her on payment of the several monthly installments which she received, 50 in number, aggregating $1,000, were coupons from policy No. 2603 for $1,000—the policy which was in life at the time of the death of the insured. Likewise, the undisputed testimony showed that the proof of death was made under policy No. 2603, and no proof of death was made under policy No. 2602. Therefore no recovery whatsoever was authorized by the evidence under the first count of the plaintiff's petition, which sought to recover under policy No. 2602, which had lapsed long before the death of the insured and had not been revived by the assumption of liability referred to above and entered into by the defendant company on April 6, 1912.

[2] The only question, therefore, is whether or not, under the terms of certificate No. 2603, which was of force and under which plaintiff had already received at the time the suit was brought the sum of $1,000, which it is therein provided shall be paid upon proof of the death of the insured, the beneficiary is entitled to a further payment of $20 monthly during her life and widowhood. There was testimony to show that this policy should not have contained the provision as to a continued benefit of $20 per month during the life and widowhood of the beneficiary, which testimony was objected to when offered, and, under the pleadings in the case, was perhaps of doubtful admissibility. This testimony was undisputed, and, if competent and admissible under the pleadings, might have negated the right of the plaintiff to the continued benefit sued for in the second count of her petition. In the view we take, it is not necessary however, either to consider the various assignments of error as to the admission of this and other testimony tending to attack or explain the contract as written or authorize a reformation thereof, or to consider the exceptions to the charge of the court touching this feature of the case; for, even if it be conceded that the evidence was inadmissible, and that the exceptions to the charge referred to were well taken, we think that no recovery could be had, under the contract as written, by placing any reasonable interpretation on the language therein employed.

The contract makes several different provisions as to the benefits arising thereunder: First, upon proof of the death of the insured, $1,000 shall be paid to the beneficiary in 50 consecutive monthly installments of $20 each. Second, in the event that the death of the insured be caused by accident before he attained the age of 60 years, the amount payable shall be $1,500, in 75 consecutive monthly installments of $20 each. Third, should the death of the insured be accidental and "be caused solely by and result from accident of travel, the amount payable shall be $2,000, in 100 consecutive monthly installments of $20 each." Fourth, "the named beneficiary under this certificate, if the widow of the insured, shall be entitled, after having received 100 monthly payments provided for above, to a continued benefit of $20 per month during the full term of such widowhood; but this continued benefit shall cease upon the remarriage or death of the beneficiary." It will be observed that there is no provision whatsoever for the payment of 100 consecutive monthly installments of $20 each, except in the case of the accidental death of the insured caused solely by and resulting from "accident of travel." It will be further observed that the provision for the payment of a "continued benefit" of $20 per month during the life and widowhood of the beneficiary expressly stipulates that such beneficiary, "if the widow of the insured," shall be entitled to receive said continued benefit "after having received 100 monthly payments provided for above [italics ours]." The only 100 monthly payments "provided for above" which are referred to in the contract of insurance were to be paid in the event only that the deceased met his death solely on account of or as a result of an "accident of travel." Construing the contract altogether, and being not unmindful of the rule that contracts of insurance are to be construed most liberally in favor of the insured and against the insurer, without any reference whatsoever to the testimony or the pleadings relative to a mistake in the original writing of the contract, and without taking into consideration whether or not the reformation of the contract contended for by the defendant could be effected in this action under the pleadings and the evidence adduced, the plain, unambiguous, and reasonable meaning of the contract as it was actually written, and which is relied upon as the basis of a right of action in the plaintiff, is that only in the event the insured came to his death by an accident of travel would his beneficiary be entitled to 100 monthly installments of $20 each, and only in the event that his death occurred by reason of an accident of travel would she be entitled to receive, after the payment of the 100 monthly installments of $20 each due her in that event, the continued benefit of $20 per month during the remainder of her life and widowhood. No proof was offered to show that the death of the insured occurred as a result of an "accident of travel" wherefore no obligation arose to pay to his beneficiary under the certificate of insurance which was in effect at the time of his death $20 per month for 100 consecutive months, due only in that event; and therefore no obligation exists under the provisions of the contract to pay a continued benefit of $20 per month during the full term of her widowhood, "after having received 100 monthly payments provided for above"; the only 100 monthly payments "provided for above" never having become due and payable.

[3] Under the construction we give the contract, and our view of the case as presented by the record, but one verdict could have been returned by the jury, and that was a verdict for the defendant on both counts of the petition. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the various alleged errors referred to in the amendment to the motion for a new trial, and, as the verdict was demanded, the trial judge did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed on main bill of exceptions; cross-bill dismissed.

RANSOM v. STATE. (No. 9752.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 1, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CRIMINAL LAW — 1064(4)—HOMICIDE — 200—DYING DECLARATIONS—HEARSAY—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY OF GROUND.

The first special ground of the motion for new trial complains that the court erred in admitting in evidence certain dying declarations, the objection urged being that "there was not sufficient foundation laid for the admission of a dying statement, because the state has failed to prove that the deceased was in a dying condition, and because the statement is hearsay." There is no merit in the objection, that "the statement is hearsay." That "dying declarations constitute one of the exceptions to the rule which rejects hearsay evidence" is clearly announced in Mitchell v. State, 71 Ga. 128(2). The ground of objection that "the state has failed to prove that the deceased was in a dying condition" is not complete. In order to ascertain what evidence was introduced in connection with these declarations, and thus determine whether they are admissible, it is necessary to refer to the brief of evidence. "Under repeated rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court, a ground of a motion for a new trial must be complete in itself. When it is so incomplete as to require this court to refer to the pleadings or to the brief of the evidence, it will not be considered." Bridges v. Griffin, 20 Ga. App. 599, 93 S. E. 170. See, also, Southern Ry. Co. v. Williams, 19 Ga. App. 544, 91 S. E. 1001 (4), and cases cited.

2. AMENDMENT TO MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Under the qualifying notes of the trial judge, there is no merit in grounds 2 and 4 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

3. ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

No error harmful to the defendant was committed in admitting in evidence the testimony of Hattie King, complained of in the third special ground of the motion for new trial.

4. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

When considered in connection with the entire charge of the court and in the light of all the evidence, there is no error harmful to the defendant in the excerpts from the charge embodied in the fifth, sixth, seventh, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

5. CHARGE ON VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

The evidence authorized the charge on voluntary manslaughter, and the court did not err in charging thereon as complained of in the eighth, ninth, and tenth grounds of the motion for a new trial.

6. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There is evidence to support the verdict, and the judgment is affirmed.

STEPHENS, J. (concurring specially). Generally hearsay evidence is inadmissible. A ground of a motion for new trial which sets out the evidence admitted and alleges that its admission was excepted to "because the statement is hearsay" is, in my opinion, a complete ground within itself. This is not altered by the fact that such evidence may have been offered as a dying declaration and as an exception to the hearsay rule.

None of the assignments of error being meritorious, I concur in the judgment of affirmance.

Where one of two or more joint tort-feasors has been sued for and compelled to satisfy damages arising from a jointly tortious transaction, he cannot, as a general rule, maintain an action either for contribution or indemnity over against those connected with him in the tort; but if the liability of the tort-feasor in the original suit arises merely from negative acts of omission on his part, such as a failure in his duty to inspect, and the proximate cause of the injury, so far as the joint tort-feasors are concerned, lay in active, positive acts of negligence on the part of the other tort-feasor, in which the original defendant did not in any way participate, then an exception to the general rule would exist. *Central Ry. 2. INDEMNITY ⚡13(2)—JOINT TORT-FEASORS.

A railroad company brought suit for indemnification against a company operating an oil mill to recover the amount of a judgment paid by the railroad company for the homicide of one of its own employes, whose death was occasioned by the operation of its train of cars along a private track maintained by it to the oil mill, and under a dangerously low shed maintained by the oil mill company over said track at the oil mill. The allegations of negligence set out against the railroad company in the tenth and also in the eleventh paragraphs of the original suit, such as were not disproved by it in the present proceeding, were to the effect that at the time of the homicide the railroad company had full and actual knowledge that the shed was so dangerously low as to constitute a menace to its operatives; that, notwithstanding such knowledge, it failed in its duty to warn the decedent of his peril, and proceeded to operate its train under said shed on a dark and rainy night without having in any way provided lights "to indicate the presence of the shed," so that the decedent might have avoided the peril to which he was unknowingly exposed by the operation of said cars. The case was tried by agreement before the judge of the superior court without a jury, and judgment was rendered for the defendant. Held:

(a) Under the facts of the case, the general rule above stated, rather than the exception indicated, would have application. The act of the railroad company in thus voluntarily operating its train along said private track and under said shed, and in such undisproved negligent manner, did not amount to mere legal, passive acquiescence in the negligence of the oil mill company in maintaining the shed in a dangerous condition, but such active, positive, and negligent conduct on the part of the railroad company itself amounted to an actual participation by it in the proximate cause of the homicide.

(b) It is unnecessary to decide the question raised by the cross-bill of exceptions.

ELLISON v. NORFOLK & W. RY. CO.
(No. 3627.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 4, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)*1. RAILROADS \Leftrightarrow 415(2) — KILLING STOCK — CARE REQUIRED.

A railroad company is not bound, in the exercise of the ordinary care and prudence required of it for the safety of trespassing animals, to maintain such a constant and rigid observation of the track as will enable it to discover, at the inception of their trespass, animals coming on it near a curve, in advance of a train, and quickly proceeding around the curve and beyond the range of view.

2. RAILROADS \Leftrightarrow 415(3) — KILLING STOCK — NEGLIGENCE.

Nor can it be deemed or held to be guilty of negligence for failure to discover animals on its track, at the end of a curve around which a train is passing, at a point so near to the curve as to allow the enginemen only two or three seconds in which to discover them, determine what course to pursue, and apply the brakes.

The trial court may properly give an instruction lacking a qualification by an hypothesis unsupported by evidence and refuse to give an instruction embodying such hypothesis.

Cook & Howard, of Welch, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The principal ground of assault upon the verdict underlying this judgment for $300, obtained in an action against the defendant for the alleged negligent killing of the plaintiff's two mules, is insufficiency of the evidence to sustain it.

While the defendant's east-bound train running at the rate of 30 or 35 miles an hour, upgrade, on a moonlight night, and carrying not less than seven or eight coaches, was running on a straight stretch of track about half a mile long, towards a sharp curve, the plaintiff's two mules went on the track ahead of the train, at a point about 246 feet from the beginning of the curve, trotted along on the track for a distance of about 375 feet, and then ran to the point at which they were struck by the engine, 759 feet distant from the place at which they had come on the track and practically, if not quite, beyond the curve. As nobody saw them until just before they were struck, the time at which they came on the track with reference to the approach of the train, and what they did before they were struck, are matters of inference arising from their tracks made in the cinders on the railroad track. Witnesses testified that their inspections of the mule tracks enabled them to say they had trotted a portion of the distance and run the balance of it. A mathematical calculation based upon the assumed rate at which the mules traveled and the rate of speed at which the train was running indicates that they were on the track only about 43 seconds. If the evidence justified the jury in finding that they were there, only for that period of time, not more than 17 seconds elapsed from the time they went on the track until they disappeared around the curve. That they went beyond sight around the curve in a few seconds, is clear. The engineer swears he saw them at a distance of only 30 or 40 feet, before the engine struck them, and that, for his own safety and that of the passengers, he applied the emergency brake and stopped the train with a considerable jar, but was unable to do so in time to avoid the injury. He further testifies that he could not have stopped the train within less than 150 feet. Evidence was adduced to prove opportunity on the part of the engineer to discover the mules at a distance of 150 or 200 feet, after they had passed around the curve; but it is not very clear. The plaintiff testified that the point at which they were struck was beyond the curve about six rail lengths and on practically straight track. He does not say it was straight. Another witness says this point was on straight track at a distance of four or five rail lengths from the curve. A photograph introduced by the defendant indicates that they were struck right at the end of the curve. One of the mules was knocked off of the track, and the other went under the engine and was dragged about six rail lengths. The engineer swears he was looking ahead, but not that he could not have seen the mules earlier, nor that he maintained a lookout upon the track. His statement that he was looking ahead may have been evasive.

[1, 2] The inference that the rays from the headlight and noise of the train more than 1,000 feet away excited the mules into a trot, upon their arrival upon the track, and the increase of the light and noise frightened them into a run, is, no doubt, permissible; but, whether the short period of their visibility at this point brought them within the duty of the defendant, through its servants in charge of the train, to observe them is one of the crucial questions in the case. As to passengers, the duty imposed by law upon a carrier is strict and rigid. But, as to persons and property wrongfully upon the track of a railroad company, the measure of the company's duty is ordinary care. Carper v. Traction Co., 78 W. Va. 282, 88 S. E. 843; Robbins v. Railroad Co., 62 W. Va. 535, 59 S. E. 512; Gunn v. Railroad Co., 36 W. Va. 165, 14 S. E. 465, 32 Am. St. Rep. 842; Layne v. Railroad Co., 35 W. Va. 438, 14 S. E. 123. To require a railroad company, through its servants, to maintain a rigid and constant outlook upon its track, to discover trespassing livestock, in order to avoid injury thereto, would amount to an exaction of more than reasonable and ordinary care. An engineer ought reasonably to be expected to discover stationary objects on a track, several hundred feet distant, or moving objects remaining visible; but to require him to observe an object that comes upon the track, more than a thousand feet in advance of the train and almost instantly disappears around a curve, would be clearly and manifestly inconsistent with the measure of his principal's duty. Some of his time must be devoted to necessary attention to his engine. Moreover, it is not to be assumed, nor is it permissible to infer, that his vision always takes in at the same instant the entire length of the visible track ahead of him. Though the engineer does not say he did not discover the mules before they went around the curve, in so many words, his language plainly implies he did not, for he says he first saw them at a distance of not more than 30 or 40 feet. While his testimony in denial of negligence on his part, before they reached the curve, might have been more direct and positive, there was no duty on the part of the defendant to repel, by such evidence, a charge of negligence not prima facie established by the plaintiff's testimony. As the mules came within the possible range of view and almost immediately passed beyond it, the defendant cannot be held liable for failure to discover them within the few seconds of their visibility at that point.

The assumption that the mules were struck after they had passed around the curve and proceeded 150 or 200 feet on straight track does not warrant the inference that the engineer could have seen them at that distance; for both the engine and the mules were going in the same direction, when the latter first came within the range of view, and continued to do so until the instant of contact. The mules were running ahead of the train at an estimated rate of 15 miles per hour, or 22 feet per second, while the train maintained a rate of 44 feet, or more, per second. If the engineer's judgment as to the distance of the mules in advance of the train, when he says he first saw them, is correct, and he immediately applied the emergency brake, the rate of speed of the train may have been so far reduced as to have left it only slightly in excess of that of the mules, when they were struck. Hence the engineer may have discovered them at the first opportunity. Facts and circumstances, however, tend to disprove this theory. The engineer says he could have stopped the train within 200 feet. With a mule under his engine and impeding its progress, it ran six rail lengths, 198 feet, after the collision. If the mules were struck at a point four or five rail lengths beyond the curve, 132 or 165 feet, the engine must have been more than 300 feet from the curve, when it stopped, and the brake must have been put on at a point about 132 feet from the curve. If this is a sound inference and the engineer's estimate of the distance between the engine and the mules, when they were discovered, is correct, only about two seconds elapsed from the time at which the mules became visible until they were discovered. Within that brief period he must have made the discovery, decided what to do, and applied the brakes. On the best showing that can possibly be made for the plaintiff, therefore, the engineer had an unreasonably short period of time in which to take necessary precautions for the safety of the animals, including that of lookout, and the proof is that he did everything in his power to avoid injury after he discovered the danger.

[3] In this state of the evidence, the court erroneously refused the prayer of the defendant for a peremptory instruction directing the jury to find for it. In view of the award of a new trial, it becomes necessary to pass upon exceptions to the court's rulings respecting other instructions, one given for the plaintiff and one asked for by the defendant and refused. In both instances, the rulings were proper; there being no evidence to sustain the hypothesis embodied in the instruction sought by the defendant, which had for its purpose qualification of the instruction given for the plaintiff. The proposition invoked, as a proper qualification of the plaintiff's instruction, and as the subject-matter of the defendant's rejected instruction, was that the engineer was under no duty to stop his train in such manner, or under such circumstances, as would jeopardize the safety of himself or his passengers. The proof is that he put on the emergency brake and endeavored to stop the train in the shortest possible distance. If delay was excusable under the circumstances, the defendant did not take the benefit of it, at the time of the collision. Hence it was not involved in the trial.

These principles and conclusions result in reversal of the judgment, setting aside of the verdict, and award of a new trial.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Suit in equity by Joseph Maudru against G. L. Humphreys, administrator, etc., James T. Mynes, and others. Decree for plaintiff, and the administrator and James T. Mynes appeal. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

C. E. Copen, of Winfield, for appellants.

R. L. Blackwood and C. W. Freeman, both of Huntington, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, J. This suit in equity was instituted by Joseph Maudru against the administrator and heirs at law of James T. Mynes, deceased, to recover damages for the loss of a house by fire after a valid contract for the exchange of lands had been made between said Maudru and Mynes and before deeds were executed. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendants prosecute this appeal.

Joseph Maudru resided in Colorado, and James T. Mynes in Cuba. The former owned a one-third undivided interest in a tract of about 3,000 acres of land in Cuba, and the latter a number of houses and lots in the city of Huntington, W. Va. By a writing dated September 13, 1910, they contracted to exchange lands, Maudru agreeing to convey his Cuban property in exchange for certain ones of Mynes' houses and lots in Huntington, the properties to be conveyed by general warranty deeds and free from all liens and incumbrances.

Mynes' deed to Maudru for the Huntington property bears date December 28, 1910, was acknowledged February 23d, and recorded March 23, 1911. The deed from Maudru to Mynes for the Cuban property was executed by J. S. Jump, attorney in fact for Maudru, April 8, 1911. The fire occurred January 24, 1911, without default of either party.

J. S. Jump, attorney in fact, knew the house had been burned before he executed Maudru's deed to Mynes and says he told Mynes that Maudru would hold him responsible for the loss, but it does not appear what Mynes' reply was, if anything. C. L. Humphreys was looking after the Huntington property for Mynes until the exchange was completed, and produced a receipt for $55, bearing date May 1, 1911, signed by C. W. Freeman, who had become Maudru's agent to collect the rents. This receipt states that it is "for house rent collected for Joseph Maudru since transfer of J. T. Mynes to him," and Humphreys swears it included rent for the house that burned. Just when Maudru learned the house was burned does not appear. But he wrote a letter, dated Brush, Colo., April 17, 1911, addressed to C. L. Humphreys, Huntington, W. Va., in which he says:

"I am informed that the big double house on one of the lots I recently bought from Mr. Mynes has burned down. Wish you would kindly forward me the insurance policy covering this property so that I can proceed for collection."

And on the 24th of the same month he again wrote Humphreys, acknowledging receipt of a letter of April 20th, in which he was told by Humphreys that no insurance was carried by Mynes on any of his houses, and further said:

"Also note that you have in your possession money collected for rent. Would ask that you turn this over to Mr. C. W. Freeman of your city whom I have engaged to look after the property and who will in the future collect rents."

This evidence shows that Maudru collected rents after he had knowledge of the destruction of the house, if that fact is material. Apparently he supposed the loss was covered by fire insurance and he could get the benefit of it. But Mynes carried no insurance, nor did his contract of sale obligate him to do so.

Mynes' title to all the Huntington lots seems to have been perfect, except lot No. 36, block 189, not the one on which the burnt house was located. A defect in the title to this particular lot existed on account of the failure of J. F. Brown to unite with his wife, Rebecca Brown, in a deed from her bearing date January 17, 1898, to Eliza A. Mynes, through whom James T. Mynes traced title. This defect, however, was cured by a deed made by said Rebecca Brown and her husband direct to Joseph Maudru on April 12, 1911.

In September, 1914, Maudru instituted an action at law against C. L. Humphreys, administrator of James T. Mynes, deceased, to recover damages for the destruction of the house on the theory that its occurrence prior to the execution of the deed rendered the vendor liable, and on October 15, 1915, recovered a judgment for $1,500. No writ of error was taken to this judgment, and a fieri facias was issued and returned "No property."

The parties agreed that the evidence taken in the trial of that action might be read and considered as evidence by Commissioner T. J. Bryan, to whom this cause was referred to report upon certain matters, and such evidence was read and considered by him. He found and reported that the house destroyed by fire was worth $1,500 as of October 15, 1915, the date of the judgment, to which sum he added interest to the date of his report, $172.50, and costs of the lawsuit, $198.10, thus making the sum of $1,870.60. The court overruled defendants' exceptions to the commissioner's report, confirmed the same, and rendered the decree complained of.

The controlling question of law presented is, Which party to the contract should bear the loss, neither being at fault?

James T. Mynes was an unmarried man, and died intestate in December, 1912, leaving as his heirs at law his mother, four brothers and sisters, and one half-brother. C. L. Humphreys, a brother-in-law of deceased, qualified as his administrator. All the real estate in Huntington, which descended to the heirs, was sold by them prior to the bringing of the action against the administrator, one lot to J. C. Henson, and the remaining ones to C. L. Humphreys and wife, the latter being one of the heirs.

The present suit was instituted January 27, 1916, and the decree complained of pronounced October 27, 1917, decreeing $1,870.60 in plaintiff's favor, apportioning the liability among the several heirs and holding them personally liable for their respective proportions, and decreeing the whole thereof to be a lien on two tracts of land, aggregating 97½ acres in Putnam county, inherited by the heirs, and a lien on certain other lots in Huntington likewise inherited by them, in which said C. L. Humphreys and Anna L. Humphreys, his wife, had purchased the interests of the other heirs of said James T. Mynes, deceased, and directed a sale of said lands to be made, if the decree was not paid in 30 days, selling first the Putnam county land, and second the Huntington lots, if necessary to pay the debt.

[2, 3] There being no privity of estate between the administrator and the heirs, the judgment against the former is not a lien on the lands in the hands of the latter, not even prima facie evidence of debt against them. Board v. Callihan, 33 W. Va. 209, 10 S. E. 382, and Broderick v. Broderick, 28 W. Va. 378. Still there is proper evidence in the case to prove the value of the house, if the loss thereof should fall on the vendor.

Although the authorities are not uniform on the subject, the general rule supported by the weight of the decisions is that from the time of the execution of a valid contract for the sale of land, the purchaser is entitled to any enhancement in its value, and, conversely, must sustain any loss happening thereto, without the fault or neglect of the vendor, after the execution of the contract of sale and before deed is delivered. The application of this rule depends upon the vendor's having good title and an enforceable contract. Here there was a defect in Mynes' title to one of the lots sold or exchanged, but it was curable and was, in fact, cured by the deed of April 12, 1911, from Brown and wife to Maudru.

[4, 5] After the execution of a valid contract of sale and before the legal title passes by deed, the vendor is regarded in equity as holding the legal title in trust for the vendee, and the latter as holding the purchase money in trust for the vendor. The purchaser thereby acquires a vendible interest, an equitable estate which, at his death, descends to his heirs in the same manner as a legal estate. 1 Story on Eq. Juris. (14th Ed.) § 84; 39 Cyc. 1641; 2 Warvelle on Vendors (2d Ed.) § 842; Brewer v. Herbert, 30 Md. 301, 96 Am. Dec. 582; Sewell v. Underhill, 197 N. Y. 168, 90 N. E. 430, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 233, 134 Am. St. Rep. 863, 18 Ann. Cas. 795; Thompson v. Norton, 14 Ind. 187; Marion v. Wolcott, 68 N. J. Eq. 20, 59 Atl. 242; Marks v. Tichenor, 85 Ky. 536, 4 S. W. 225; Walker v. Owen, 79 Mo. 563; Manning v. Insurance Co., 123 Mo. App. 456, 99 S. W. 1095; Woodward v. McCollum et al., 16 N. D. 42, 111 N. W. 623. Numerous other decisions could be cited, but the foregoing are sufficient. This is the rule in England also. See Paine v. Meller, 6 Ves. Jr. 350, and 1 Dart on Vendors and Purchasers (7th Ed.) 287. The foregoing authorities do not make the rule depend upon the transfer of the possession, but rest it upon the rights of the parties under the contract of sale and the ability of the vendor to comply therewith by making good title to the vendee.

[1] There is no warranty or condition in the contract between Mynes and Maudru that the property should be in the same condition when the transaction was completed as it was when the contract was made; Mynes did not guarantee that its then existing condition would continue until the legal title had passed, nor is such guaranty to be implied; neither did the loss occur on account of any negligence or wrongful act of his. It was purely an accident, and in such case equity places the loss upon the vendee, the equitable owner of the property.

The courts of some of the states, however, hold that the loss should fall on the vendor. See Kares v. Covell, 180 Mass. 206, 62 N. E. 244, 91 Am. St. Rep. 271, Wells v. Calnan 107 Mass. 514, 9 Am. Rep. 65, Wilson v. Clark, 60 N.H. 352, Phinlzy v. Guernsey, 111 Ga. 346, 36 S. E. 796, 50 L. R. A. 680, 78 Am. St. Rep. 207, Good v. Jarrard, 93 S. C. 229, 76 S. E. 698, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 383, and Powell v. D. S. & G. R. R. Co., 12 Or. 488, 8 Pac. 544. Some of these cases, however, are distinguishable on other grounds and therefore are really exceptions to the rule rather than authority for a different one. Some of them turn on the point that the vendor, at the time of executing the contract, was not in position to make good title free from incumbrances, according to the terms of his contract.

Having reached the conclusion that Maudru must sustain the loss in this case, it becomes unnecessary to consider other questions raised, for instance, whether or not Humphreys and wife were bona fide purchasers from the other heirs.

The decree must be reversed and plaintiff's bill dismissed.

Pleading \S 356(1) — AMENDMENT TO PETITION — COMPLIANCE WITH ORDER — DISMISSAL.

On the hearing of the demurrers to the petition in this case the following order was passed: "The demurrers, general and special, are sustained, and the petition dismissed, unless within 20 days the plaintiff show substantially the sums going into said transactions, and the dates and payments on same." Within the 20 days an amendment to the petition was offered, and the following order was granted: "The above and foregoing amendment is hereby allowed and order filed by the court, subject to demurrer." Subsequently the demurrant moved that an order be granted dismissing the case as to the demurrant, in accordance with the first order granted in the case. This motion was overruled. Held, that the amendment substantially complied with the first order, and it was not error to refuse to dismiss the case on the motion made.

APPEAL AND ERROR \S 327(5)—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—PARTIES.

A mortgagee instituted in the superior court a proceeding against the administrator of the mortgagor, to foreclose the mortgage; and he prayed for the reformation of the instrument in certain particulars, so as to make the description of the part of the property mortgaged more complete, as well as more definite and specific. He prayed, further, that the heirs at law of the mortgagee, whose names were set forth in the petition, be made parties defendant. These heirs were duly served. Three of them filed a demurrer and answer. Several of them, though served, did not appear and plead. The general demurrer, filed by the heirs who appeared, was sustained. After this an amendment was tendered by the plaintiff, asking that the names of all the heirs be stricken as parties. The court refused to allow the amendment. The plaintiff sued out a writ of error, assigning error upon the rulings just stated. The bill of exceptions was duly served upon the administrator and upon the three heirs who appeared and pleaded; but the other heirs, who were defendants, were not named as parties to the bill of exceptions, nor were they served. Held, that the heirs who were not served with the bill of exceptions were interested in sustaining the judgment rendered, and were necessary parties to the bill of exceptions. Consequently the motion to dismiss the writ of error is sustained. Wiley v. Jones, 129 Ga. 635, 59 S. E. 709; Humphrey v. Powell, 145 Ga. 458, 89 S. E. 427.

FREEMAN v. McKAY. (No. 812.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1919.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)MINES AND MINERALS §58—OIL AND GAS LEASE—PETITION—GENERAL DEMURRER.

The action is by the lessor against the lessee for the cancellation of two leases to the oil and gas which may be in or under certain described lands in Early county, this state. The ground stated in the petition for the relief prayed is alleged fraud practiced upon the lessor by the agent of the lessee in procuring the leases. The petition alleges, in brief, that the plaintiff had no knowledge of what should be embraced in leases for oil and mineral deposits under land, or the prices and conditions upon which they should be executed, and so informed the defendant's agent, and stated that he would have to rely upon the agent's representations as to such matters; that the agent represented to the plaintiff that the terms of the leases which plaintiff executed "were in accordance with what was usual in such cases, and were in every respect reasonable"; that these statements were knowingly false, "for that it was provided in each of said leases * * * that the said defendant is to have, under said leases, the rights in the described lands conveyed for the term of twenty years from the date of the leases, and as much longer as the premises are being drilled or operated for the production of oil, with the right in the grantor to declare a forfeiture unless 'one producing well shall have been completed on the premises described in such lease within two years of the date' of said lease, or unless the grantee should pay a rental of ten cents per acre per year, payable quarterly in advance, so that, under the terms of said leases, the grantee therein could perpetuate the same for twenty years upon the payment of the mere pittance of ten cents per acre per year"; that this stipulation is not usual and reasonable in such cases, as plaintiff has learned since the execution of the leases. The petition alleges and the leases show that the plaintiff should receive a given percentage of the oil produced. The leases were dated April 24, 1917, and the petition to cancel them was filed on October 1, 1917. The action was dismissed on demurrer, and the plaintiff excepted. Held: The terms, stipulations, and conditions of the leases are clear, certain, and unambiguous; there is no suggestion that the plaintiff is not a man of ordinary intelligence, able to read and fully understand all the terms of the leases, which appear to have no purely technical meaning as applied to oil leases; nor was he confronted with any sudden emergency which threw him off his guard; nor was there any trick, artifice, or deception on the part of the defendant's agent, whereby plaintiff was precluded from investigating the agent's representations, or whereby plaintiff was induced to execute the leases without fully acquainting himself by consideration, or advice of others, with their contents, purport, legal and practical meaning and effect. It does not appear that any stipulation between the parties was inadvertently or fraudulently omitted, or that any unintentional provision was inserted through fraud, accident, or mistake. In view of these facts, and of many decisions of this court under like circumstances, it was not error to sustain the general demurrer to the petition.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1919.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §142 — POLICE COMMISSIONER — QUALIFICATION — MEMBERSHIP ON LOCAL DRAFT BOARD.

Membership on a local board created under the provisions of the Selective Draft Act passed by Congress on May 18, 1917 (chapter 15, 40 Stat. 76, U. S. Rev. St. Temp. Supp. 1917, p. 61), did not disqualify the member from holding the position of police commissioner of the city of Atlanta, under the provisions of the charter of that municipality.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Quo warranto by S. R. Johnston against Aldine Chambers. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Atkinson & Born, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Jos. L. Mayson and Jas. K. Hiner, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. Johnston brought quo warranto proceedings to have Chambers declared ineligible for the office of police commissioner of the city of Atlanta, and to oust him from that office. Upon hearing the petition and the evidence, the judge of the superior court refused the application.

It is provided in one section of the charter of the city of Atlanta that—

"It shall be unlawful for any person holding an office or position of trust, or emolument, or regular employment, under appointment by the President of the United States, or any department of the federal government, * * * to occupy or hold the position of mayor, alderman, or councilman of the city of Atlanta, or membership on any executive board of said city, or any other office or position of trust, honor, or emolument, or regular employment in or under said city government, whether said office or position be by election or regular appointment during the time he holds said federal * * * office or position."

It is alleged that at the time of the election of Chambers to the office of police commissioner, and at the time of his induction into the office, he held "an office under the government of the United States, the same being an office and position of trust and emolument under the United States government, that is to say, a member of the local board of division No. 3 for the city of Atlanta in the state of Georgia, the same being the board of exemption from military service created under the laws of the United States, and the said defendant being commissioned thereto, as petitioner is informed and believes, by Hon. William M. Ingraham, Assistant Secretary of War of the United States, by authority of the President of the United States"; and that Chambers entered upon and is still discharging the duties of said office as a member of said exemption board. It is contended by Johnston that the fact that Chambers is a member of the exemption board disqualifies him from holding the office of police commissioner of the city of Atlanta, under that provision of the charter which is set forth above.

With this contention we cannot agree. Membership in one of the exemption boards provided for under the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, known as the "Selective Draft Act" (chapter 15, 40 Stat. 76, U. S. Rev. St. Temp. Supp. 1917, p. 61), is not such an office as would disqualify one holding the membership from holding an office in the city of Atlanta under the provision of the charter referred to. Membership of the board is in its nature temporary and transitory, and purely for an emergency. In the Selective Draft Act, under one section of which the local board referred to was created, the situation or condition is referred to as "the existing emergency." Under another section of the act it is provided (referring to the local and district boards which are to carry out certain of the provisions of the act):

"Such boards shall be appointed by the President, and shall consist of three or more members, none of whom shall be connected with the military establishment, to be chosen from among the local authorities of such subdivisions or from other citizens residing in the subdivision or area in which the respective boards will have jurisdiction."

And under the terms of this act the President was vested with authority to call upon the "local authorities" and officials of the state to act as members of these boards. The duties which those thus called upon were expected to fulfill were of a patriotic nature, from which a citizen could not escape without evading his patriotic duty to aid in a temporary emergency his country and his government, in selecting and organizing an army fit for the high and imperious duty confronting it. The duties which these boards were called upon to perform were of the most exalted character, but they were as transitory and ephemeral as they were exalted; and it was the duty of any citizen called to membership upon one of these boards, whether a private citizen or the holder of any office, to lay aside all other duties for the hour and respond to the call. The court below properly denied the application.

Judgment affirmed.

PEARLSTINE v. PEARLSTINE. (No. 893.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

DIVORCE §64 — "VOLUNTARY SEPARATION AND LIVING APART" — WIFE'S SEPARATE DOMICILE—STATUTE.

In the trial of an action for divorce brought by a wife, the court instructed the jury as follows: "If you find there has been a voluntary separation and living apart between these two people, then the domicile of this plaintiff is not necessarily that of her husband. It is contended that the plaintiff, at one time, was a resident of the state of New York, and that she has changed her domicile." The error assigned upon this instruction, in the motion for a new trial by the husband, was that it was not supported by the evidence, and not adjusted to the facts of the case: "(a) Because the evidence failed to show that there had ever been a voluntary separation and living apart between the plaintiff and the defendant; (b) because the uncontradicted evidence showed that the plaintiff had left the defendant in the state of New York; (c) because the evidence failed to disclose that the defendant ever voluntarily left the plaintiff; and (d) because the evidence disclosed that after the plaintiff had left the home in New York, in which she had been living after the occasion of the alleged cruel treatment, she then maintained an action begun in New York state for separation, and this action was still pending at the time she alleges she came to Georgia and there made up her intention to become a resident of this state." Our statute provides: "The domicile of a married woman shall be that of her husband, except in two cases: (1) Of voluntary separation and living apart. (2) Of a pending application for divorce. In which case her domicile shall be determined as if she were a feme sole." Civil Code 1910, § 2183. The words "voluntary separation and living apart," as employed in the statute, do not necessarily mean a mutual agreement for a separation; for, where the husband has been guilty of such dereliction of duty in the marital relation as entitles the wife to have it either partially or totally dissolved, she may acquire a separate domicile of her own for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction on the proper tribunal in a proceeding for divorce or separation. 14 Cyc. 848, and a number of cases there cited, among them Cheever v. Wilson, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 108 (6), 19 L. Ed. 604. To the same effect is Williamson v. Osenton, 232 U. S. 619, 34 Sup. Ct. 442, 58 L. Ed. 758. To the like effect, see 6 Rose's Notes U. S. R. (Rev. Ed.) 943, where there is a collation of numerous cases on the same line as those above cited.

None of the assignments of error upon the instruction excepted to is meritorious. The evidence on the controlling issues in the case was conflicting. The jury in their discretion believed the evidence submitted in behalf of the plaintiff, and it cannot be held that the court erred in refusing a new trial.

In an action upon a life insurance policy, the petition was dismissed upon special demurrer, which ruling was affirmed by this court. 144 Ga. 534, 87 S. E. 668. Subsequently the plaintiff brought a second action on the same policy, and the defendant pleaded the judgment dismissing the former action as res adjudicata. The trial judge who passed on the case without a jury sustained the plea. Upon review by the Court of Appeals the judgment of the trial court was reversed. 21 Ga. App. 777, 95 S. E. 268. The case came before this court on certiorari. The original petition having been dismissed on special demurrer, and not on general demurrer going to the merits of the case, it was properly decided, on writ of error, that the trial judge erred in sustaining the plea of res adjudicata; and that decision is affirmed.

EQUITY \S 39(1) — INJUNCTION \S 118(4) — PROSECUTION OF SUIT—JURISDICTION—FULL RELIEF.

"Equity seeks always to do complete justice, and having the parties before the court rightfully, it will proceed to give full relief to all parties in reference to the subject-matter of the suit, provided the court has jurisdiction for that purpose." Markham v. Huff, 72 Ga. 874. Applying this principle to the facts as alleged in the petition in the instant case, the plaintiff should have been allowed to maintain the action, and it should not have been dismissed upon general demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by W. W. Kirkpatrick against J. H. Holland. Demurrer to petition sustained, and petition dismissed, and plaintiff excepts and brings error. Reversed.

Kirkpatrick brought his petition against Holland, who filed a demurrer, which demurrer the court sustained, and dismissed the action. To this order the plaintiff excepted. The petitioner showed that the defendant had filed suit against petitioner in the municipal court of Atlanta to recover the sum of $390, with interest, which defendant claimed to have paid petitioner under a contract of sale of certain land; that petitioner demurred to that suit, and answered, denying liability; that the demurrer to that suit was overruled; that on the trial judgment was rendered in favor of petitioner; and that a new trial was granted, and the case was in order for trial again in the municipal court. It is further alleged that the petitioner holds purchase-money notes against the defendant, in the principal sum of $710, growing out of the same contract set up by the defendant in his suit in the municipal court; that it is the right of petitioner to file a cross-action in the municipal court and recover upon said notes in the same action brought against him by the defendant, but that on account of the limited jurisdiction of the municipal court, which does not exceed $500 in amount, petitioner cannot file his cross-action upon the notes; and that in order to obtain full relief it is necessary for him to invoke the aid of a court of equity, procure a restraining order against the prosecution of the suit in the municipal court, and have all the issues between the parties adjudicated in the equitable proceeding.

Green, Tilson & McKinney, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Burruss & Dillard, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). We are of the opinion that the court erred in sustaining the general demurrer in this case. Holland, the plaintiff in the pending suit in the municipal court, had sued Kirkpatrick to recover certain payments made upon the purchase price of a lot of land. He claimed in that suit that the vendor, Kirkpatrick, could not comply with his undertaking in the bond for title, relating to the laying of certain sidewalks and the improvement of the street, and the laying of certain mains and sewers without cost to the purchaser; that he was therefore entitled to recover the money which had been paid on the purchase; and that the bond for title had been tendered back to Kirkpatrick, accompanied with the demand that Kirkpatrick return to Holland the unpaid notes for the purchase money. If the case in the municipal court should be tried and gained by Kirkpatrick, he would still have to bring another suit in a court having jurisdiction of the amount to enforce a demand against the defendant. The petitioner's claim, that the defendant is indebted to him $710 upon the promissory notes, and the issue made by the suit against the present plaintiff in the municipal court, can all be adjudicated in this one case when the defendant, Holland, shall have filed his answer and raised the issues of fact which he seeks to have adjudicated in the suit in the municipal court. And this full and complete relief can be afforded to both of these parties in the one action. Why have two trials, when one in the superior court will end the entire controversy between these litigants, especially where the demands of each grow out of the same transaction? Lewis v. State, 33 Ga. 132; National Bank of Athens v. Carlton, 96 Ga. 469, 23 S. E. 388 (3).

NATIONAL LIFE INS. CO. OF VERMONT
v. BECK & GREGG HARDWARE CO.
et al. (No. 932.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE — 121, 203 — LIFE INSURANCE — ASSIGNABILITY.

On June 4, 1907, the National Life Insurance Company of Vermont issued a "renewable term policy" on the life of Martin H. Roop payable to "the executors, administrators, or assigns of the insured," for a stated amount in consideration of specified premiums. The contract of insurance contained the clause: "The insured may renew this policy for further periods of ten years each, without medical examination (provided there has been no lapse in the payment of premiums), by written notice to the company at its home office before the expiration of any period of the insurance hereunder, and by the payment in each year, on the dates above specified, of the premium for the age attained by the insured at the beginning of any such renewal period in accordance with the table of rates on the back hereof." On September 21, 1907, the insured made a written assignment of the policy to Beck & Gregg Hardware Company, as collateral security for a debt, which assignment was acknowledged by the insurer, in writing entered thereon, to be "received and original filed this 27th day of September A. D. 1907, assuming no responsibility as to its validity." The assignment was of "all my right, title, and interest in and to said policy or contract of insurance (except that the cash value of all dividends from the surplus apportioned to this contract may be used by the insured) subject to all of its conditions and to the rules and regulations of the said National Life Insurance Company." Held, the "assigns" of the insured being included among the beneficiaries of the policy, the contract should be construed as contemplating assignment by the insured, and it was assignable. Rylander v. Allen, 125 Ga. 206, 53 S. E. 1032, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 128, 5 Ann. Cas. 355.

2. INSURANCE — 213 — LIFE INSURANCE — ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY — "ALL RIGHT, TITLE, AND INTEREST."

The assignment of "all my right, title, and interest in and to said policy or contract of insurance," as employed in the written assignment, was an assignment of every right the insured had under the policy, including the right to maintain the life of the policy by payment of premiums, and to make a written demand for renewal of the policy for ten-year periods.

3. INSURANCE — 219 — CONTRACT OF LIFE INSURANCE — REFUSAL OF EXTENSION.

When the company refused to grant such extension after demand and compliance with the stipulated conditions as to payment of premiums, specific performance at the instance of the assignee was an available remedy.

4. PLEADING — 64(1) — MULTIFARIOUSNESS — ALTERNATIVE PRAYER.

A suit instituted by the assignee for specific performance against the company and the assignor, which contained an alternative prayer for damages on account of premiums paid by the assignee on faith of the assignment, was not multifarious.

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE OF INSURANCE CONTRACT—JUDGMENT.

Applying the principles announced in the preceding notes, there was no error in overruling the demurrer to the petition, and in rendering judgment for the plaintiff upon the trial of the case submitted to the judge without the intervention of the jury on the agreed statement of facts.

DEATON v. DAY. (No. 879.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐781(1)—REVERSAL—COSTS.

J. F. Day instituted an action of complaint for land, and for mesne profits alleged to be of the yearly value of $25, against Marcena Majors. The defendant set up a judgment setting apart the land as dower from her deceased husband's estate. At the conclusion of the evidence at the trial, the plaintiff disclaimed all right of mesne profits, and a verdict was directed in his favor for the land. The defendant made a motion for new trial, and excepted to the judgment overruling the same. While the case was pending in the Supreme Court the plaintiff in error died, and the administrator upon her estate was made a party plaintiff in error. Upon the call of the case for hearing the defendant in error moved to dismiss the writ of error, on the ground that the dower estate had terminated and no interest passed to the administrator. In response to the motion it was not made to appear that the estate of the widow had any further interest in the property or other property right involved. Held:

Under the circumstances a reversal of the judgment could not affect any right other than the payment of costs.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐781(1)—DENIAL OF NEW TRIAL—REVERSAL—COSTS.

The judgment refusing a new trial will not be reversed merely to enable the movant to recover costs. Tabor v. Hipp, 136 Ga. 123, 70 S. E. 886, Ann. Cas. 1912O, 246; Carter v. Gabrels, 136 Ga. 177, 71 S. E. 3; A. & W. P. R. Co. v. Golightly, 148 Ga. 582, 97 S. E. 516. Accordingly the motion to dismiss must prevail.

Error from Superior Court, Forsyth County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by J. F. Day against Marcena Majors. Verdict directed for plaintiff, motion for new trial overruled, and defendant excepts and brings error, and after her death N. G. Deaton, her administrator, was made a party plaintiff in error. Writ of error dismissed.

H. L. Patterson, of Cumming, for plaintiff in error.

Geo. F. Gober and W. I. Heyward, both of Atlanta, and C. L. Harris, of Cumming, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. Writ of error dismissed. All the Justices concur.

FORDHAM v. STATE. (No. 941.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUDGES ⇐47(1)—QUALIFICATION—FORMER ACTION AS ATTORNEY.

The fact that an attorney at law instituted a number of suits in favor of the holders of certain promissory notes, to whom the notes had been transferred by a bank as collateral security, against the makers of the notes and the bank, in which it was alleged that the bank was insolvent, did not disqualify the attorney, after severance of his relation with the case and subsequent elevation to the bench, from presiding as judge at the trial of an officer of the bank indicted under Pen. Code 1910, § 204, charging that the bank had become insolvent while defendant was such officer.

2. CRIMINAL LAW ⇐1151—DENIAL OF CONTINUANCE—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—REVIEW.

A motion for a continuance is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court, and his judgment overruling the motion will not be disturbed unless it appears that there was a manifest abuse of his discretion. Under the evidence submitted in support of the motion to continue, there was no abuse of discretion in refusing the motion. Leathers v. Leathers, 132 Ga. 211, 63 S. E. 1118; Carter v. Pitts, 125 Ga.

793, 54 S. E. 695; Dale v. Beasley, 141 Ga. 594, 81 S. E. 849.

3. JURY \Leftrightarrow 90—DISQUALIFICATION—RELATIONSHIP.

On the trial of a case of the character mentioned in the first headnote, a juror who is related within the prohibited degrees to a stockholder or depositor in the insolvent bank is disqualified. Pen. Code 1910, § 999, par. 4; Bank of the University v. Tuck, 107 Ga. 211, 33 S. E. 70; McElhannon v. State, 99 Ga. 672, 26 S. E. 501; Moore v. Farmers', etc., Ins. Co., 107 Ga. 199, 33 S. E. 65; Lyens v. State, 133 Ga. 600, 66 S. E. 792.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW \Leftrightarrow 250, 266—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS—PUNISHMENT OF OFFICERS OF INSOLVENT BANK.

Section 204 of the Penal Code of 1910, which declares that "every insolvency of a chartered bank, or refusal or failure to redeem its bills on demand, either with specie or current bank-bills passing at par value, shall be deemed fraudulent, and the president and directors shall be severally punished by imprisonment and labor in the penitentiary for not less than one year nor longer than ten years: Provided, that the defendant may repel the presumption of fraud, by showing that the affairs of the bank have been fairly and legally administered, and generally with the same care and diligence that agents, receiving a commission for their services, are required and bound by law to observe; and upon such showing the jury shall acquit the prisoner"—is not violative of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States on the ground that it denies to persons indicted thereunder due process of law or equal protection of the law. Griffin v. State, 142 Ga. 636, 83 S. E. 540, L. R. A. 1915C, 716, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 80.

(a) The decision of McFarland v. American Sugar Refining Co., 241 U. S. 79, 36 Sup. Ct. 498, 60 L. Ed. 899, dealt with a statute which was construed differently from the construction placed upon Pen. Code 1910, § 204, by this court in Griffin v. State, supra; and while, on the construction placed upon the different statutes, the results were not the same, there was no conflict of principle in the rulings in the two cases.

(b) There was no error in overruling the demurrer to the indictment.

5. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The grounds of the motion for new trial, relating to rulings upon admissibility of evidence, to the charge of the court, other than that dealt with in the note next following, and to the refusal to charge, in so far as they were sufficient to present any question for decision, show no cause for reversal.

6. BANKS AND BANKING \Leftrightarrow 84—INSOLVENCY—CRIMINAL LIABILITY OF OFFICERS—CAPITAL STOCK.

The capital stock of a bank issued and paid for is not a liability that should be included and taken into account in determining the question of solvency or insolvency of the bank, on the trial of one of its officers indicted under Pen. Code 1910, § 204.

Error from Superior Court, Wheeler County; D. A. R. Crum, Judge.

J. B. Fordham was prosecuted for being an officer of a bank when it became fraudulently insolvent, and from the judgment he brings error. Reversed.

Jas. K. Hines, of Atlanta, and W. W. Bennett, of Baxley, for plaintiff in error.

S. D. Dell, Sol. Gen., pro tem., of Hazlehurst, for the State.

ATKINSON, J. [1-5] 1-5. The rulings announced in the first five headnotes do not require elaboration.

[6] 6. The indictment charged that the bank did "become fraudulently insolvent," while the defendant was an officer thereof; and a material question was whether the bank was insolvent within the meaning of the Penal Code, § 204, quoted in the fourth headnote. The judge charged:

"The stock of a bank issued and paid for is a liability that should be included and taken into account in determining the question of solvency or insolvency."

Error was assigned upon this charge, on the ground that it did not state the law. A similar charge was involved in Spence v. State, 20 Ga. App. 61, 92 S. E. 555. The majority ruled that the assignment of error based on the ground of the motion for new trial complaining of the charge had been abandoned, and did not rule upon the question. Judge George filed a specially concurring opinion, holding that the assignment of error was not abandoned, and stating reasons why the charge was erroneous. In the course of his opinion it was said:

"Does this charge lay down a correct test by which the solvency of a chartered bank is to be determined? Is a bank solvent only when its assets are sufficient to pay not only its creditors, including depositors, but its stockholders as well? If this rigid test is to be applied, every bank, immediately upon its organization, will be found to be insolvent. Furniture and fixtures and general supplies must be purchased by every bank commencing business. A newly organized bank would hardly, in any case, be able to dispose of its furniture and fixtures, to say nothing of its general supplies, at cost. The officers and directors of a bank usually own a large part of its capital stock. It is stretching the law too far to say that bank officers and directors owning a large percentage of the stock of the bank become criminals the moment its assets fall below its liabilities, including the liability of the bank upon the stock held by such officers and directors. The individual stockholders and the corporation are not one and the same, it is true; but if the officers of a bank, who own practically its entire capital stock, are able to pay, out of its assets, all creditors of the bank, they ought neither to be presumed nor held guilty of the offense declared in section 204 if the assets of the bank are insufficient to pay the stockholders, including themselves. If, on account of the fraudulent acts of the officials, the assets of the bank are insufficient to pay the general creditors of the bank, including the depositors, such officials are criminally liable. If, through the criminal conduct of the officers and directors of the bank, its capital stock is impaired, the stockholder has his recourse against such officials under other sections of our Penal Code. The capital stock, it is true, is both an asset and a liability upon the civil side of the law, but to regard the stock as a liability in determining the solvency of a bank under the Penal Code section referred to is, in the opinion of the writer, untenable. No consideration of public policy requires such a construction of this section of the Code. The stockholders in a banking corporation become such for pecuniary gain to themselves. In no other corporation are stockholders, by any section of the Code, given the benefit which the charge of the trial court in this case affords the holders and owners of bank stock. Sound public policy will protect the owners of bank stock no further than the owner of any other corporate stock. He must look for his protection to the embezzlement statutes and other statutes enacted for his benefit, and to the honesty of the officials of his own choosing. Further, an individual is not considered insolvent so long as he is able to pay his creditors. A corporation should not be considered insolvent so long as the corporation is able to pay out of its assets, including its original capital stock, all of its creditors. The stockholder is in no proper sense a creditor of the bank."

There might be elaboration; but the reasoning there stated sufficiently shows that the liability of a bank to its stockholders on shares of stock fully paid for should not be taken into account as a debt of the bank in ascertaining its insolvency within the meaning of the statute, which is highly penal and is to be strictly construed.

Judgment reversed.

HOLSTON NAT. BANK v. HOWARD et al.
(No. 994.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL §253(1)—CHARGE OF COURT—CORRECTNESS.

"It is no valid ground of criticism upon a charge, correct and proper in itself, that it fails to state some other rule or principle of law pertinent to the issues of the case." Powers v. State, 138 Ga. 624, 75 S. E. 651 (4).

Applying this principle, the criticism of the charge made in the third, fourth, and fifth grounds of the motion for new trial show no cause for reversal.

2. CHARGE OF COURT.

The charge relative to the purposes for which certain reports to a bank and a commercial agency were admitted was somewhat confusing; but, considered in the light of the pleadings and evidence and the entire charge, it did not so restrict the purposes for which the evidence could be considered as to show cause for a reversal.

3. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Other grounds of the amended motion for new trial are without merit, and not of such character as to require special mention.

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and there was no error in refusing the plaintiff's motion for new trial.

1. EXECUTION §53—JUDGMENT FOR DEBT—SECURITY—LEVY.

An execution issued upon a judgment rendered for a debt secured by a deed made to realty cannot be levied upon the realty conveyed as security until after the creditor has executed, filed, and had recorded a deed reconveying the property to the debtor; and a sale of the property made under a levy thereon, when no reconveyance has been previously made, filed, and recorded, would be void. Coates v. Jones, 142 Ga. 237, 82 S. E. 649. Applying the ruling just announced to the facts of this case, the court erred in directing a verdict finding the property levied on subject to the execution.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR §302(3) — MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY.

A ground of a motion for a new trial complaining of the admission of "parol evidence of an alleged year's support * * * in the property in question," without setting forth such evidence or its substance, presents no question for adjudication.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR §302(3) — MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY.

A ground of a motion for a new trial alleging error of the court in refusing to admit a certain administrator's deed because "the decree in equity upon which same was based did not authorize the sale," where neither such decree or its substance was set forth in the motion, is insufficient to raise any point for decision.

2. BANKRUPTCY \S 398(2)—"JUDGMENT FOR PURCHASE MONEY"—ACTION IN TORT.

Where the seller of personal property brings an action in trover against one not the original purchaser, to recover the property or its value, a money judgment therein is not a "judgment for purchase money."

Error from Superior Court, Carroll County; G. H. Howard, Judge.

Petition by the American Slicing Machine Company, the National Cash Register Company, and Frank W. Burr against N. A. Williams. Judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and defendant excepts and brings error. Judgment affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

Smith & Smith, of Carrollton, for plaintiff in error.

Buford Boykin, of Carrollton, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. The American Slicing Machine Company, the National Cash Register Company, and Frank W. Burr brought an equitable petition against N. A. Williams, alleging that he was indebted to them respectively in certain amounts specified, had been duly adjudged a bankrupt in the District Court of the United States, and that in the bankruptcy proceedings a homestead exemption had been set apart to him out of certain named personal property. It was sought to enjoin the trustee from delivering the property so set apart to the bankrupt, and to have a receiver appointed for it, in order that it might be subjected to the claims of petitioners, who averred that their claim was superior to the homestead claim. In some way the American Slicing Machine Company seems to have been eliminated from the case, and it was agreed that Burr have a verdict subjecting the property. No objection seems to have been made to the pleadings on the ground of misjoinder of parties plaintiff.

The claim of the National Cash Register Company was resisted, but a verdict in its favor was rendered, and a decree was entered giving to that plaintiff a judgment in rem, which was declared to be a lien on the property set apart to the bankrupt. The defendant excepted.

[1, 2] The petition alleged that the defendant was indebted to the National Cash Register Company in the sum of $70, plus interest at 7 per cent. since December 16, 1915, "said indebtedness being due for one register, and being judgment rendered by the city court of Carrollton on above date." In paragraph 7 of the petition it was alleged that the account due the National Cash Register Company was for the purchase price of "one cash register valued in his homestead exemption at $40." It appeared in the evidence that the cash register in question had been purchased by Williams from a third person; and that the judgment upon which the company declared in the equitable suit was rendered in a trover suit brought by the company in the city court of Carrollton, in which it was alleged that Williams was in possession of the register, that it was the property of the plaintiff and of the value of one hundred dollars, and that the plaintiff claimed title thereto. The plaintiff having obtained judgment, an execution for the sum of $70 principal was issued thereon, and was levied upon the cash register in question, which, at the sale under the execution, was bought by Williams for $40, which sum was credited on the execution; and the deficiency still due thereon was the basis of the claim to a judgment in rem against the exempted property.

In order for the superior court legally to decree a lien on the property which the bankrupt claimed as an exemption, the claim which the plaintiff was urging against the bankrupt must have been one which was superior to the bankrupt's right of homestead under the laws of this state. In the present case it was alleged to be superior to the exemption, on the ground that it represented purchase money of the cash register which the bankrupt scheduled among his assets. We cannot see, however, how an alternative judgment for the money value of property in an action for tort, which is the character of a trover suit, can be said to be in any sense a judgment for purchase money. Purchase money is defined as being "the original debt or consideration which the purchaser agrees to pay for a thing in money." See Bouvier's Law Dic. (3d Ed.) 2772; also Taylor v. Allen, 131 Ga. 416, 62 S. E. 291, in which it was said that the purchase money of land included only the actual consideration paid for the land. In Hoyt v. Van Alstyne, 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 568, it was ruled:

"Where an execution is issued upon a judgment recovered in an action for taking personal property without the consent of the owner, and converting and disposing of the same, such execution is not to be considered as issued on a demand for the purchase money of the property, so as to bring the case within the proviso of the first section of the exemption act."

In the present case it does not appear that N. A. Williams ever purchased the cash register from the National Cash Register Company, or that there was any privity of contract between them. On the contrary, the only evidence of any dealings between them consists in the proceedings in the suit in trover, in which the company was suing him as a tort-feasor, to recover the cash register or its value. Certainly a judgment rendered in that action was not one for purchase money.

The judgment in favor of Burr was based upon notes which contained a homestead waiver, and was rendered by consent. That part of the judgment decreeing a lien in his favor against the exempt property is affirmed; but the judgment is reversed in so far as it declares a lien in favor of the National Cash Register Company as against the exemption set apart to the bankrupt.

Judgment affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

1. FINES — 20 — DISPOSITION — COSTS IN CRIMINAL CASES—"INSOLVENT COSTS."

The costs accruing in favor of the clerk of the city court of Eastman in criminal cases, on motions for new trial and for transmitting the records therein to this court, where the defendants have been convicted and the judgment has been affirmed by this court, and executions have been issued against the defendants primarily liable therefor, and returns of nulla bona made thereon by the sheriff, are "insolvent costs," within the meaning of section 1113 of the Penal Code of 1910, and as such are entitled to participate in the fine and forfeiture fund of that court.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Insolvent (Criminal Costs.)]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. COSTS — 292—CRIMINAL PROCESS—"FINAL TRIAL."

Under Pen. Code 1910, § 1105, providing that costs of a prosecution, except fees of his own witnesses, shall not be demanded of a defendant until after conviction on "final trial," that term means such trial in the court having original trial jurisdiction as is the basis of entry of judgment finally disposing of action in that court, and does not apply to proceedings in appellate court.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Final Hearing or Trial.]

Error from City Court of Eastman; O. W. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Bob Wynne, Clerk of the City Court of Eastman, against D. D. Smith, Solicitor. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

J. H. Milner, of Eastman, for plaintiff in error.

D. D. Smith, of Eastman, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, J. No question is made in this case as to the correctness of the items contained in the bill of costs presented by the clerk, or as to whether the items are properly chargeable as costs, but the sole question to be determined is whether or not insolvent costs accruing in favor of the clerk in criminal cases subsequent to conviction, where the judgment is affirmed, are to be treated as "insolvent costs" within the meaning of section 1113 of the Penal Code of 1910, so as to be entitled to participate in the fine and forfeiture fund. Section 1105 of the Penal Code provides that:

"The costs of a prosecution, except the fees of his own witnesses, shall not be demanded of a defendant until after conviction on final trial. If convicted, judgment may be entered up against him for all costs accruing in the committing or superior courts, and by any officer pending the prosecution. The judgment shall have a lien on all the property of the defendant from the date of his arrest, and the clerk shall issue an execution, on the judgment, against said property. The court may also direct the defendant to be imprisoned until all costs are paid."

[1, 2] It is contended by the defendant that under the terms of this section, the only costs entitled to participate in the fine and forfeiture fund are such insolvent costs as accrue in the trial court up to the time of conviction in that court; but with this contention we cannot agree. Under this section of the Code, no judgment for any of the costs can be taken until after conviction on final trial; but the words "final trial," as here used, mean "such trial, in the court having original trial jurisdiction of the case, as is the basis of the entry of judgment finally disposing of the action in such court, and do not apply to proceedings in an appellate court." Wynne v. Stonecypher, 146 Ga. 5, 90 S. E. 234. It was also held in that case that:

"Where no supersedeas is obtained, the clerk of the trial court is entitled to have judgment awarded against the defendant for the costs accruing in connection with his prosecution of a writ of error to the Court of Appeals while his case is pending in that court."

If a supersedeas be obtained (as was done by each of the defendants in the cases now involved), a judgment cannot be taken for any of the costs until the case is disposed of by the reviewing court. Thus, at the first opportunity which the clerk had for taking a judgment for his costs, the costs to which he is entitled on motions for new trial and for transmitting the records to this court had already accrued in the court below, and the Code section above quoted provides that, if the defendant is convicted, judgment may be entered up against him for all costs accruing in the committing or superior courts. Nothing in this section limits the right to take a judgment for costs to such costs only as accrue up to the time of conviction in the trial court, but to the contrary it provides that upon conviction, judgment may be entered up against the defendant for all costs accruing in the trial court, and certainly the costs here claimed accrued in the court below.

Section 1113, supra, is as follows:

"In cases where a bill of indictment is preferred and not found true by the grand jury, or where a defendant shall be acquitted by a jury, or where persons liable by law for the payment of costs shall be unable to pay the same [italics ours], the officers severally entitled to such costs may present an account therefor to the judge of the court in which the prosecutions were pending, which, being examined and allowed by him, he shall order to be paid in the manner prescribed by law, and such account and order shall be entered on the minutes of the court."

There is no contention in this case that the several defendants in the cases in which costs are claimed are not "liable by law for the payment of such costs," and it is conceded that they are "unable to pay the same," since executions have been issued against the several defendants primarily liable therefor, and returns of nulla bona made thereon by the sheriff. How, then, can it be said that the costs claimed are not insolvent costs? In this section of the Code there is no provision whereby the only costs which may be considered as insolvent costs are those accruing up to the time of conviction in the lower court, and it would seem to us that the costs claimed are properly so chargeable, and as such are entitled to participate in the fine and forfeiture fund. Section 1114 of the Penal Code provides that:

"Money arising from fines, or collected on forfeited recognizances in the superior courts, or for a violation of the penal laws, shall be first applied to the extinguishment of the insolvent lists of the officers bringing it into court and those of justices and constables pro rata, and then to the orders of former officers in proportion to their claims."

See, also, Mayor, etc., of Macon v. Hoge, 71 Ga. 696, 698, where it was said that the state—

"has made provision to compensate all her officers who aid in the administration of penal laws; no service is required of any of them, with a very few exceptions, for which compensation is not provided."

It is there held that:

"The officers of the superior, city and county courts have recourse to the funds arising from fines and forfeitures in the respective courts, to pay costs where they cannot be collected from defendants in criminal proceedings."

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the judge erred in refusing to audit and approve the claim as presented by the clerk.

Judgment reversed.

SOUTHERN EXPRESS CO. v. STATE (No. 10132.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 1, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS \Leftrightarrow 138—OFFENSES —TRANSPORTATION.

Under the act passed by the General Assembly of the state of Georgia at its extraordinary session held in March, 1917, pure alcohol for medicinal purposes cannot be legally shipped from one point to another, both of which are in the state of Georgia.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS \Leftrightarrow 138—OFFENSES —TRANSPORTATION—POSSESSION AND CONTROL.

Under the law referred to above, the act of transporting alcoholic liquors is a separate and distinct offense from that of having, controlling, and possessing such liquors.

Stephens, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

The Southern Express Company was convicted of unlawfully transporting, and of having control and possession of intoxicating liquors, and it brings error. Affirmed.

The Southern Express Company was indicted for a violation of the law passed by the General Assembly of the state of Georgia at its extraordinary session held in March, 1917 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1917, p. 7). The indictment contained two counts, the first charging that the Southern Express Company "did then and there transport, ship, and carry from Valdosta, Ga., to Camilla, Ga., both being points within this state, spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, alcoholic, and intoxicating liquors and beverages, the last-named point, to wit, Camilla, Ga., being in the county of Mitchell, and said defendants did so transport, ship and carry said liquors and beverages in the said county of Mitchell." The second count alleged that said company did "unlawfully and with force and arms, in the county aforesaid, have, control, and possess spirituous, alcoholic and intoxicating liquors." The case was submitted to the judge on the following agreed statement of facts:

"The Southern Express Company was a corporation and common carrier at all times herein mentioned. In April, 1917, said express company received for transportation, from the Mashburn Drug Company, which was at all times herein mentioned a wholesale druggist of Valdosta, Ga., at said Valdosta, Ga., one gallon of pure alcohol, to be transported by said Southern Express Company to Dr. H. G. Fussell at Camilla, Ga., and did transport the same from said Southern Express Company's office in Valdosta, Ga., to its office in Camilla, Ga., in Mitchell county. Said alcohol was not delivered by said express company to Dr. Fussell, but was seized in the office of said express company by the sheriff at Camilla, Ga. Dr. Fussell was at all times mentioned herein a practicing physician of Camilla, Ga., but was not a pharmacist or apothecary holding license as such from the state board of pharmacy, but kept a stock of drugs and medicines, costing at wholesale from $100 to $200 in his office at Camilla, Ga., for use in putting up his own prescriptions and dispensing medicines from his own office, and in his practice of his profession as a doctor of medicine; and said alcohol was wanted by him for medicinal purposes in connection with said stock of drugs and medicines. He had ordered the same from said Mashburn Drug Company of Valdosta, Ga., and the Southern Express Company did transport the same for said Dr. Fussell, from said Mashburn Drug Company, which was undertaking to fill said order therefor. Camilla and Valdosta are both points within the state of Georgia, and said alcohol was conveyed from Valdosta, Ga., to Camilla, Ga., and into the county of Mitchell, and was in said Southern Express Company's custody at its office in Camilla, in Mitchell county, for the purpose aforesaid, when seized by the sheriff. Subsequently said Fussell applied in due form to the ordinary of Mitchell county, for a permit to receive said alcohol for medicinal purposes, stating in said application that the business or occupation of applicant was that of a physician, said application being supported in due form by the affidavits of said Fussell and a certificate of two citizens of Mitchell county, as required by law, and said application was approved and granted by said ordinary, and said sheriff then delivered said alcohol to said Fussell. All of the above-stated transactions occurred in the month of April, 1917, and prior to April 11, 1917, the date when said special presentment was returned and filed. Neither said defendant nor any agent or officer thereof intended to violate any law in said transaction, or knew that it was a violation of the law to do any of said things, if it was such in fact."

The trial judge rendered a judgment against the defendant, and it excepted.

Pope & Bennet, of Albany, and Robt. C. & Phillip H. Alston, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

R. C. Bell, Sol. Gen., of Cairo, and F. A. Hooper, of Atlanta, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. In the brief of one of the counsel for the plaintiff in error, the issue to be settled is thus stated:

"The case can be stated in one question, to wit: Can a wholesale druggist doing business in Georgia ship alcohol under the restrictions contained in section three of the act of the Legislature of the state of Georgia approved March 28, 1917, to a practicing physician who is the sole proprietor of a drug store in the state of Georgia?"

Under the act above referred to we are convinced that the question propounded by counsel for the plaintiff in error must be answered in the negative. Section 1 of said act is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Georgia, and it is hereby enacted by authority of the same, that from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, corporation, firm or individual to transport, ship or carry, by any means whatsoever, with or without hire, or cause the same to be done, from any point without this state to any point within this state, or from place to place within this state, whether intended for personal use or otherwise, any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented or intoxicating liquors, or any of the prohibited liquors or beverages, as are defined in the act approved November 17, 1915, being 'An act to make clearer and more certain' the prohibition laws of this state, etc., or any alcoholic compound or malt or liquors whether intended for beverage purposes or not, but which can be diluted, and when so diluted may be used as a beverage and will produce intoxication. It shall be unlawful for any corporation, firm, person or individual to receive from any common carrier, corporation, firm, person or individual, or to have, control or possess, in this state, any of said enumerated liquors or beverages whether intended for personal use or otherwise, save as is hereinafter excepted."

It will be noticed that the first portion of the above section of the act deals with the transportation of intoxicating liquors, and absolutely prohibits their transportation "from any point without this state to any point within this state, or from place to place within this state." (Italics ours.) The liquors "defined in the act approved November 17, 1915," just referred to, embrace all kinds of intoxicating liquors, as follows:

"(1) Alcohol, alcoholic liquors, spirituous liquors and all mixed liquors, any part of which is spirituous, foreign or domestic spirits, or rectified or distilled spirits; absinthe, whisky, brandy, rum and gin; (2) vinous liquors and beverages; (3) all malted, fermented or brewed liquors of any name or description, manufactured from malt, wholly or in part, such as beer, lager beer, near beer, porter and ale and all brewed or fermented liquors and beverages in which maltose is a substantial ingredient, whether alcoholic or not or whether intoxicating or not; (4) and any drinks, liquors or beverages containing one-half of one per cent. of alcohol or more by volume at 60 degrees Fahrenheit; or any other liquids or liquors manufactured or sold, or otherwise disposed of, for beverage purposes, containing said amount of one-half of one per cent. of alcohol or more; (5) any intoxicating bitters or beverages by whatever name called; (6) all liquors and beverages or drinks made in imitation of or intended as a substitute for beer, ale, wine or whisky, or other alcoholic or spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, including those liquors and beverages commonly known and called near beer." Ga. Laws 1915, Ex. Sess. p. 79, § 1.

Thus it will be seen that if section 1 of the act approved March 28, 1917, stood alone, it would absolutely prevent the transportation of alcohol "from any point without this state to any point within this state, or from place to place within this state." Section 2 of the act approved March 28, 1917, is as follows:

"Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that nothing herein contained shall prohibit the use of pure alcohol for medicinal purposes as is prescribed in sections 426, 427, 428, 429 and 430 of the Criminal Code of 1910, said alcohol, however, to be shipped, received and possessed only as is provided in section 3 of this act."

It will be observed that this section provides for "the use of pure alcohol for medicinal purposes as is prescribed in sections 426, 427, 428, 429 and 430 of the Criminal Code of 1910." Section 430 of the Criminal Code just referred to is as follows:

"Nothing in the preceding sections of this article shall be so construed as to prevent wholesale druggists from selling or furnishing alcohol in wholesale quantities to regular licensed retail druggists, or to public or charity hospitals, or to medical or pharmaceutical colleges. All wholesale druggists shall be required to keep a complete record of all their sales of alcohol, which record shall at all times be open for inspection to the regular authorities of such counties or cities in which such wholesale stores are located."

The mention of section 430 in section 2 of the act approved March 28, 1917, causes counsel for plaintiff in error to insist that section 2 of the act approved March 28, 1917, among other things, "preserved the life of sections 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, of the Criminal Code of 1910, and added thereto by reference the provisions which are set out in section 3. It thereby brought into section 2 the terms of section 3. The purpose of this was to make the same requirements as to shipments of alcohol from points within the state to other points within the state as was required as to shipments from points without the state to points within the state." We cannot agree with this conclusion of learned counsel. While section 2 of the act approved March 28, 1917, provides for the use of pure alcohol, as provided in sections 426 to 430, inclusive, of the Penal Code of 1910, this same section provides that:

"Said alcohol, however, to be shipped, received and possessed only as is provided in section three of this act." (Italics ours.)

The word "only" as here used is exclusive, and while under this section (2 of the act of 1917) alcoholic liquors after being received can be used as prescribed by sections 426 to 430, inclusive, they can be "shipped, received and possessed only as is provided in section 3 of this act." What does section 3 of said act say in reference to shipping alcohol? So much thereof as is necessary for determination of the question at issue is as follows:

"Any common carrier may transport, ship or carry from any point without this state, to any point within this state, pure alcohol to be received only by any practicing physician who is the sole proprietor of a drug store, licensed druggists, pharmacists, manufacturers, chartered colleges, chartered hospitals, or state institutions, and to be used only for medicinal, mechanical and scientific purposes not contravening in any way the prohibition laws of this state, under the following conditions [then follow the conditions]."

This section does not make any provision whatever for the shipping of alcohol "from place to place within this state." Construing together sections 1, 2, and 3 of the act under consideration, it seems to us that the only logical conclusion that can be reached is that pure alcohol for medicinal purposes can be "shipped, received and possessed" only when transported, shipped, or carried "from any point without this state to any point within this state."

[2] 2. Under the act approved March 28, 1917, the act of transporting alcoholic liquors as set out in the first count of the indictment is a separate and distinct offense from that of having, controlling, and possessing alcoholic liquors as charged in the second count thereof.

3. The agreed statement of facts shows that the defendant was guilty on both counts of the indictment, and the judgment is affirmed.

BROYLES, P. J., concurs.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). The questions here presented for determination are: First, Is it a violation of the criminal laws of this state for a common carrier, upon the conditions set forth in the agreed statement of facts, to haul and transport, from one point within this state to another point within this state, wholesale shipments of pure alcohol; and, second, is the possession by such carrier of such alcohol for the purpose of such transportation likewise a violation of the criminal laws of this state? Answering the first question in the negative would eliminate and dispose of the second question, since if it be not unlawful for the carrier to transport alcohol as above set out, it certainly would not be unlawful for such carrier, for the purpose of effecting such transportation, to have such alcohol in its possession and control.

The prosecution in this case is brought under what is popularly called the "Bone Dry" Act of 1917. Section 1 of this Act provides that:

"It shall be unlawful for any common carrier, corporation, firm or individual * * * from any point without this state to any point within this state, or from place to place within this state, whether intended for personal use or otherwise, any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented or intoxicating liquors, or any of the prohibited liquors or beverages, as are defined in the act approved November 17, 1915, being 'An act to make clearer and more certain' the prohibition laws of this state," etc.

The act of 1917, in section 1, also provides that it shall be unlawful for any "corporation, firm, person, or individual * * * to have, control or possess, in this state, any of the said enumerated liquors or beverages whether intended for personal use or otherwise, save as is hereinafter excepted." The prohibited liquors above referred to by reference to the prohibition act of 1915 include pure alcohol. Without more, therefore, the defendant corporation and common carrier would be guilty of the offense charged in both counts of the indictment, the one for transporting, and the other for having in possession such prohibited liquors.

By way of defense, defendant, admitting the facts charged in both counts of the indictment, relies upon the provision of section 2 of the act of 1917, claiming that it received for shipment at a point within this state pure alcohol in wholesale quantities from a wholesale druggist for the purpose of transportation to another point in this state, and to be delivered to a person authorized to receive the same under the terms of the exception provided for in section 2 of this act.

The case, therefore, turns upon the proper construction to be placed upon section 2 of the act of 1917, which section reads as follows:

"Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that nothing herein contained shall prohibit the use of pure alcohol for medicinal purposes as is prescribed in sections 426, 427, 428, 429 and 430 of the Criminal Code of 1910, said alcohol, however, to be shipped, received and possessed only as is provided in section 3 of this act."

Section 2 of the act of 1917, therefore, modifies the broad and sweeping terms of the preceding section making it unlawful to transport or possess alcohol and other prohibited liquors therein mentioned, by expressly providing that pure alcohol of a certain description and for certain purposes as prescribed in a former act of the Legislature may be "shipped, received and possessed only as is provided in section 3 of this act," which said section 3 provides for the receipt, under certain restrictions and by certain designated parties, of shipments of pure alcohol when transported by a common carrier into this state from points without this state. It seems, therefore, that the clear intent of the act of 1917, despite the exhaustive terms in its first section absolutely prohibiting the transportation or possession for any purpose of intoxicating liquors generally, including pure alcohol, is to permit the possession or transportation of pure alcohol for certain purposes, under certain conditions to and from certain designated and authorized persons or parties. This intent is manifest, not only by the terms of section 2 and section 3, but by the title of the act making it "unlawful to transport," or "to have, receive, possess or control," such liquors, excepting in the former case "alcohol and wine under certain restrictions and limitations," and in the latter case, "alcohol for medicinal, mechanical and scientific purposes." Thus the act of 1917 sanctions and legalizes the possession and transportation of pure alcohol for certain purposes under certain well-defined restrictions. Indeed it had been the settled policy of this state, prior to the enactment of the act of 1917, to authorize the sale and use of pure alcohol for medicinal purposes. This was expressly provided in the first state-wide prohibition law of 1907, referred to, and declared and reaffirmed in the act of 1915 (Acts 1907, p. 81; Acts Ex. Sess. 1915, pp. 100, 101, 103; Acts 1916, p. 72).

It is clear beyond question that by the precise terms of the act of 1917, as set out in section 8 thereof, a common carrier may legally transport under the restrictions therein provided as to delivery, etc., pure alcohol from a point without this state to a point within this state. Can such a shipment of alcohol by a common carrier be legally made under the terms of this act as set out in section 2 thereof from a point within this state to another point within this state? I think it can, under certain restrictions and for certain designated purposes. Section 2 of the act, as has already been pointed out, provides that:

"Nothing herein contained shall prohibit the use of pure alcohol for medicinal purposes as is prescribed in sections 426, 427, 428, 429 and 430 of the Criminal Code of 1910, said alcohol, however, to be shipped, received and possessed only as is provided in section 3 of this act."

By reciting and re-enacting said code sections, it expressly saves and preserves the prohibition act of 1907 in so far as this act permits the "use of pure alcohol for medicinal purposes." The act of 1907, which had never been repealed, but expressly preserved (Acts 1915, Ex. Sess. p. 89, § 24), being thus declared and re-enacted by the act of 1917, and by the terms of the latter act made a part thereof, the latter act must be read and construed as if these sections of the act of 1907 were copied and reproduced therein. Nunes v. Wellisch, 12 Bush (Ky.) 363. The Act of 1907, so far as it serves our purpose here, provides in section 430 of the Penal Code of 1910, as follows:

"Nothing in the preceding sections of this article shall be so construed as to prevent wholesale druggists from selling or furnishing alcohol in wholesale quantities to regular licensed retail druggists, or to public or charity hospitals, or to medical or pharmaceutical colleges. All wholesale druggists shall be required to keep a complete record of all their sales of alcohol, which record shall at all times be open for inspection to the regular authorities of such counties or cities in which such wholesale stores are located."

It is therefore lawful for wholesale druggists in the state of Georgia to possess and sell to certain designated parties in wholesale quantities pure alcohol for medicinal purposes. Pure alcohol, therefore, having been continuously recognized by the Legislature as a legitimate article of commerce, and its importation from other states being expressly permitted and provided for as set out in section 3 of the act of 1917, it is hardly conceivable that intrastate traffic and transportation therein should be considered and regarded as criminal, except by an unambiguous and unqualified legislative enactment.

If there be any doubt, therefore, as to the legislative intent to legalize such intrastate shipments the doubt should be resolved in favor of the legality of same. Therefore the clause in section 2 of the act of 1917, which provides that "said alcohol, however, to be shipped, received and possessed only as is provided in section 3 of this act" should not be construed as meaning that the phrase "said alcohol" refers back to, and has reference only to, the phrase "pure alcohol," appearing a few words back towards the beginning of this section, but should be construed as having reference to alcohol mentioned in the recited code sections 426 to 430 contained therein. Giving to this clause in section 2 of the act of 1917 the first construction would be in accordance with the contentions of the state, and would be as if said section read as follows:

"Nothing herein contained shall prohibit the use of pure alcohol for medicinal purposes, * * * said alcohol, however, to be shipped, received and possessed only as is provided in section 3 of this act"

This would mean that section 3 would be exhaustive as to the transportation of pure alcohol for medicinal purposes, and therefore only interstate shipments as provided therein could be legally made. But giving to this clause the second construction would be equivalent to its reading as follows:

"Nothing herein contained shall prohibit the use of pure alcohol for medicinal purposes as is prescribed in [section 430 of the Penal Code providing that 'nothing in the preceding sections shall be construed as to prevent wholesale druggists from selling or furnishing alcohol in wholesale quantities to regular licensed retail druggists, or to public or charity hospitals, or to medical or pharmaceutical colleges'], said alcohol, however, to be shipped, received and possessed only as is prescribed in section 3 of this act."

Placing this latter construction, which I think is correct, upon section 2 of the act of 1917, intrastate shipments of alcohol under certain restrictions are permitted and legalized. The alcohol mentioned in code section 430, just quoted as from section 2 of the act of 1917, being alcohol manifestly sold in this state and by wholesale druggists in this state, could only be shipped from a point within this state, and if received as provided in section 3 of said act of 1917, said section 3 providing for a reception in this state only, it could only be received in this state. The latter construction being equally as plausible as the former, and, moreover, being favorable to the defendant in a criminal prosecution, I am constrained, in accordance with the well-recognized maxim that a criminal statute should be construed in favor of innocence, to adopt this latter construction and to conclude that section 2 of the act of 1917 legalizes intrastate shipments of pure alcohol under certain restrictions, which alcohol shall, in the terms of the act of 1917, "be shipped, received, and possessed only as prescribed in section 3 of this act," providing for interstate shipments.

I understand my Colleagues in the majority opinion to hold that section 2 of the act of 1917 goes no further than to preserve and secure the right only to use pure alcohol for medicinal purposes as prescribed in sections 426 to 430 of the Penal Code, and that the concluding clause in this section with reference to shipping, receiving, and possessing pure alcohol, instead of providing for the shipment of such alcohol by the parties named in the code sections referred to, such as wholesale druggists, operates as a precautionary proviso guarding the act against a construction that would permit alcohol to be shipped otherwise than in interstate shipments coming into this state as provided in section 3 of the act of 1917. This position, to my mind, is untenable. If this be the proper construction to be placed upon section 2 of this act, the clause, "said alcohol, however, to be shipped, received and possessed only as provided in section 3 of this act," is mere surplusage, and adds nothing to the meaning of the act. It is a mere vermiform appendix which can be cut out and dispensed with without harm to the body of the act. If section 3 were exhaustive as to shipment, receipt, and possession only when coming in interstate shipments from points without the state, section 2 would as well read as if the above-quoted clause were omitted and stricken entirely therefrom. The transportation of alcohol mentioned therein, necessarily intrastate, would then be prohibited under the provisions of section 1, and only interstate shipments, as contended in the majority opinion, and as provided in section 3, could move in this state. It is a well-recognized principle of statutory construction that the Legislature meant something by every provision contained in a statute, and that all provisions therein should be construed as adding to or giving to the statute a meaning or construction different to that attached to the remaining part of the statute with the provision in question eliminated. Applying this rule, and giving to this clause a construction that would add to or modify the meaning of section 2 were this clause omitted, the only conclusion that could be arrived at would be that section 2, with this clause retained, provides for shipments of alcohol by parties authorized to sell it under the code sections mentioned therein, the same being parties within this state, such as wholesale druggists; and when such shipments are received "as provided in section 3," they would be received at points within this state. Giving to this clause such a construction, section 2 of the act of 1917 must therefore be construed as recognizing and legalizing intrastate shipments.

Furthermore, each and every word in a statute is supposed to have a distinctive meaning, and is to be given a construction accordingly. Otherwise it is uselessly inserted. The clause referred to provides that alcohol shall be "shipped, received and possessed." [Italics mine.] Giving, therefore, to the words "shipped," "received," and "possessed" each a separate and distinct meaning, there are three ideas contained in this clause: The subjective idea of shipping, the objective idea of receiving, and the passive idea of possessing. All three of these are applied by section 2 to alcohol mentioned in Code, §§ 426 to 430. Shipping in the subjective sense is going out from or leaving the shipper, the opposite of receiving. Used in this sense when applied to alcohol mentioned in Code, §§ 426 to 430, it is necessarily applied to alcohol within this state, which, of course, cannot be shipped in this sense of the term otherwise than from a point within this state. Applying to the word "shipped" any other meaning would render it objective, and would attribute to it the sense of coming in towards the point of destination. This latter idea is covered by the word "received." Therefore, in order to give the word "shipped" any significance whatever and to concede that the Legislature meant something by the insertion of this word in the statute, the word "shipped" must be given the construction first suggested, which could only mean that alcohol already in this state, when shipped, must be shipped from and start from a point within this state. Of course, when the alcohol mentioned in these code sections is "received" or "possessed," it must necessarily be received or possessed within this state. Any other conception would be absurd.

It will be noticed in this connection that when the Legislature in section 3 of the act of 1917, the section following section 2 containing the clause under consideration, uses the word "shipped" in the objective sense—the sense of coming towards the point of destination—where it refers to the receipt in this state of incoming shipments from without the state, uses the phrase "have shipped." This would indicate that the word "shipped" used in this clause in the act is to be given the subjective construction suggested.

The word "shipping" is defined by Mr. Justice Hall in Robertson v. Wilder & Co., 69 Ga. 345, as "putting the cargo into a vessel." Webster's New International Dictionary defines the verb "ship":

"To put for transportation aboard a vessel."

The Century Dictionary defines it:

"To put or take on board a ship or vessel; as, to ship goods at Liverpool for New York. To send or convey by ship. To deliver to a common carrier * * * for transportation;

* * * as, to ship by express"

—quoting from Child's Ballads:

"The tane is shipped at the pier of Leith,
The tother at the Queen's Ferrie."

Bouvier's Law Dictionary defines "shipper" as:

"One who ships or puts goods on board a vessel to be carried to another place."

Abbott's Law Dictionary, referring to the word "shipper," says:

"Shipper generally means one who places his goods on board a vessel for transportation."

Rapalje & Lawrence's Law Dictionary says a "shipper" is:

"The owner of goods who entrusts them on board a vessel for delivery abroad."

See 7 Words and Phrases (First Series) p. 6487; 4 Words and Phrases (Second Series) p. 571.

In State v. Carson, 147 Iowa, 561, 126 N. W. 698, 140 Am. St. Rep. 330, it is held:

"The words 'ship' and 'shipment' are * * * used to express the idea of goods delivered to carriers for the purpose of being transported from one place to another. * * * The ordinary meaning of the word 'shipped' is to load for transportation."

In Bowes v. Shand, L. R. 2 App. Cases, 455 (House of Lords), the court was unanimous in the opinion that the word "shipped," according to its natural and ordinary signification, was "the putting of goods on board." It was said in that case by Lord Hatherley:

"I think the meaning of the word 'shipped' is sufficiently understood by this time in commerce. But if it were needed, I think we have sufficient evidence before us that by the word 'shipped' all the witnesses understood 'put on board.' I read the contract therefore as if it said 'put on board,' etc.

See, also, Ledon v. Havemeyer, 121 N. Y. 179, 24 N. E. 297, 8 L. R. A. 245; Fisher v. Minot, 76 Mass. (10 Gray) 260.

In the language of the court in State v. Carson, cited supra, "the court is not to presume that the Legislature intended the word 'ship' to mean something different from its ordinary signification."

The Legislature of this state in adopting the clause under consideration, providing for the shipment of alcohol, did not intend to prescribe rules and regulations governing the manner in which a shipment may be begun or initiated in a foreign state beyond its jurisdiction. It certainly will not be presumed that the Legislature intended to exceed its powers and go beyond its jurisdiction and enact a futile and inoperative statute. "Extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur." Giving to the word "shipped" any signification other than its use in the subjective and ordinary sense, as defined above, would be to hold that the Legislature intended to enact just such an inoperative and ineffective statute, and meant to control shipments made in other states. Section 2 of the act of 1917 must for this reason be construed as authorizing and legalizing shipments of pure alcohol for medicinal purposes between points within this state. The majority opinion of this court, I respectfully suggest, ignores the first or subjective idea of "shipping," and plants itself upon the two ideas of "receiving" and "possessing" only. This, I take it, is not the true construction to be placed upon section 2 of this act.

How is a shipment, in its accepted sense of being put on board a carrier, provided for in section 3, when, according to the terms of this section, no such shipment is made from a point within this state? How can alcohol in this state be "shipped" or put on board in accordance with the provisions of section 3, which makes no provisions for such shipments, but only provides for the possession or receipt of alcohol from other states? The answer is this: The word "shipped" as used in section 2, in addition to the idea of being put on board a ship or carrier, contains the further idea of transportation, i. e. transported, hauled, or carried from the point of shipment. See Kipling's "Ship me somewhere east of Suez." Unless the idea of transportation or movement from the shipping point is lodged somewhere between the ideas "shipped" and "received," the alcohol when "shipped" merely would remain stationary, and would not be transported or carried away. So when alcohol mentioned in section 2 is transported, shipped, or carried, or hauled from a shipping point within this state, it is transported, shipped, or carried, or hauled as provided in section 3, which section provides that the carrier may "transport, ship or carry * * * pure alcohol." Furthermore the instrumentality by which such alcohol is "shipped" or "carried," under the provisions of section 3 is by a "common carrier," and not otherwise. Therefore, the alcohol referred to in section 2 must be "shipped" only as provided in section 3, i. e., by a common carrier. Construing the two sections 2 and 3 together, I take it that they mean that pure alcohol may be shipped and transported from a point within this state to another point within this state, and shall be so shipped and transported by a common carrier only, and that these sections do not mean that only interstate shipments shall be made. It can readily be seen that the Legislature, for police regulation, would restrict the means of transportation to common carriers.

If section 2 of the act of 1917 is ambiguous or susceptible to two constructions, I am unwilling to presume that the Legislature of this state, when authorizing the sale and use of pure alcohol within this state, as it does in section 2 of the act of 1917 and the act of 1907 there ratified, intended to discriminate against its own wholesale druggists in favor of those of other states by denying the means of transportation to the former while permitting the same to the latter. For this reason, if the language of the act does not imperatively demand the view taken by my Colleagues in the majority opinion, I must give to section 2 a construction that will permit the citizens of this state to do business within this state on an equal footing with citizens of other states. However plausible may be the view taken in the majority opinion, it curtails the rights and privileges of the common carriers and citizens of this state. It is in derogation of the common law and common right. Sound judicial policy, therefore, precludes any such construction upon a purely statutory enactment unless its unambiguous terms imperatively so demand.

The act of 1907 (Penal Code, §§ 426 to 430, inclusive) provides that pure alcohol may in wholesale quantities be furnished by "wholesale druggists" to "regular licensed retail druggists," and others. It seems to be conceded in the arguments and briefs that the shipment as made by the defendant carrier in this case was a wholesale shipment as provided in the act of 1907. However that may be, in my opinion the act of 1907 is to be construed as recognizing pure alcohol in excess of one pint as "wholesale quantities." Therefore, when transported in wholesale quantities as authorized by the act of 1907, as declared and reaffirmed by the act of 1917, such alcohol must be shipped from one authorized by the act of 1907 to sell or furnish it, viz. a "wholesale druggist" within this state, to one authorized to receive it within this state.

Did the Southern Express Company, a common carrier, ship or transport a consignment of pure alcohol in wholesale quantities from and to such persons as is provided by law? The shipment was without doubt received from one authorized to ship under the act of 1907, namely, a "wholesale druggist," but whether it was transported by the defendant to one who was authorized to receive it is not quite so clear. It was consigned to one Dr. H. G. Fussell, at Camilla, Ga., a person, who, it subsequently appears, was not within the class authorized to receive such shipments. It would seem that, in order to defend against a criminal charge of transporting prohibited liquors between points within this state, it must appear that a wholesale shipment of pure alcohol was received for transportation by the defendant carrier from one authorized to ship it under the law, such as a wholesale druggist, and it must appear that said carrier transported the same only for the purpose of delivering it on one authorized to receive it. There being nothing to put the defendant carrier on notice that said shipment was not consigned to a person authorized to receive it under the law, there could in this respect be no blame attached to the defendant carrier, in the absence of an intent on its part to haul such shipment to an unauthorized person. Upon the seizure of the alcohol by the sheriff before the delivery of the same to the consignee by the defendant carrier, the defendant's further responsibility ceased, and, without more, the defendant carrier did not violate any criminal statute of this state.

The Southern Express Company, defendant in this case, a common carrier, having received a wholesale shipment of pure alcohol from a wholesale druggist within this state, for the purpose of transporting the same to another point within this state, and with the intention to there deliver it to a person authorized to receive it, acted within its legal rights and violated no criminal law. The conviction, therefore, under the first count in the indictment was contrary to law. The possession of such alcohol being necessary to its transportation, which transportation was not criminal, but in accordance with law, such possession by said common carrier was perfectly legal, and a conviction cannot be sustained under the second count of the indictment. I am of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed.

CRADDOCK v. BRINKLEY. (No. 11.)(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 19, 1919.)1. JUDGMENT ⇨518—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

A proceeding to set aside a consent judgment against plaintiff, on the ground that she was then insane and not represented by guardian, held a direct proceeding to set aside the judgment, and not a collateral attack.

2. JUDGMENT ⇨406—SETTING ASIDE—PROCEDURE.

Where the ground alleged for setting aside a judgment is not based on fraud, the proper remedy is by motion in the cause; but when a party by mistake brings an independent action, the court may treat the summons and complaint as a motion in the original cause, where brought in the same county.

3. INSANE PERSONS ⇨100 — JUDGMENT AGAINST INSANE WIFE.

Where plaintiff was then insane, she could not be represented by her husband in the matter of a consent judgment against her as to boundary line of her separate land, and the judgment is voidable.

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨238(1)—MARRIED WOMAN—JUDGMENT BY CONSENT.

Under Revisal 1905, § 563, subd. 4, expressly providing that judgments may be taken against married women, whether plaintiff or defendant, the same as against other persons, husband need not be joined; but, where they sue jointly, he is prima facie her authorized agent, with authority to consent to judgment against her.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by Sallie A. Craddock against David O. Brinkley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

The plaintiff, a married woman, owned land adjoining the defendant. Prior to 1906, controversy arose as to the line of division between the two tracts, and a suit was instituted in the name of herself and husband against the defendant. Summons was issued, but it does not appear that any pleadings were filed. At the time of the commencement of the suit in 1906 the plaintiff was insane. No next friend was appointed for her, and at fall term, 1906, of Washington, what purports to be a consent judgment was signed, establishing the line giving the defendant 20 acres of land, which the jury now find belonged to the plaintiff. The plaintiff at that time was insane and confined in an asylum, and it appears that the husband, after conference with defendant's attorney, accepted $50 in consideration of which the judgment was entered.

Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., Meekins & McMullan, of Elizabeth City, and Z. V. Norman, of Plymouth, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The jury find that the plaintiff was insane and confined in an insane asylum at the time the former action was instituted, and also at the time the consent judgment was entered, and that the 20 acres in controversy are her property. The defendant enters two assignments of error: (1) That this proceeding cannot be maintained, because it is a collateral attack upon the former judgment, and that plaintiff's remedy is by a motion in the cause. (2) That the judgment in the former action is an estoppel on the plaintiff, and conclusive, because the action was brought in the joint name of her husband and herself, and that he was her legal representative in the action.

[1, 2] As to the first proposition, this is not a collateral attack, but a direct proceeding to set aside the judgment. The insanity of the plaintiff, and the invalidity of the judgment for that reason, are alleged, and there are both ground and prayer to set aside the judgment and also a demand for the recovery of the property. It is true that, when the ground alleged for setting aside the judgment is not based upon fraud, the proper remedy is by motion in the cause; but we have no distinct forms of action now, and it has been held that when a party by mistake brings an independent action, when his remedy is by motion in the original cause, the court may, in its discretion, treat the summons and complaint as a motion. Jarman v. Saunders, 64 N. C. 367. It is true that an independent action, when brought in another county, cannot be treated as a motion in the cause (Rosenthal v. Roberson, 114 N. C. 802, 19 S. E. 667); but that does not obtain here, as the proceeding is in the same county.

[3] As to the second point, the jury having found that the plaintiff was insane, she could not be represented by her husband, since, even if she had been present in person or by counsel, the judgment would have been invalid. The judgment was not void, but voidable as between the parties (Thomas v. Hunsucker, 108 N. C. 724, 13 S. E. 221), and on the finding of the jury was properly set aside. The same would have been true as to a deed executed by her. Odom v. Riddick, 104 N. C. 515, and cases cited in the Anno. Ed., 10 S. E. 609, 7 L. R. A. 118, 17 Am. St. Rep. 686.

[4] Revisal, § 563 (4), expressly provides that judgment may be taken against a married woman, whether plaintiff or defendant, "in the same manner as against other persons," and we would not be considered as affirming the ruling (by a divided court) in McLeod v. Williams, 122 N. C. 451, 30 S. E. 129, in which it was held that a wife would not be bound by her assent in person in open court to a compromise judgment in an action to which she is a party defendant; but we rest our decision upon the proposition that though when she and her husband sue or are sued jointly, he is ordinarily to be taken as her authorized agent, when she is not present in person or by counsel. Smith, C. J., in Vick v. Pope, 81 N. C. 22; Neville v. Pope, 95 N. C. 346; Grantham v. Kennedy, 91 N. C. 148, and cases cited thereto in the Anno. Ed. In this case, the jury having found that when the writ was issued by her husband in their joint names, and also when the judgment was taken, the plaintiff was insane, it follows that he could not have been authorized to assent to the judgment as her agent, and the judgment was voidable in this proceeding.

It was not necessary that the husband should be joined in the action; but, being joined, prima facie he was acting as her agent. "In no case need she prosecute or defend by a guardian or next friend." Revisal, § 408.

Though there is no counterclaim set up in the answer, the plaintiff's counsel assents in this court—to avoid the necessity of another action—that judgment may be taken against her for the $50 paid her husband by defendant in 1906, with interest thereon from date of such payment. This entry may be made in the court below, when the certificate of this judgment on appeal is filed.

No error.

STATE v. BUSH. (No. 1.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 19, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨1172(7) — APPEAL — INSTRUCTION FAVORABLE TO APPELLANT.

In prosecution for having possession of 16 gallons of whisky for purposes of sale, instruction that the jury should return verdict of guilty, if it found beyond reasonable doubt that defendant had charge of the liquor and had it in his possession for the purpose of sale, was not error of which defendant could complain, being favorable to defendant, in view of Laws 1913, c. 44, § 2, making possession of more than one gallon of whisky evidence of intent to sell.

2. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨1172(7) — TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS—CONSIDERATION OF EVIDENCE.

Instruction charging the jury to consider and discuss the evidence, and convict defendant if guilt has been shown beyond a reasonable doubt, held not error of which defendant could complain.

3. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨1159(1)—REVIEW—CONSIDERATION OF EVIDENCE.

Where jury has convicted defendant of committing an act which is usually done by evasion or indirect means, the courts should be slow in finding that there was no evidence in the case.

4. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨330—BURDEN OF PROOF—DEFENSE.

Defendant is not called upon to prove himself innocent.

5. INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⇨236(7) — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—POSSESSION WITH INTENT TO SELL.

In prosecution for having 16 gallons of whisky in possession for purposes of sale, evidence held to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, in view of Laws 1913, c. 44, § 2, and in view of Revisal Supp. 1913, § 2080b(2), making possession of more than one gallon evidence of intent to sell.

6. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨407(1)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS.

That a man charged with a crime makes no denial is in itself competent evidence.

7. INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⇨236(7) — KEEPING FOR SALE—CONSTRUCTIVE POSSESSION.

In prosecution for having liquor in possession for purposes of sale, constructive possession of more than one gallon of whisky was sufficient to justify finding that the liquor was for purposes of sale, Laws 1913, c. 44, § 2; Revisal

Supp. 1913, § 2080b(2), making possession prima facie evidence of intent to sell.

8. INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⇨242—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—SENTENCE.

A sentence to 4 months in jail of defendant, convicted of having 16 gallons of whisky in his possession for purposes of sale, was not excessive.

9. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨1217—SENTENCE—WORK ON PUBLIC ROADS.

In sentencing defendant, convicted of having 16 gallons of whisky in his possession for purposes of sale, to 4 months in jail, the court was authorized to give permission to work defendant on the public roads.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Bond, Judge.

Charles Bush was convicted of having whisky in his possession for the purpose of sale, and he appeals. No error.

The defendant was indicted and convicted in the recorder's court for having in his possession 16 gallons of whisky for the purposes of sale. On appeal to the superior court he was again convicted and appealed.

Aydlett, Simpson & Sawyer, of Elizabeth City, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., and J. C. B. Ehringhaus, of Elizabeth City, for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The chief point pressed on the argument here was the refusal of the court to charge that "if the jury believed all the evidence to return a verdict of not guilty." The evidence against the defendant in the record, and as fairly summed up by the trial judge, is that the defendant about 10 a. m. came to the witness Will Morris, the owner, and in charge of the stable, which was locked and not in use, and asked permission to have a trunk put in there. Morris says that he gave the defendant the key to the stable, and soon after that he saw a trunk in the stable, and that defendant did not return the key to him. Chief of Police Thomas testified that he went to the stables and found the trunk, and that it had 48 quarts of liquor in it. He had a search warrant, but he could not find the defendant, who left town that night about midnight, and was brought back from New Bern by an officer, to whom papers had been sent for his arrest.

Morris, the owner of the stable, further says that the chief of police, Thomas, got the trunk which he saw in the stables, that Bush never came back for the trunk and never returned the key, that Bush in talking to him may have said that he would have two trunks to put in there. He says that he saw the trunk sitting in there between 10 and 2 o'clock, and there was no other trunk there that day; that the door was open, and that the defendant was in the habit of carrying trunks about, with different sets of harness with him, which he used for race horse purposes.

The witness Gray, a colored drayman, says that he hauled a trunk that day; that he put it in Mr. Morris' stables; that the trunk was brought to him on a truck; that the truck came from the direction of where the cars were, though he did not see it brought out of the car; that in fact he hauled two trunks at that time, which was about 10 o'clock, and put them in Morris' stables; that he never saw the man before who got him to haul the trunk out there, but it was not the defendant; that he does not know whether the trunks came out of the car or not; that the man who got him to haul the trunks was not the defendant, and that the man asked him if he knew where Morris' stables were.

The chief of police further testified that he went to the car, and found the horse in there and 12 cases of liquor, and that about dusk he saw this trunk (which was in court) in Morris' stables, and that it had 48 quarts of liquor in it; that he arrested a man whose name was Al Bush, who he noticed was dodging him, and used the searchlight on him. He found him in another stable.

It appears that Al Bush was convicted, and does not appeal, and presumably the evidence as to him is not in this record. The case stands, therefore, upon the above evidence, uncontradicted (for the defendant did not go on the stand or put on any evidence), that the defendant Charles Bush got the key from Morris, the owner of the stables, expressing the wish to put a trunk therein. A trunk was there about midday, and was searched about dusk by the chief of police, who found 48 quarts of liquor in it. There is no explanation by or for the defendant, to whom he gave the key, nor to contradict the presumption that this was his trunk, nor any explanation why, when the search warrant was issued for the trunk, he was not present, and why he left later that night for New Bern, and was brought back by an officer under a capias issued for him in this case.

It is true that the colored drayman says that he hauled two trunks to Morris' stables that day for a man that he did not know, whom he had never seen before, and would not recognize at the trial. Whether this "unknown" stranger acted in collusion with the defendant, or was the agent of the defendant, is a matter of inference, and there was no direct evidence as to this.

There was evidence that two horses were shipped into Elizabeth City that morning, and that the car in which they came, and from which it seems that the trunk or trunks was taken, when searched, contained 12 cases of whisky hidden under the straw, and that the defendant and his father were down at that point that morning, before the trunk was hauled to Morris' stables.

[1] The illicit sale of whisky, or the possession of it for the purposes of sale, is, like the crime of larceny, generally done furtively, and direct evidence is not easily had. It is usually an inference to be drawn by the jury from a combination of circumstances. The court told the jury:

"If you find that this evidence shows beyond a reasonable doubt that this man had charge of that liquor, and had it in his possession for the purpose of selling it to other people, and you find that these two facts are shown beyond a reasonable doubt, it would be your duty to return a verdict of guilty."

This was too favorable to the defendant, for, if the defendant was in actual or constructive possession by having control, the statute makes it evidence of the intent to sell, if there is more than one gallon. Laws 1913, c. 44, § 2.

[2] The court further charged the jury:

"The trial of a man is a serious matter, and service upon a jury is one of the most serious responsibilities that a citizen can render. You should review the evidence, talk it over with each other, and then ask yourselves the question: 'Has it been shown beyond a reasonable doubt in this case that the defendant is guilty?' If you say it has, return a verdict of guilty. If you say it has not, then return a verdict of not guilty."

The defendant excepted to these two instructions, but we find no error therein of which he can complain.

[3] When 12 impartial jurors, sworn to render a true verdict according to the evidence, have found that there was sufficient evidence to convince them beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant has committed an act which is usually done by evasion and indirect means, the courts should be, and are, slow to find that there was no evidence in the case.

[4, 5] This offense is one that is committed from one of the lowest of motives, that of making profit by a violation of the laws of the state, and while the defendant is not called upon to prove himself innocent, we think there was sufficient evidence to create a belief beyond a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, especially when there was no evidence to explain why a trunk, placed in Morris' stables by the use of a key which he obtained from Morris for that purpose, contained the liquor in question, and his simultaneous disappearance from town when the trunk was searched.

[6] When a man is charged with crime, and makes no denial, that of itself is competent evidence to go to the jury. Here the defendant was so charged by the search warrant. He did not come forward and deny that the trunk was his, or that the liquor was there without his knowledge, but, on the contrary, left town that night. We do not feel justified in holding that the verdict of the jury, of the 12 good men and true, was based upon no evidence whatever.

[7] The possession of more than one gallon of whisky justified the jury in finding that the defendant had it for purposes of sale. Laws 1913, c. 44, § 2; Gregory's Supp. § 2080b(2). And constructive possession is sufficient. State v. Lee, 164 N. C. 533, 80 S. E. 405.

[8, 9] The defendant also excepted because he was sentenced to four months in jail, but this was not excessive (State v. Denton, 164 N. C. 530, 80 S. E. 401), and the permission given by the court to work the defendant on the public roads was authorized (State v. Hicks, 101 N. C. 747, 7 S. E. 707; State v. Farrington, 141 N. C. 844, 53 S. E. 954).

No error.

RICE v. METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO.
(No. 15.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 19, 1919.)

1. INSURANCE ~~§~~138(1) — FRAUD — RELIANCE ON REPRESENTATIONS.

Even if insured accepted a policy under false representations that she could have a return of premiums at the expiration of a certain time, yet, since the policy plainly provided otherwise, and the agent urged insured to read the policy, which she did, and had others read it to her, it must be held that she did not rely on the representations.

2. INSURANCE ~~§~~141(4)—FRAUD—WAIVER.

Where insured was induced to take a policy upon representations that she could have the premiums returned at a given time, and, after learning that the policy was not as represented, she paid several premiums, she waived the alleged fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Devin, Judge.

Action by Lina Rice against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Two causes of action are stated in the complaint. The first alleges that the defendant issued to the plaintiff a policy of insurance on the 3d day of October, 1904, and that the plaintiff was induced to accept the policy and pay the premiums thereon by false and fraudulent representations of the agent of the defendant that, if she would pay the weekly premiums for a period of 12 years or more, she could then get back all the premiums paid, and the second alleges the right of the plaintiff to have a paid-up policy of insurance issued to her.

The defendant denied that any false representations were made by its agent, but agreed to issue a paid-up policy as demanded in the second cause of action.

The action was tried before a jury on the first cause of action, and the jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Did defendant's agent at the time of delivering the policy of insurance, and as a part of the transaction of its execution, falsely and fraudulently represent to the plaintiff that, if she would take the policy and pay the premiums 12 years, she would under the terms of the policy be entitled to receive her premiums if she so elected? A. Yes.

"(2) If so, was the plaintiff reasonably deceived thereby, and caused to rely on said statement and unable to understand from the policy that the representation was false? A. Yes.

"(3) Did defendant's agent wrongly and incorrectly read the policy to the plaintiff, and, if so, was she deceived thereby and caused to take out the policy? A. Yes.

"(4) Did the plaintiff more than three years prior to the commencement of the action discover, or would she in the exercise of reasonable care have discovered, that any statement alleged to have been made by the agent that she could get her premiums back at the end of 12 years was untrue and contrary to the provisions of the policy? A. No.

"(5) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? A. $312."

Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed, presenting in several exceptions the contention that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover upon her own evidence.

Small, McLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1, 2] The policy issued by the defendant to the plaintiff is singularly free from ambiguous and uncertain language, and it contains express provision that it may be surrendered within two weeks of its date and the premiums paid recovered, if not satisfactory, thus affording opportunity to become familiar with its terms.

The plaintiff testified that the agent who sold the policy read it to her, and she does not say it was read incorrectly. She also says she did not think the agent understood the policy himself, and that he told her to get others to read it for her. He "didn't do anything to keep me from reading it, and he suggested to me to get other people to read it to me." The plaintiff can read and write. She read the policy, and others read it to her. Seven months after the policy was issued she told the agent she did not believe it was "any good." In 1908, four years after the date of the policy, she demanded of the defendant the return of the premiums paid, claiming that the agent of the defendant represented to her that she could get her money back at any time, and this demand was refused, and in 1912, desiring to change the beneficiary, she had Mr. Cave, whom she said she had found correct in all his dealings, to read the policy to her. She continued to pay the premiums until 1916.

These facts are disclosed by the evidence of the plaintiff, and they preclude a recovery upon the ground of false representations, because an investigation of the contents of the policy was not only not prevented, but was invited, and the means of information were equally open to both parties.

"The misrepresentation which will vitiate a contract of sale, and prevent a court of equity from aiding its enforcement, must not only relate to a material matter constituting an inducement to the contract, but it must relate to a matter respecting which the complaining party did not possess at hand the means of knowledge; and it must be a misrepresentation upon which he relied, and by which he was actually misled to his injury. A court of equity will not undertake, any more than a court of law, to relieve a party from the consequences of his own inattention and carelessness. Where the means of knowledge are at hand and equally available to both parties, and the subject of purchase is alike open to their inspection, if the purchaser does not avail himself of these means and opportunities, he will not be heard to say that he has been deceived by the vendor's misrepresentations. If, having eyes, he will not see matters directly before them, where no concealment is made or attempted, he will not be entitled to favorable consideration when he complains that he has suffered from his own voluntary blindness, and been misled by overconfidence in the statements of another. And the same rule obtains when the complaining party does not rely upon the misrepresentations, but seeks from other quarters means of verification of the statements made, and acts upon the information thus obtained." Slaughter's Adm'r v. Gerson, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 383, 20 L. Ed. 627.

The general principles applicable to cases of fraudulent representation are well settled. Fraud is never presumed; and where it is alleged the facts sustaining it must be clearly made out. The representation must be in regard to material fact, must be false, and must be acted upon by the other party in ignorance of its falsity and with a reasonable belief that it was true. If the purchaser investigates for himself, and nothing is done to prevent his investigation from being as full as he chooses, he cannot say that he relied on the vendor's representations. Southern Development Co. v. Silva, 125 U. S. 247, 8 Sup. Ct. 881, 31 L. Ed. 678.

"The true rule is stated to be that the seller is liable to an action of deceit, if he misrepressent the quality of the thing sold, in some particulars in which the buyer has not equal means of knowledge with himself, or if he do so in such a manner as to induce the buyer to forbear making the inquiries, which for his own security and advantage he would otherwise have made. 2 Kent's Com. 487. The misrepresentation must be of a kind, the falsehood of which was not readily open to the other party. Per Taylor, C. J. Fagan v. Newsom, 1 Dev. 22." Saunders v. Hatterman, 24 N. C. 85, 37 Am. Dec. 404.

These authorities are reviewed in County v. Construction Co., 152 N. C. 29, 67 S. E. 40, and the principles stated as follows:

"The law does not afford relief to one who suffers by not using the ordinary means of information, whether his neglect be attributed to indifference or credulity; nor will industrious activity in other directions, to the neglect of such means, be of any avail. Andrus v. Smelting & Refining Co., 130 U. S. 648 [9 Sup. Ct. 645, 32 L. Ed. 1054].

"If the means of investigation and verification be at hand, and the attention of the party receiving the representations be drawn to them, the circumstances of the case may be such as to make it incumbent on a court of justice to impute to him a knowledge of the result, which, upon due inquiry, he ought to have obtained, and thus the notion of reliance on the representations made to him may be excluded. Farrar v. Churchill, 135 U. S. 616 [10 Sup. Ct. 771, 34 L. Ed. 246].

"Our cases are in perfect accord with those decisions and the great weight of authority upon the important question now before us. We said in Eagin v. Newsom, 121 N. C. 22: 'It is a very reasonable principle that the purchaser should not be entitled to an action of deceit if he may readily inform himself as to the truth of the facts which are misrepresented.' See, also, Cash Register Co. v. Townsend, 137 N. C. 658 [50 S. E. 306, 70 L. R. A. 349]; Lytle v. Bird, 48 N. C. 225; Saunders v. Hatterman, 24 N. C. 32 [37 Am. Dec. 404]."

At the last term it was held in Arndt v. Insurance Co., 97 S. E. 631, that one who could read and write and had kept a policy without reading it and had paid the premiums for nine years could not recover the premiums paid upon the ground that he had been induced to accept the policy by the fraudulent representations of the agent of the defendant, and the facts in this case are stronger against the plaintiff, because here she read the policy herself, had others upon whom she relied to read it for her, shows that she did not rely upon the representations within seven months after the policy was issued, knew in four years that the company had repudiated the alleged representations by refusing to return her money, and thereafter continued to pay the premiums for a period of twelve years.

We are therefore of opinion that the plaintiff cannot recover upon the first cause of action, and that she is entitled to have the defendant issue to her a paid-up policy, which it has agreed to do.

The facts in the case of Hughes v. Insurance Co., 156 N. C. 592, 72 S. E. 1101, are entirely different from those in this case. In the Hughes Case the plaintiff could not read or write. The policy was read and explained by the agent, no one else read it to him, and the agent did not suggest that the insured should make further investigation himself or get others to do so for him.

SPRADLEY v. GEORGIA HOME INS. CO.
(No. 10159.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 10, 1919.)

1. INSURANCE ~~668~~(15)—WAIVER OF CONDITION IN FIRE POLICY—EVIDENCE.

What insured told agent of company with reference to ownership of land upon which house stood held insufficient to authorize submission to jury of question whether company waived provision of fire policy, that it should be void if building insured was on ground not owned by insured in fee.

2. INSURANCE ~~282~~(1)—FIRE INSURANCE—MISLEADING STATEMENTS OF INSURED.

Where fire policy, providing that it should be void if insured building was on ground not owned by insured in fee, was obtained by misleading statements as to ownership of land, there could be no recovery.

3. INSURANCE ~~179~~—FIRE INSURANCE—DIVISIBLE POLICY.

Policy providing that insurer undertakes to insure at a certain rate on the hundred, and that insurance is intended to be $700 on frame building and $300 on piano, is divisible, and the fact that insured was not sole and unconditional owner of personal property as required by policy, will not defeat recovery for destruction of building by fire.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County; Ernest Moore, Judge.

Action by M. W. Spradley against the Georgia Home Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

The following are the reasons of the lower court for holding the policy divisible:

The defendant contends that the policy stipulates that the entire policy shall be void if the title to the property covered thereby is not in the party insured. It seems to me that where the policy reads as it does here, that the insurer is undertaking to insure at a certain rate stated in the policy, as $1.50 on the hundred, and where the policy states that the insurance is intended to be $700 on the frame building, and $300 on the piano, that those are separate items of insurance, and that the fact that the policy provides with reference to personal property that the party must be the sole and unconditional owner of the personal property, when he cannot recover upon that, that does not make that an entire contract so as to defeat any right of recovery on account of the $700 insurance on the building. In other words, I think the policy is susceptible of division on its face, and there is nothing to show, and on the contrary the inference is, that they were insuring those as to separate items of insurance, and the rate being stated, the fair conclusion from the terms of the policy is that that rate applied to $700 on the building, at $1.50 per hundred, and insurance on the piano at the same rate. Consequently I overrule the motion for a nonsuit or direction of a verdict upon that ground.

Hendersons, of Aiken, for appellant.

Croft & Croft, of Aiken, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This action is on an insurance policy. The policy covered a home and a piano. The home was situated on the property of another than the insured, and the piano was the property of another. The undisputed testimony establishes these facts. The building was erected under a verbal lease for three years. It does not appear that there was any stipulation therein permitting the insured to remove the building. The case was tried before Judge Moore and a jury at the April term of court, 1918, for Aiken county. During the trial the issue of waiver as to the house arose. After all of the evidence was in the defendant made a motion for a directed verdict in its behalf. His honor directed a verdict as to the claim for loss of piano, but refused as to claim for loss of house, but submitted to the jury on this issue the question of waiver. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $700 and interest. After entry of judgment, defendant appealed, and by four exceptions alleges error in two particulars on the part of Presiding Judge Moore:

[1] First, that he erred in holding that there was sufficient evidence to submit to the jury the question of defendant's knowledge of the ownership of the land, and that he should have directed a verdict for defendant on the whole case.

There is no doubt that the plaintiff breached the condition of his policy as to the ownership of the land upon which the building was situated. There is nothing in the evidence to show a waiver of this condition of policy. Among the conditions that would render the policy void unless provided for by agreement in writing added to the policy is "if the interest of the insured be other than" unconditional and sole ownership, or if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by insured in fee simple, etc.

[2] The insurance company has the right to know what insurable interest the insured had in the property for its own protection, whether in fee-simple life estate for a year, or a term of years. Experience teaches us that the owner of a house is more circumspect and careful in looking after it than a tenant or one who leases. There is no question but that moral hazard is much better when the insured is the owner in fee of house insured. The risk is not so great. The agent of the insurance was misled when the insured said that it was part of the Ben Turner land, near the place he called "home." This was simply a designation of its location, and carried with it no notice of ownership. It was the duty of the insured to tell agent whether he owned or leased the land. And he did not tell the agent enough, as to the ownership of the land, for the question of waiver to be submitted to a jury. Under misleading statements, a policy is procured, and a short time afterwards the property is burned and the plaintiff is awarded the full amount of the policy, as if he were the owner in fee.

[3] These exceptions must be sustained. His honor should have directed a verdict for defendant as asked for. The exceptions raising the question that his honor was in error in holding that the policy was divisible are overruled, for the reason stated by his honor in his ruling on this question in the circuit court.

RAGIN v. NORTHWESTERN R. CO. OF SOUTH CAROLINA et al. (No. 10139.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 28, 1919.)

1. PLEADING \S 8(3)—CONCLUSIONS OF LAW —JOINT CONVERSION.

An allegation, without stating facts or circumstances, is not sufficient to show a joint conversion of goods by a carrier and the consignor.

2. ACTION \S 50(4)—JOINDER OF CAUSES OF ACTION—CONSIGNEE AND CARRIER.

A consignee is not liable with the carrier for loss of his goods in transportation, nor does the carrier become liable with the consignee for the latter's failure to account to the consignor for the goods upon receipt.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Clarendon County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by C. H. Ragin against the Northwestern Railroad Company of South Carolina and Henry W. Frost & Co. From orders of trial court overruling demurrer to the complaint and ordering its amendment so as to show a joint obligation of defendants, and dismissing complaint on failure to so amend, plaintiff and Henry W. Frost & Co. both appeal. Affirmed as to plaintiff, and reversed as to defendant Frost & Co.

Purdy & O'Bryan, of Manning, and Frank R. Frost, of Charleston, for appellants.

J. J. Cantey, of Summerton, for respondent.

WATTS, J. The appeal involved in this case is from orders of his honor, Judge Wilson. Both plaintiff and defendant Henry W. Frost & Co. appeal from said orders of his honor. The issues in this case are the "aftermath" of the case between same parties in the case reported in 108 S. C. 171, 93 S. E. 860. After that opinion was filed the plaintiff asked and was granted a nonsuit in the magistrate's court, and commenced the present action in the court of common pleas. Henry W. Frost & Co. appealed from the orders of Judge Wilson dated June 25, 1918, respectively, and C. H. Ragin appealed also from the order of date July 28, 1918.

The first, second, and fourth of Henry W. Frost & Co.'s exceptions raise the question whether the plaintiff has complied with Judge Wilson's order, and alleged a joint obligation between the defendants. If he has not done so, then he does not state a cause of action against Frost & Co. Under the facts of the former decision in this case, there is not a particle of doubt that there never was a joint possession of the bale of cotton, the subject-matter of the suit, or a joint tort between the railroad and Frost & Co. If the railroad received the cotton as a common carrier consigned to Frost & Co., and delivered it to Frost, then its liability ceased, for the railroad had then done as it had contracted to do. If Frost received the cotton and failed to account, then Frost & Co. would be liable. The undisputed evidence in the former case shows that the railroad delivered the cotton to Frost & Co., and that Frost & Co., according to the allegation of the complaint, accounted in part.

[1] There is no sufficient allegation that there was a joint conversion. A mere suggestion, an allegation to that effect, without stating facts or circumstances to allege the facts, is not sufficient. When the plaintiff elected to allege, as he did in the former suit which was passed upon by this court, that the railroad received the cotton consigned to Frost & Co., then, under a proper showing, he could have held the railroad responsible if the railroad had failed to carry and deliver to Frost. When, however, the railroad delivered to Frost the cotton, then its liability ceased; and if Frost & Co. received the cotton, and failed to account for the same, and plaintiff feels aggrieved, then he can sue Frost & Co. This court decided in the former case that there was no joint tort, and that the cause of action against Frost & Co. could not be tried in Clarendon county.

[2] There is no principle of law whereby a consignee becomes liable with the carrier for loss in transportation, or that the carrier becomes liable with the consignee for his failure to account. In the former case the court says, "Clearly, both are not liable." The facts conclusively show that the carrier is not liable. This leaves the matter open between plaintiff and Frost & Co., and Frost & Co. cannot be sued in Clarendon county. Under all of the exceptions the real question in the case is whether the complaint alleges a joint obligation between the defendants. There is none.

Plaintiff's exception overruled; Frost & Co.'s exceptions sustained.

Judgment reversed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 12, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶231(3) — OBJECTION BELOW—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action on a hail policy, admission of evidence that agent who solicited insurance stated that he would adjust loss if it occurred could not be complained of in absence of specific objection.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1050(1) — ADMISSION OF INCOMPETENT TESTIMONY—HARMLESS ERROR.

Permitting plaintiff, suing on hail policy, to testify that agent who solicited application stated that he himself would adjust loss, held not prejudicial.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶706(2)—GROUNDS OF MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—PRESERVATION.

Grounds of motion for new trial not stated in the record are not properly before the court on appeal.

4. TRIAL ¶334 — VERDICT — UNCERTAINTY.

Verdict for a certain amount, with interest, etc., was not void for uncertainty, where it required only a mathematical computation to ascertain the full amount which the jury intended to award, since "that is certain which can be made certain."

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; James E. Peurifoy, Judge.

Action by W. J. McClure against the Home Insurance Company of New York. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bonham, Watkins & Allen, of Anderson, for appellant.

Watkins & Prince, of Anderson, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This was an action on a policy dated April 28, 1917, insuring plaintiff against damages caused by hail during that year to his crop of 300 acres of cotton to an amount not exceeding $25 per acre. On April 20th the crop on part of the land was damaged by hail to the extent of $190.73. That loss was adjusted and paid. On May 22d another hailstorm struck plaintiff's farm, and completely destroyed the crop on 200 acres, and damaged that on 100 acres to the extent of 40 per cent., as estimated and agreed upon by plaintiff and the agent of defendant who solicited plaintiff's application for the policy. According to this estimate, plaintiff's loss was $6,000—$5,000 on the 200 acres totally destroyed, and $1,000 on the 100 acres partially destroyed—and, according to plaintiff's testimony, the agent promised to send him a check within a few days for the amount of the loss so agreed upon. But, instead of sending the check, the company sent two other agents to appraise and adjust the loss. These agents offered plaintiff, first, $1,000, then $1,200, and finally $1,792—offers which plaintiff declined to consider, and brought suit on the policy. The jury found a verdict in his favor for $5,809.73, with interest from July 23, 1917, at 7 per cent. per annum. From judgment on the verdict, defendant appealed.

[1, 2] The first assignment of error is in allowing plaintiff to testify that the agent who solicited his application for the policy assured him that, in case of loss, he (the soliciting agent) would himself adjust it. Appellant contends that this testimony was in conflict with the written stipulations of the application and policy, and that it was prejudicial, as appeared from the attitude of plaintiff to the other agents of defendant who were sent to adjust the loss.

The objection and contention are untenable for several reasons: When the objection was interposed no specific ground of objection was stated. The court asked plaintiff's attorney what was the purpose of the testimony. His reply was: "To show the understanding as to how the loss should be adjusted—who should adjust the loss." The court: "This policy shows how it should be adjusted. Go ahead." It does not appear that the loss was adjusted, or attempted to be adjusted, in any way contrary to the provisions of the policy. In fact it was not adjusted at all; and the action was not brought upon an adjustment of the loss, but upon the policy; and it does not appear that there is any provision of the policy that an action may not be brought upon it until after adjustment of the loss, or an effort to adjust it. The record contains no provision of the application or policy with regard to the matter of adjusting the loss, and there was no issue thereabout. It appears that the attitude of plaintiff to the adjusters sent out by the company was brought about rather by the insignificance of their offers, as compared with his actual loss, as claimed by him and found by the jury, than by any reliance upon the alleged agreement with the soliciting agent. Therefore, if the ground of objection had been stated, we fail to see wherein appellant was prejudiced by the testimony, though incompetent and irrelevant.

[3] The next contention is that the court erred in refusing a new trial. The ground or grounds of the motion for a new trial are not stated in the record, and therefore are not properly before us. But, assuming that they appear in the exceptions which assign error in sustaining the verdict, on the grounds that the evidence was insufficient to support it, and that the jury did not follow the instructions of the court (which were admittedly correct) as to the measure of damages, we find abundant evidence to support the verdict, and none that the jury did not follow the instructions given them in estimating plaintiff's damages.

[4] The last assignment of error is that the verdict is void for uncertainty because it was not for a certain amount, but for a certain amount with interest, etc. That is certain which can be made certain. It required only a mathematical calculation to ascertain with certainty the full amount which the jury intended to award. Bank v. Bowie, 1 McM. (26 S. C. Law) 430.

LONG v. POCAHONTAS CONSOL. COLLIERIES CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 11, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. PLEADING \S 237(5)—VARIANCE—AMENDMENT AFTER VERDICT.

Where on a trial objections are timely made to the introduction of evidence upon the ground of variance, or the question of such variance is otherwise seasonably presented, the pleader should not be permitted to amend his declaration or other pleading after verdict.

2. PLEADING \S 430(2)—VARIANCE—WAIVER.

Where the declaration or other pleading states a good cause of action, but broader than the contract or other liability proven, objection to the evidence or motion to exclude based on variance, not specifically stated to be on that ground, should after verdict be treated as waived and be disregarded.

3. PLEADING \S 430(1)—VARIANCE—FORM OF OBJECTION.

Objection to evidence or motion to exclude based on variance should be specifically stated in the objection or motion and not concealed under a general objection or motion, and after verdict the objection should be treated as coming too late and as waived.

4. PLEADING \S 237(4), 432—VARIANCE—CURE BY VERDICT—AMENDMENT.

If the evidence adduced on the trial by plaintiff or defendant shows a good cause of action or defense, a defect in the pleading should be regarded as cured by the evidence when after verdict either of the parties seek an advantage based on variance, or the pleader should be permitted to amend his pleading to correspond with the proof, and if no substantial rights of the parties will be injuriously affected thereby, the verdict or judgment should not be disturbed.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT \S 101, 102(1) 235 (1), 289(23)—TOOLS AND APPLIANCES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—JURY QUESTION.

A master is bound to use reasonable care to provide his servant with reasonably safe machinery and implements with which to discharge his duties, and unless the defect occurs in the use thereof by the servant and is slight and easily remedied by the servant, the master will be liable to the servant for injuries sustained by him on account of such defect, unless it be clearly shown that under all the circumstances the defect was open and apparent and that the servant should by the reasonable use of his faculties have discovered the defect in time to avoid the injuries, generally a question of fact for the jury.

Williams, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court. Mercer County.

Action by J. A. Long against the Pocahontas Consolidated Collieries Company.

Verdict for plaintiff, and from a judgment setting aside the verdict, and awarding defendant a new trial, plaintiff brings error. Reversed, verdict reinstated, and judgment for plaintiff.

Minter & Minter, of Pocahontas, Va., and Sanders, Crockett & Kee, of Bluefield, for plaintiff in error.

S. C. Graham, of Tazewell, and A. W. Reynolds, of Princeton, Va., for defendant in error.

MILLER, P. This writ of error was awarded plaintiff to the judgment of the circuit court setting aside the verdict of the jury in his favor for ten thousand dollars and awarding defendant a new trial.

The record does not clearly disclose the ground or grounds upon which defendant was awarded a new trial. Of the grounds assigned the following only are now urged or relied on in support of the judgment: (1) The refusal of the court to give instructions 1A, 4 and 5 as propounded by defendant; (2) that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence. And as probably covered by these grounds the point is here urged that there was a fatal variance between the averments of the declaration and the proof, justifying the judgment.

The record shows that after the verdict and motion for a new trial and before judgment plaintiff asked but was denied leave to amend his declaration in certain particulars, so as to cure any defect or error therein and make it conform to the case proven by the evidence. The suit was for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while employed in defendant's coal mine in the state of Virginia, due to the alleged negligence of defendant. The specification of negligence in the first count was that defendant permitted large quantities of slate, refuse, coal and other materials to be hauled along the haulways and tracks over which plaintiff was required to haul the coal, and because of the defective car on which he was riding in the discharge of his duties, he was thrown off and fell upon the said refuse, coal, slate and other accumulations in the mine and because of such obstructions he was unable to get out of the way of the car, and thereby received his injuries. The negligence averred in the second count is that defendant provided and permitted to be loaded with coal the car on which plaintiff was riding in discharge of his duties defectively equipped with a chain and latch, which chain was too long to hold the end gate of the car when locked and in course of transportation securely in place as required to prevent injury to employees, and by reason whereof said gate or swinging door under the pressure of the load was caused to swing out over the bumpers of the car, pushing plaintiff and causing his feet to slip off the car and throwing him under the wheels, and doing him the injuries of which he complains. The third count avers a defect in the brakes of said car, so that when plaintiff riding thereon as alleged reached a point where the grade was heavy he was unable by reason thereof to check the speed of the car upon reaching an abrupt curve in the track, whereby he was jerked and thrown off the car and injured as alleged.

Each of these counts erroneously avers that it was the duty of the plaintiff to dig down the coal in the mine and load it on to the mining cars of defendant. Among the other duties of his employment as alleged was to haul the coal from the place where it was loaded into said cars to what is termed "the Loaded Branch," being a point in the said mines where he was instructed by the defendant to place all loaded cars under his control.

On the trial the evidence of plaintiff and defendant was that plaintiff's employment was to haul the coal, set props and lay track, and that it was no part of his contract to dig, mine and load coal as erroneously alleged and as the evidence on both sides proved, and so plaintiff proposed after verdict and before judgment to so amend each count of his declaration by striking out the redundant words, but the court denied him his motion and sustained defendant's motion to set aside the verdict and award it a new trial.

[1] The first question for consideration in logical and orderly sequence, it seems to us, is, was the judgment below properly predicated on the supposed variance between the allegata and probata? It is not denied that the redundant averments were material, for if plaintiff's contract included digging and mining the coal and loading it into the cars, his rights would be measured by different rules than those applicable to a mere hauler of coal; but the declaration is broad enough in its averments to cover the contract as proved. The case seems to have been tried and submitted to the jury on the two issues: (1) Whether the car in question was defective in the particulars alleged in the second count; (2) was plaintiff guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of his injuries? It does not appear from the record that plaintiff undertook to sustain his case under the first and second counts.

At no time during the progress of the trial did the defendant object to the plaintiff's evidence or any part of it on the ground of variance. Plaintiff proved by his own evidence the contract just as it was subsequently proved by witnesses for the defendant, and it is quite evident that the question of variance was an after thought of defendant, probably suggested for the first time on the motion for a new trial, for according to the record variance was not made a special ground for a new trial, nor was it made the ground of a motion to strike out the evidence or the subject of an instruction to the jury.

Nor was the question presented in any other way unless by the peremptory instruction, denied, to find for defendant, or by the motion to set aside the verdict because contrary to law and the evidence. It is contended on behalf of defendant that the motion to amend came too late and that the variance was fatal.

The general rule, according to the common law and our statutes, section 12, ch. 125, and section 8, ch. 131, of the Code (secs. 4766, 4912), undoubtedly is that when upon the trial objections are timely made to evidence upon the ground of variance, or the variance is otherwise presented upon time, the pleader should not be permitted to amend after verdict. Lawson v. Williamson Coal & Coke Co., 61 W. Va. 669, 680, 57 S. E. 258.

[2] But when as in this case the declaration states a good cause of action, but states the contract of employment broader and as imposing duties not covered by the contract proven, the defect of pleading after verdict should be regarded as waived or cured by the statute of jeofails. Section 3, ch. 134 of the Code (sec. 4977). The objection on the ground of variance after verdict comes too late and should be disregarded.

[3, 4] The proper way to take advantage of a variance between allegata and probata is not after verdict, working a surprise and injustice on the opposite party, but to object to the evidence when first offered or by a motion to strike out, so that the pleader if he desires may exercise his rights of timely amendment, given by the statute. And we think that sound and orderly rules of practice require that such objection and motion to exclude predicated on variance should specifically state the ground and should not be regarded as covered by some general objections or a motion entered to catch the court or the opposite party in reversible error not specifically pointed out on the trial. Our decisions, we think, fully support this proposition. Long v. Campbell, 37 W. Va. 665, 17 S. E. 197; Dresser v. Transportation Co., 8 W. Va. 553; Harris v. Lewis, 5 W. Va. 575; Davisson v. Ford, 23 W. Va. 617; Bluefield v. McClaugherty, 64 W. Va. 536, 63 S. E. 363; State v. Hood, 63 W. Va. 182, 59 S. E. 971, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 448, 129 Am. St. Rep. 964. And in Virginia the rule is definitely stated that if no objection is made to the admissibility of evidence on account of the failure to support the issue and no motion is made to exclude it on account of the supposed variance, the objection is deemed to be waived. And this rule is reaffirmed with even more exactness in Taliaferro v. Shepherd, 107 Va. 56, 57 S. E. 585.

Moreover, oceans of judicial decisions are cited by numerous text writers and annotators for the proposition that when no vested rights will be disturbed, nor the cause of action or defense substantially destroyed, or the theory of the case altered, amendments should be permitted at any time before or after trial if substantial justice will thereby be promoted. 21 R. C. L. 577; Burks' Pleading and Practice, § 312; Ellinghouse v. Ajax Livestock Co., 51 Mont. 275, 152 Pac. 481, L. R. A. 1916D, 838, and elaborate note beginning on page 841. And as particularly applicable in appellate courts the writer of the note at page 848 of L. R. A. 1916D, citing a long line of decisions from many states, some perhaps controlled by statute, says:

"Under these circumstances [those noted], it is held generally that the judgment will not be reversed because of defects or omissions in the pleadings which are supplied by the proof or the pleadings of the adverse party, or because of a variance between the pleadings and the proof, if the sufficiency of the pleadings was not properly challenged in the lower court, or the evidence was introduced without objection, or the defect or variance appears clearly not to have affected the substantial rights of the parties; but the pleadings may be amended in the appellate court to support the judgment, if necessary, or the amendment will be deemed made. The rule has become elementary, it has been said, that 'if a good cause of action has been established upon a trial and all controversies in reference to the matter are fully tried without objection, and such cause is within the jurisdiction of the court and might have been, but was not, fully pleaded, or was not the particular cause of action the pleader had in mind at the outset, though the facts are fairly stated, the complaint may * * * on appeal be deemed amended in accordance with the judgment.'"

In Massachusetts, in Lemay v. Springfield Street Ry. Co., 210 Mass. 63, 96 N. E. 79, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 43, where the facts were quite similar to those presented here, it was held that "as the declaration stood at the trial the instructions requested by the defendant should have been given, but, as upon a proper declaration the defendant would have been liable if the accident was caused by a defect in the car which by proper inspection might have been discovered and remedied, and as the case appeared to have been submitted to the jury fairly on this question, an amendment of the declaration so as to present this issue would cure the error without resorting to a new trial which justice did not require"; and it was ordered that if the plaintiff's declaration should be amended so as to properly present the issue, the defendant's exceptions should be overruled, otherwise they should be sustained.

We are of opinion therefore, upon reason and authority, that as no objection to the evidence for a variance was at any time interposed, nor any motion made to exclude on this or any other ground, the plaintiff was erroneously denied the right to amend his declaration as proposed, even after verdict, and if not that, the court, a good cause of action being established by the proof, should have disregarded the defect in the pleadings and entered judgment on the verdict in favor of plaintiff, without the necessity of a new trial.

[5] The next inquiry is, was plaintiff entitled to a verdict and judgment on the facts proven under the second count averring a defective car? One theory of the defendant was that although the car may have been defective in the particular alleged, the defect was not the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries, but was the result of his own negligence in attempting, while the car was in motion, to reach out and get his dinner bucket setting on a "gob pile" in the haulway, whereby he lost his balance and fell under the car. The other theory was that the defective condition of the car was so plain and obvious, owing to the wooden block stuck in between the chain and end gate, that plaintiff was bound to use his senses and take notice thereof, and not having done so, he violated rules of the defendant made for his safety, and assumed the risk incident to riding on the car so dangerously equipped and loaded.

The evidence on these two theories of defendant, however, was decidedly conflicting. Plaintiff and another employee riding on the same car swear that the car was defective and that plaintiff was injured substantially as alleged in the declaration. Both swear that plaintiff succeeded in getting his bucket and landing safely back in his position on the bumper of the car. - And the evidence of some of the defendant's witnesses tends to show that the car had run quite a distance from the place where plaintiff had gotten his bucket to the place where he had been pushed off and fallen under the car. Defendant undertook to contradict Hodge, the other witness for plaintiff, by a previous statement in writing claimed to have been made by him, but we do not think it clearly does so. Besides, on cross-examination he swore he did not make a different statement, and both he and the scrivener who took down the statement agree in saying that after it was written down it was not read to or verified by the witness. Two or three witnesses for defendant say that when called to assist in getting plaintiff from under the car, or the next day when they examined it, the car was in good shape, that the end gate was fastened and that no coal had run out on the ground. Their evidence on these questions however did not agree with previous statements made by them in writing at the request of counsel for plaintiff, the signatures to which they would not distinctly admit or deny, though on cross-examination they did admit that they had made statements in writing about the time specified. These witnesses were all employees of defendant. On rebuttal witnesses for plaintiff present at the time, swear that the statements were made, reduced to writing and read over to the witnesses and signed by them. No witness swears that the chain to hold the end gate was not too long. One witness for defendant at least admits that the slack was taken up with a block of wood as claimed by plaintiff. So that we do not think the circuit court was justified in disturbing the verdict on the ground that it was contrary to the evidence tending to show a defective car and that plaintiff's injuries were the result thereof, but was the result of his supposed negligence in attempting to secure his bucket while the car was in motion. If the chain was too long to properly and securely hold the load, and the slack of the chain had to be taken up by the block of wood as stated, which was liable to fall out, we think the master was liable for consequential injuries to plaintiff.

Counsel for defendant say, however, that the defect, if proven, was trivial and easily remedied by plaintiff if he had observed due care and the rules of the defendant formulated for his safety, and they would bring the case within the rules and principles of Martin v. Carter Coal & Coke Co., 75 W. Va. 653, 84 S. E. 574, and Priddy v. Coal Co., 64 W. Va. 242, 61 S. E. 163. In the first case a draw bar or draw head had been bent in the use of the car by plaintiff, which was easily remedied by him. We held in that case, citing numerous decisions, that for injuries thus sustained by a servant's own negligence the master is not liable. But the rule is different where a defective instrument or appliance is supplied by the master and is not rendered defective in the use thereof by the servant, as in the Martin case. In such cases the master is not relieved from his common-law or statutory duty to use due care to furnish his servant with reasonably safe machinery and appliances and to keep them in repair. We do not see that the rules of the company relied on were in any way violated by plaintiff.

But was plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence precluding recovery? Of course if the servant knowing of the defect in a machine or other instrument continues to use it, as a general rule, he assumes the risk, and the master is not liable for the injuries thus incurred. In this case plaintiff swears that though he had his carbide lamp in his cap he did not see the defective condition of the car, and under the facts and circumstances of a dark mine we are unable to say he could and should have seen the defect. The evidence does not clearly show that it was so obvious that plaintiff by the reasonable exercise of his senses should have discovered it and remedied it before riding the car. We think under all the circumstances shown in evidence the facts involved were for the jury and not for the court. In Priddy v. Coal Company the defect in the platform was open and apparent; plaintiff had passed over it several times on the day of his injuries; the platform was being repaired, and we decided that he was bound to use his eyes and look out for his own safety, and not having done so his negligence was the proximate cause of his injuries.

Lastly, was any error committed to the prejudice of defendant in the instructions? Three were given for defendant and three refused. Instructions 1, 2 and 3, given, fully covered defendant's theories, or a violation of the rules, contributory negligence of plaintiff in getting his bucket off the gob pile, and the law respecting the burden of proof. Of those offered and refused, number 1A would have told the jury that the evidence was insufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict, clearly a wrong conclusion as we have already indicated in our review of the evidence. Instruction number 4 was too broad on defendant's theory that the defect in the car indicated by the block of wood between the end gate and the chain was so open and obvious that plaintiff should be chargeable with negligence in hooking on to it. It did not properly submit to the jury whether under the circumstances of the mine plaintiff was guilty of negligence in not observing the defect in time to avoid the dangerous condition of the load. Instruction number 5, on the theory that the loader of the car was a fellow servant of the plaintiff, was clearly bad. If the car was defective, the responsibility was that of the master, and the doctrine of fellow servancy has no application.

[6] Our conclusion is to reverse the judgment, reinstate the verdict, and without the intervention of a new trial to pronounce judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendant for the sum of ten thousand dollars according to the verdict of the jury, with interest from the 23d day of May, 1918, the date of the verdict, being such judgment as we think the circuit court should have pronounced, with costs incurred by him in the circuit court and in this court in this behalf expended.

WILLIAMS, J. (dissenting in part). I do not concur in so much of the opinion as holds that plaintiff is entitled to interest from the date of the verdict.

This is a tort action, and there is no provision in the statute for allowing interest in such cases prior to the date of the judgment. Sections 14 and 16 of chapter 131 (secs. 4923, 4925) Code of West Virginia, relate only to actions ex contractu, hence the amendment of those sections in 1882, so as to allow interest from the date of the verdict, did not change the rule as to interest in actions ex delicto. The cases of Hawker v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 628, 36 Am. Rep. 825, and Fowler v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 18 W. Va. 579, are binding authority notwithstanding the subsequent amendment of the statute. Talbott v. W. Va. & P. Ry. Co., 42 W. Va. 560, 28 S. E. 311, and Easter v. Virginian Ry. Co., 76 W. Va. 383, 86 S. E. 37. Campbell v. City of Elkins, 58 W. Va. 308, 52 S. E. 220, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 159, conflicts with the foregoing, but the opinion does not mention the Talbott Case, which was decided after the statute was amended.

WALLACE v. ECLIPSE POCAHONTAS COAL CO. et al. (No. 3588.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 4, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CORPORATIONS ⇨448(1, 2) — PROMOTERS — CONTRACT—VALIDITY.

The promoters of a corporation to be formed are as a general rule to be regarded the agents of the corporation, and a contract made by them on behalf of themselves and the corporation when accepted by the corporation after organization is binding upon the promoters and the corporation accepting the benefits of the contract.

2. CORPORATIONS ⇨428(4)—PROMOTERS—CONTRACT—NOTICE.

Notice to the promoters and incorporators of a corporation of the provisions of a contract made for and on behalf of the corporation is notice to the corporation accepting the benefits of the contract.

3. CORPORATIONS ⇨448(2) — SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⇨70—SUBSCRIPTION TO STOCK—CONTRACT WITH PROMOTERS.

One who sells and transfers to a corporation a lease for coal pursuant to a contract made with the promoters thereof and accepted by the corporation when organized in consideration of stock in the corporation to be issued to him fully paid up sufficient to represent one-fifth interest in the value of the property when fully equipped for mining and producing coal, is entitled under his contract properly construed to stand in the position of a subscriber to so much of the stock as his contract calls for and may in equity enforce specific performance thereof against promoting stockholders and corporation.

4. CORPORATIONS ⇨77—TRANSFER OF LEASE—CONSIDERATION—"ONE-FIFTH INTEREST IN THE PROPERTY FULLY EQUIPPED."

The provision "a one-fifth interest in the property fully equipped" contained in a contract made with promoters of a corporation for the sale and transfer to the corporation of a lease for coal, expressive of the consideration which the seller is to receive in the stock of the corporation, means in the light of the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties in this case a sufficient amount of stock to equal one-fifth of the value of the property equipped with tipples, tracks, haulways, cars, and all necessary machinery and motive power to successfully carry on one operation on the property.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Suit for specific performance of contract by J. S. Wallace against the Eclipse Pocahontas Coal Company and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Sanders, Crockett & Kee and Russell S. Ritz, all of Bluefield, for appellant.

McClagherty, Scott & Richardson, of Bluefield, for appellees.

MILLER, P. This is a suit for specific performance of a contract. The contract alleged and as the court below found, and we find established by the evidence, was made in December, 1916, supplemented by one of January 18, 1917, between plaintiff and the defendants Perkins and Griffith, the latter acting for themselves and their associates O'Keeffe and Weller, all promoters of the defendant corporation, organized afterwards for the purpose of taking over and operating a tract of about 600 acres of coal in McDowell county, an option for a lease on which was then owned or controlled by the plaintiff. That the plaintiff did have such option when the contract was concluded is established by the evidence beyond question or cavil, although defendants have undertaken to discredit his right and title thereto.

The substance of the contract was that in consideration that plaintiff would transfer, assign or cause said lease to be assigned or transferred, first to Griffith, trustee, for himself and associates, and by him to the corporation when formed, the said Perkins, Griffith, O'Keeffe and Weller would advance and supply the necessary money to pay the purchase price for said lease, namely, $2,500.00, and to fully equip said property for operation for coal under the said lease, and when so equipped and ready for operation, plaintiff was to have a one-fifth interest in the property fully paid up, and that to effectually and fully carry out the contract the defendant corporation was formed and organized with the definite and positive agreement between plaintiff and the other promoters, acting for themselves on behalf of the corporation, that plaintiff was to have and receive in stock enough to represent a one-fifth interest fully paid up in the corporation. And it is also alleged that of the $25,000.00 capital stock authorized, the estimate amount necessary to cover the cost of the lease and the equipment contemplated by the contract, plaintiff was entitled to receive at least fifty shares of the stock of the defendant corporation, while but five shares had ever been issued to him. The bill further alleges full and complete performance of the contract by plaintiff on his part and failure and refusal of the defendant company and of its promoters, officers and agents to execute the contract on their part. The answers deny the contract as alleged and put in issue the material facts, and the answer of Weller and O'Keeffe denies authority of Griffith and Perkins to bind them and want of notice of the alleged rights of Wallace. One Holly Stover, claiming to own some seventy shares of the stock of the corporation, not made a party to the suit, also appeared by petition denying authority of the promoters to make the alleged contract with plaintiff and want of notice thereof and its binding effect on him and the corporation, if made.

The bill, we think, presents good grounds for equitable relief, and the demurrer was properly overruled. This conclusion will be fully justified, we think, by what is to be presented on the merits of the case.

The decree appealed from, which found as a fact that the contract as alleged had been proven, adjudged as the only practicable relief that could be grounded on the present status of the corporation and its stockholders that the plaintiff recover of the defendants W. F. Perkins, H. C. Weller, T. J. Griffith and James O'Keeffe, respectively, the sum of one thousand and seventy-five dollars ($1,075.00) each, aggregating the sum of $4,300.00, which the court found to be the value of forty-three shares of stock of which he had been deprived, being one-fifth of the shares issued less the five shares delivered to him and two shares contributed by him to another stockholder according to an agreement which has no material bearing on the issues here presented.

The evidence shows that the first meeting of the stockholders of the corporation after obtaining the charter was held on February 20, 1917, pursuant to waiver of notice in writing signed by Griffith, Wallace, Perkins and by Frank Lively and J. W. Kirchenschlager. The minutes of this meeting show that only the twenty-five shares subscribed were at first represented in person or by proxy as follows: Frank Lively by H. C. Weller, his proxy; J. W. Kirchenschlager by L. C. Ayers, his proxy; T. J. Griffith by W. F. Perkins, his proxy; J. S. Wallace by W. F. Perkins, his proxy; and W. F. Perkins in person. Perkins was made chairman of the meeting, and Weller secretary. After acceptance of the charter and the adoption of the by-laws the minutes recite that since the subscription to the twenty-five shares shown by the charter held by said Lively, Kirchenschlager, Wallace, Griffith and Perkins, the said Lively, Mrs. W. F. Perkins, L. C. Ayers and Holly Stover have each subscribed for five additional shares. And thereupon the three present, namely, Weller, Ayers and Perkins, as the very next business proposed, proceeded to consider a preamble and resolution, by whom presented does not appear, the manifest purpose of which was to resolute plaintiff as far as possible out of his interest in the property and stock of the corporation basing the proposition on facts differing materially from those alleged and proven in this cause, and as far as material to this decision are as follows:

"And whereas, it is represented to the meeting that the said J. S. Wallace claims to have had at one time an option upon the property covered by the Deed of Lease from said McDowell Pocahontas Coal Company from the said T. J.

Griffith, the Assignee of said leasehold estate but which option, if such was ever in existence, had expired and terminated before the purchase thereof by the parties contributing the said Twenty-Five Hundred Dollars ($2,500.00) in cash, and that said Wallace claims that he had an oral understanding or agreement with one or more of the parties so contributing said sum of money that he would be allowed or would be entitled to participate to the extent of one fifth undivided interest in said sum of Twenty-Five Hundred Dollars ($2,500.00) and that one-fifth of the stock subscribed for and to be issued on account of the payment of the said sum should be issued in his name;

"And whereas, it is the desire of the stockholders of this corporation that the said Wallace be dealt with in an entirely liberal manner and that he be accorded such consideration as he claims to be entitled to, but without waiving any legal rights said stockholders in this corporation may have:

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, that the Board of Directors to be elected at this meeting of stockholders be and it is hereby authorized and directed through the proper officers of this corporation to issue stock in this corporation as follows: To Frank Lively, five shares; to J. S. Wallace, five shares; to J. W. Kirchenschlager, five shares; to T. J. Griffith, five shares; to W. F. Perkins, five shares; the same having been paid for by the said Frank Lively, J. W. Kirchenschlager, T. J. Griffith and W. F. Perkins, each contributing the sum of six hundred and twenty-five dollars ($625.00) and the said five shares hereby directed to be issued to the said J. S. Wallace having been paid for by the other parties herein named by contributing the sum of One Hundred and twenty-five dollars ($125.00) on account thereof, and that said five shares of stock so issued to the said Wallace shall be received by him in full and complete satisfaction of any and all claims whatsoever he may have upon any stock of this corporation. And,

"Be it further resolved, that it is not the intention of this Resolution of stockholders to in any wise preclude the four stockholders herein mentioned from the exercise of any legal right whatsoever that they may have against the said Wallace on account of the five shares of stock herein directed to be issued in his name and paid for in the manner herein set forth."

During the consideration of this preamble and resolution the minutes recite that W. F. Perkins, the chairman, retired from the chair manifestly because of his fiduciary relation to the company, and particularly to plaintiff as his proxy, and Holly Stover, who, the minutes recite, on account of his subscription to five shares of the stock and the deposit of his check in payment therefor, had been permitted to participate in the meeting, was called to the chair. Thus it appears that Stover, though appearing here as an innocent holder of stock, and practically all the other subscribers of stock had notice of plaintiff's claims and of the proceeding in his absence to undo him by the action of the stockholders, his representative Perkins deserting his post when action was called for. This whole proceeding is manifestly fraudulent, and in the light of the other evidence in the case we have no hesitancy in so characterizing it and putting upon it our seal of condemnation.

On the receipt of the five shares so generously tendered him by these confidential agents of the company and of himself, the plaintiff at once demanded of the secretary an exhibit of the books and minutes, which was denied him, and it was not until after this suit was brought that he was permitted to see the evidence of the wrongs perpetrated upon him.

[1] Upon these showings of right and of wrong and injury, what is the measure of plaintiff's right to relief? He contends on this appeal that he was erroneously limited to money decrees against Griffith, Perkins, Weller and O'Keeffe for sums aggregating the par value of forty-three of the 250 shares issued, instead of a decree against the corporation, either (1) impressing upon the entire property and plant of the corporation as a trust therein his one-fifth undivided interest according to his contract, or (2) a decree requiring the defendant corporation and the other parties to the contract to issue and deliver to him forty-three additional shares to represent a full one-fifth interest in the property fully equipped as contemplated by his contract, or (3) if not entitled to either of these forms of relief, to a decree against the corporation and the other promoters of the corporation not for the par value but the actual value of the shares to which his contract literally performed would entitle him.

It is quite clear to us that Perkins, Griffith, Weller and O'Keeffe are liable jointly and severally for the stock to which plaintiff is entitled, and if it is possible for them to do so, to respond in stock; but is the corporation not also liable upon a contract made for and upon its behalf and fully executed upon the part of the plaintiff? It is quite clear to us upon reason as well as authority that in this case the corporation as well as the promoters is liable to plaintiff. We recently said arguendo in McCullough v. Clark, 81 W. Va. 743, 95 S. E. 787, 789, upon the very highest authority, that as a general rule promoters of a corporation not yet organized, especially when their contracts are made for and on behalf of the corporation, are regarded as the agents of the corporation, and such contracts become binding upon them as well as upon the corporation after organization and acceptance thereof by it. Citing Spring Garden Bank v. Hulings Lumber Co., 32 W. Va. 357, 9 S. E. 243, 3 L. R. A. 583; Dickerman v. Northern Trust Co., 176 U. S. 181, 203, 20 Sup. Ct. 311, 44 L. Ed. 423; Alger on Promoters and the Promotion of Corporations, § 206 et seq.; 7 R. C. L. § 60, p. 81 et seq.

[2] But it is argued that the corporation and the other subscribing stockholders had no notice of the contract as made. Did it not accept and take advantage of the contract? Is it possible for the corporation to plead ignorance of the terms and conditions of a contract made by its promoters on its behalf, acquire the right and title to valuable property upon terms of payment in cash or credit or for its value in the stock of the corporation, and corporation and promoters thereby escape the burden of its performance? Our answer is, No. In the case at bar not only did the corporation have notice of plaintiff's right through its incorporators and agents, but all the stockholders of the corporation participating in the first meeting of stockholders, including Stover, had notice that plaintiff had at least some interest or claim, and Perkins and Griffith knew the extent of it, and if not, on inquiry of him all would easily have discovered the full extent thereof. The case of Mulverhill v. Vicksburg Ry. Power & Mfg. Co., 88 Miss. 689, 40 South. 647, is direct authority on the law of notice to a corporation through its promoters and agents. See, also, Simmons Creek Coal Co. v. Doran, 142 U. S. 417, 12 Sup. Ct. 239, 35 L. Ed. 1063; 3 Cook on Corporations, § 727; Newman v. Newman, 60 W. Va. 371, 55 S. E. 377, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 370; Marshall v. Hall, 42 W. Va. 641, 26 S. E. 300; Barksdale v. Finney, 14 Grat. (Va.) 333.

[3, 4] As a prerequisite to a final adjudication of plaintiff's rights it becomes necessary to determine two questions: First, what is the status or relation of the plaintiff to the corporation under his contract; and, second, what was reasonably contemplated in the provision of the contract for "a one-fifth interest in the property fully equipped"? On the first inquiry we think there can be no doubt that plaintiff's position was that of a subscriber to the capital stock of the corporation. His contract was to sell and convey or cause to be conveyed to the corporation the leasehold and to accept in payment fully paid up stock to the value of the property when fully equipped for mining and producing coal. Being entitled to this amount of stock easily ascertainable when the equipment was completed, he became entitled to the stock, and being so entitled, has not a court of equity jurisdiction by its mandatory process to compel specific performance of the contract? We think it has. Such was the holding in Mulverhill v. Vicksburg Ry. Power & Mfg. Co., supra. And we have decided that one who has paid his subscription to the capital stock of a corporation may by bill in equity compel the issuance of proper certificates therefor. Applegate v. Wellsburg Banking, etc., Co., 68 W. Va. 477, 69 S. E. 901; Snyder v. Charleston, etc., Bridge Co., 65 W. Va. 1, 68 S. E. 616, 131 Am. St. Rep. 947. We have also held that when shares of stock have some peculiar value to a purchaser and cannot be purchased on the market, or their value is not ascertainable with any degree of certainty, the purchaser may require specific performance of his contract. Hogg v. McGuffin, 67 W. Va. 456, 68 S. E. 41, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 491. And we recently decided that mandamus would lie at the suit of a purchaser to compel a corporation and its officers to transfer on its books shares to which it had been adjudicated he was entitled. Citizens' National Bank v. Consolidated Glass Co., 97 S. E. 689. So we think there can be no doubt of the jurisdiction of a court of equity in the case here presented.

The second question is, What was comprehended in the provision of the contract "a one-fifth interest in the property fully equipped"? The subject of the contract was a lease of coal, which required operation and production to keep it alive. The parties must have contemplated at least one operation and all the necessary equipment such as tipples, track, haulway, cars, and all necessary machinery and motive power to successfully carry on the operation. Counsel for plaintiff contended that he is entitled under his contract to have issued to him from time to time one share for every five shares of stock issued, so that his interest will always represent a one-fifth interest in the property. We do not think this could have been reasonably within the minds of the contracting parties when entering into the contract. We recently decided that a contract to make a will in consideration of certain services to be rendered, giving to plaintiff from $4,000.00 to $6,000.00 was sufficiently definite and certain to be enforceable for the least amount provided in the contract. Jefferson v. Simpson, 98 S. E. 212. And we think we would be traveling far afield to hold with counsel that the parties here contemplated any such far reaching consequences. Besides, with the one operation thoroughly equipped the parties would naturally, though not necessarily, have contemplated after the first operation was equipped that further developments would be carried on the credit of the company or out of the income or profits of the first operation. But whether so or not the contract must be given a reasonable construction, and we think to do so we must limit the rights of plaintiff to one operation.

The contract being so construed, what ought the decree below to have been? Of course the court would not have been warranted in impressing plaintiff's rights and interests as a trust upon the entire property and plant of the corporation. Clearly his contract was to take in payment stock in the corporation which he helped to organize and to which he caused the lease to be conveyed. His bill was not framed in any other view, and the contract pleaded entitles him to no other relief or its equivalent. We are clearly of opinion however, that the court was in error in limiting him to a money decree severally against the promoting shareholders. While they are no doubt liable jointly as well as severally, so is the corporation liable, as already indicated, either for the number of shares to which plaintiff may be entitled under the contract as now construed, if ascertainable or obtainable, if not, a money decree should be given against the corporation and Griffith, Perkins, Weller and O'Keeffe jointly for the value of the one-fifth of the property equipped for one operation as already stated.

Our conclusion is to reverse the decree and remand the cause with directions to the circuit court to ascertain the value of the plant and property of the defendant corporation fully equipped for one operation as indicated, and if the capital stock then authorized and unissued or issued and outstanding and held by the said Griffith, Perkins, Weller and O'Keeffe is sufficient to represent in value such one-fifth interest in said property such number of shares shall be decreed to be issued or transferred on the books of the corporation to plaintiff by the defendant corporation and said promoting stockholders, and if not, then the plaintiff shall be decreed against the corporation and said stockholders jointly a money decree for the value of plaintiff's interest in the property equipped as aforesaid and as ascertained by the court, with interest thereon from the time when plaintiff should have received said shares or the value thereof.

CARTER v. CARTER et al. (No. 3666.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 4, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — 356 —
SALE OF LAND—ADJUDICATION OF PRIORITY OF LIENS.

Where a purchaser of lands takes a deed therefor, and immediately executes a trust deed thereon to secure the unpaid purchase money and dies, and, on default of payment, the trustee advertises the property for sale, but before the day of sale the administrator of the purchaser files a general creditors' bill, making the vendor and his trustee parties, it is error for the court, or the judge in vacation, to authorize the trustee to make sale of the property and bring the funds into court, before the amount of the debts and priorities of liens have been adjudicated.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Creditors' suit by Garland R. Carter, administrator of E. E. Carter, against Mary F.

Carter and others. Decree for defendants Garrett, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

Sanders, Crockett & Kee, of Bluefield, for appellant.

Wm. E. Ross and Jas. S. Kahle, both of Bluefield, for appellees.

WILLIAMS, J. This is a creditors' suit by Garland R. Carter, administrator of E. E. Carter, deceased, against his heirs and creditors, for the purpose of ascertaining his debts and their priorities and selling the lands of his estate, on the ground that the personal assets are not sufficient to pay the same.

At the time said E. E. Carter died he owed a debt of $26,000 to Cleo S. Garrett and Robert M. Garrett, her husband, as well as numerous other debts to other persons. This debt to the Garretts was for the balance of purchase money on certain lots in Bluefield, which said Carter had purchased from them in his lifetime and partly paid for, and was secured by a deed of trust executed on said lots by his widow and heirs at law in fulfillment of his contract of purchase, the interest of his infant heirs therein being conveyed by a commissioner appointed by the court for the purpose pursuant to a decree made in a suit brought for the specific performance of the contract. An absolute deed was contemporaneously executed by the Garretts to the Carter heirs for the same lots. Twenty thousand dollars of said debt was represented by four notes, of $5,000 each, becoming due and payable in one, two, three, and four years, respectively, from the 14th of March, 1917, and $6,000 thereof, not evidenced by any note, represented the balance of $7,000 to be paid in lieu of a lot which said Carter had agreed to convey to the Garretts, as part of the consideration for the lots sold to him, $1,000 of which they paid. After the death of Carter this conveyance was found to be impracticable, because of the numerous liens on said lot and the consequent inability of the Carter heirs to make a good and unincumbered title thereto. Said $6,000 was made payable in monthly installments of $500 each, with interest; the first installment being payable on the 1st of November, 1917. The trust deed stipulated that default in payment of any one of the $5,000 notes should operate to cause all of them to become due and payable, for the purpose of authorizing the trustee to sell, and also that default in the payment of five of the $500 monthly installments should cause the whole of the said $6,000 to become due and payable, and upon default in either respect, the trustee was authorized, on request of Cleo S. Garrett or her assignee of the debt, to sell the property at public auction for cash, sufficient to pay the costs of sale and all the notes and installments then matured, and the balance on such terms as to meet and discharge the remaining notes and installments as they became due, first having advertised notice of such sale in some newspaper of general circulation published in Mercer county.

Default having been made in the payment of one of the notes and six of the monthly installments, William E. Ross, the trustee in said trust deed, advertised that on the 18th day of May, 1918, he would offer the property for sale at public auction. On the 16th of May, two days before the sale day, plaintiff presented to the judge of the circuit court, in term time, his bill praying, among other things, that the trustee be enjoined from selling. A temporary injunction was awarded inhibiting the sale, and the cause was remanded to rules to be there matured. At a later day of the same term, to wit, on the 22d of May, the trustee and the Garretts, having given notice thereof, appeared before the judge, tendered and asked leave to file their joint answer, and moved for a dissolution of the injunction. Plaintiff appeared and objected to their answer being filed at that time, on the ground that the cause was pending at rules, not matured for hearing, and was not on the docket. He also objected to the entry of an order at that time, adjudicating any of the principles of the cause. The judge overruled his objections to the filing of the answer and permitted it to be filed, and states in his order that it is not considered as an answer to the bill at that time, but only as an affidavit in support of the motion to dissolve the injunction. He thereupon entered an order rectifying the fact that the trust deed was given to secure the purchase money due the Garretts on the lots advertised for sale, sustained defendants' motion, and dissolved the injunction, and directed the trustee to proceed to sell the property according to the terms stated in the notice of sale, requiring him, before proceeding, to execute before the clerk of the court a good and sufficient bond in the penalty of $25,500, conditioned for his faithful performance of the trust, and directed him to bring the fund into court to be thereafter disbursed according to its order.

The question presented by this appeal is: Was it error to dissolve the injunction and permit the trustee to sell the property out of court, after a general creditors' suit had been brought making the trustee and the cestui que trust parties and before the cause was matured for a hearing?

The bill alleges that E. E. Carter, at the time of his death, owed a large number of debts besides the trust debt to the Garretts, and that some of those debts were evidenced by judgments and others by notes and open accounts. This court and the Court of Appeals of Virginia have held in numerous cases that it is premature and erroneous to decree a sale of land to satisfy a lien, without first ascertaining all the liens thereon and fixing their amounts and priorities. 8 Ency. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Cases, 674. Although the cases there cited are mostly judgment creditors' suits, the rule is the same in the case of a general creditors' suit brought for the purpose of selling real estate and paying the debts of a decedent. The reason for the rule is that the creditors, even though they be junior creditors, have a right to have their liens adjudicated and their priorities determined, in order that they may be the better prepared to protect their interests at the bidding. The creditors in such case are usually bidders at the sale, and a creditor, ignorant of the relation his lien bears to other liens on the same property, might be deterred from bidding. The debtor himself is also vitally interested in having the property bring the best price obtainable, and therefore a right to have any uncertainty respecting the liens determined before a sale is made. Payne v. Webb, 23 W. Va. 558.

The fact that defendants' lien is for the purchase money of the lots to be sold does not affect the application of the rule; the same reason for the rule applies.

Although the judge was presiding in court when he awarded the injunction, and also when he permitted defendants to file their answer, and sustained their motion to dissolve the injunction and authorized the trustee to make the sale, nevertheless his rulings in this respect had no more force than if made in vacation. The cause was not then in condition for an adjudication upon any question touching the merits. The general creditors' suit having been brought making the trustee and cestui que trust parties, before the day of sale, the trustee, of course, could not disregard the suit and proceed with the sale, he had to wait the orders of the court. The judge, at that time, could only act upon the injunction, either to modify or dissolve it or to refuse to dissolve it; he could not adjudicate any question relating to the merits of the case. This case is very similar to Stafford v. Jones, 65 W. Va. 567, 64 S. E. 723, and is governed by the principles therein announced, and also in Parsons v. Snider, 42 W. Va. 517, 26 S. E. 285, and Payne v. Webb, supra.

We reverse the decree and remand the cause for further proceedings.

ABNEY-BARNES CO. et al. v. DAVY-POCAHONTAS COAL CO. et al. (No. 3556.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 4, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CREDITORS' SUIT \Leftrightarrow 17—MORTGAGES—SALE OF PROPERTY — REDUCTION OF INCUMBRANCES.

In a suit to enforce payment of judgment, mortgage, and trust liens by a sale of the incumbered property, a productive coal mining property, a substantial fund derived from it through a receivership should be applied to reduce the incumbrance before decreeing a sale of the land.

2. MORTGAGES \Leftrightarrow 464—TRUST DEED—PRODUCTION OF NOTES AND BONDS—SALE.

Ordinarily notes and bonds secured by trust or mortgage deeds should be produced, and the holders thereof identified, or the absence of both explained or accounted for, upon a reference to a commissioner, before decreeing a sale of the incumbered property.

3. MORTGAGES \Leftrightarrow 464—SALE OF PROPERTY—DECREE—DESCRIPTION.

But where the plaintiffs' bill and the answers of the trustees sufficiently describe the notes and bonds, and give the total amount thereof, and the debtor does not deny their existence or question their validity, the description will be accepted as true, and, for the purposes of the decree of sale, the bonds and notes treated as valid and subsisting liens upon the property, without proof of their amount or the identity of the holders thereof before the entry of such decree.

4. MORTGAGES \Leftrightarrow 464—TRUST DEED LIENS—SALE—PRODUCTION.

It suffices to protect the debtor to require the holders of such notes and bonds to produce them for the adjudication of all questions connected therewith before the entry of the decree directing the distribution of the proceeds of sale.

5. CREDITORS' SUIT \Leftrightarrow 13—DISCHARGE OF LIENS FROM RENTS AND PROFITS — REFERENCE.

Before decreeing a sale of property incumbered by liens, a court in a foreclosure suit ordinarily should ascertain by a reference to a commissioner, or by an express adjudication based upon the pleadings or upon facts disclosed and not controverted, whether the rents, issues, and profits of the property will be sufficient to discharge the liens within five years.

6. CREDITORS' SUIT \Leftrightarrow 44 — DISCHARGE OF LIENS BY RENTS AND PROFITS — BURDEN OF PROOF.

When such ascertainment is necessary, the burden of establishing the insufficiency of such returns rests upon the creditor.

7. EQUITY \Leftrightarrow 194—DISCHARGE OF LIENS BY RENTS AND PROFITS.

But if the bill alleges, and the respondents in their answers do not deny, that the rents, issues, and profits likely to accrue from the property will not within that period be sufficient to satisfy and discharge the liens, no such preliminary investigation need be made.

8. MORTGAGES \Leftrightarrow 502—FORECLOSURE—SALE—RENTAL VALUE OF LAND—ASCERTAINMENT.

In a suit to foreclose definitely described mortgage and deed of trust liens, where the instruments provide for a sale for cash on default of payment, such a sale ordinarily may be decreed without an ascertainment of the rental value of the land.

9. BANKRUPTCY ⚡391(1)—SUIT TO FORECLOSE—STAY PENDING BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDING.

Such a suit begun in a state court generally will not be stayed upon the petition of the debtor filed therein based upon the pendency of a proceeding in bankruptcy against him instituted in a federal court six months thereafter.

10. COURTS ⚡475(1)—CONCURRENT JURISDICTION—JURISDICTION FIRST ACQUIRED—EFFECT.

The general rule concedes to the court which first regularly acquires jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties the superior right to proceed unmolested to the final determination of the controversy involved therein.

11. CREDITORS' SUIT ⚡51—FORECLOSURE AND SALE—REDEMPTION.

A decree to sell land to satisfy liens thereon should accord to the debtor a reasonable time to redeem, and failure to do so is cause for reversal.

12. MORTGAGES ⚡502—REDEMPTION—REASONABLE TIME.

What is a reasonable time for such purpose is to be determined from the circumstances of each case.

13. MORTGAGES ⚡502—FORECLOSURE AND SALE—REDEMPTION—ADVERTISEMENT.

The period given by a decree of sale for advertising notice thereof is not the equivalent of a day to redeem.

14. MORTGAGES ⚡502—FORECLOSURE—REDEMPTION.

The giving of a day to redeem is not required in a foreclosure suit where the instrument to be foreclosed is a deed of trust, and it prescribes the terms and conditions of the sale upon default.

15. MORTGAGES ⚡502—FORECLOSURE AND SALE—REDEMPTION.

But in such foreclosure suit, where the deed of trust provides only for a public sale, if the court first authorizes a private sale to be conducted by the receivers, and directs a public sale to be had only in case a private sale cannot be effected in the time allowed, a reasonable time and opportunity to redeem the land should be accorded the debtor.

16. MORTGAGES ⚡502—DEED OF TRUST—SALE—ADVERTISEMENT.

Likewise, where the deed of trust prescribes advertisement of the time, place, and conditions of the foreclosure sale for eight consecutive weeks, it is error for the decree to provide for only four weeks' advertisement.

17. MORTGAGES ⚡337—ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN—PRIORITY—SALE.

A mortgagee does not lose any substantive rights by being compelled to enforce his trust lien in a pending judgment creditors' suit, and, where the lien of the former has priority, the time and terms of the sale will ordinarily be determined by the provisions of the trust deed, not by rules applicable to the enforcement of judgment creditors' liens.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

18. MORTGAGES ⚡337—ENFORCEMENT OF JUDGMENT LIEN—MORTGAGE LIEN—DETERMINATION IN SAME PROCEEDING.

After institution of judgment creditors' suit to foreclose liens under Code 1913, c. 139, § 7 (sec. 5099), a trust deed creditor who has been made party to the suit cannot bring an independent suit to foreclose his mortgage, but such mortgage, like any other lien, must be enforced in that suit.

Appeal from Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Representative suit by Abney-Barnes Company and others to enforce certain judgment liens against Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company, W. L. Taylor, and another, and the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore and the Equitable Trust Company, consolidated with suit by A. G. Russell, Jr., against W. L. Taylor. Case referred to a commissioner to report an account, and exceptions to report by Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company and W. L. Taylor, and answers by the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company and the Equitable Trust Company seeking the foreclosure of deeds of trust and the discharge of receivers, with another reference and exceptions to report by Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company and W. L. Taylor, and decree directing receivers' sale of property of Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company unless it should pay the amount of indebtedness, and the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company and W. L. Taylor appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Strother, Taylor & Taylor, of Welch, for appellants.

Anderson, Strother, Hughes & Curd, of Welch, for appellee Abney-Barnes Co.

Haman, Cook, Chesnut & Markell and France, McLanahan & Rozler, all of Baltimore, Md., Brown, Jackson & Knight, of Charleston, and Graham Sale and J. Randolph Tucker, both of Welch, for other appellees.

LYNOH, J. Abney-Barnes Company, a corporation, and others, who sue on behalf of themselves and all other lien creditors of Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company, obtained the decree from which Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company and W. L. Taylor have appealed. The decree ascertained the corporate property of the defendant coal company, and the amount and priority of the liens chargeable thereto, and directed it to be sold to satisfy and discharge the liens reported by the commissioner to whom the cause was twice referred. The property consists of about 4,000 acres of valuable coal land in McDowell county, with two well-equipped and active coal mining operations.

The object of the suit instituted in the circuit court of McDowell county, July 10, 1915, is to enforce certain judgment liens against the defendants, Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company, W. L. Taylor, and James A. Strother, in favor of plaintiffs, Abney-Barnes Company and others. The bill also names as defendants the trustees in two mortgages or deeds of trust, promptly recorded, in which the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company is grantor, and which convey its real and personal property, the first being to the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore, dated July 1, 1910, to secure a bond issue of $300,000, all of which, except bonds aggregating $3,000, paid off and retired, is outstanding, the other to the Munsey Trust Company (now Equitable Trust Company), dated June 1, 1913, to secure a note issue of $125,000, of which $80,000 issued and sold is outstanding, the remainder, issued but not sold, being pledged as collateral security for debts of the corporation. On October 9, 1915, this case was consolidated with the case of A. G. Russell, Jr., against the defendant W. L. Taylor, and the consolidated cases referred to G. L. Counts, commissioner, to report an account showing (1) the description and quantity of all the real estate owned by the judgment debtors therein; (2) the liens upon said real estate, by whom held, their respective amounts, and priority; (3) whether the rents, issues, and profits of said real estate will in five years yield a revenue sufficient to pay off and discharge the liens and the costs of the suit. On November 4, 1915, W. L. Taylor filed his answer and cross-bill asking for the appointment of receivers for the property, in conformity with which the court appointed two, who accepted the position and have since had charge of the property.

While the suit was pending the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company, one of the trustees, instituted a suit in the federal court for the Southern district of West Virginia against the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company to obtain the foreclosure of the mortgage in which it was trustee. This relief was refused, but the court ordered the case retained on its docket while this suit remained undetermined. Later other creditors filed a petition in involuntary bankruptcy in the same court against defendant coal company, which petition also is still pending.

On September 12, 1916, Commissioner Counts filed his report, to which certain exceptions were filed by Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company and W. L. Taylor, those of the latter, however, being later withdrawn. At the June, 1917, term of the circuit court the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company and the Equitable Trust Company filed their answers in the cause, set up their deeds of trust, alleged certain defaults thereunder by the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company, and asked that the foreclosure rights under the deeds of trust be protected, and to that end prayed that the receivers be discharged and the trustees permitted to proceed to foreclose, or that the court compel the receivers to sell the property covered by the deeds of trust, to which answers general replications were filed by W. L. Taylor.

On June 29, 1917, on motion of the trustees, the court again referred the cause to Commissioner Counts to state specifically certain facts respecting the liens of the trustees, which report he filed October 22, 1917, and to which W. L. Taylor, Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company, and others excepted. On October 29th the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company and W. L. Taylor tendered and asked leave to file their petitions setting up the pendency of the bankruptcy proceeding in the federal court, and asked the state court to stay the prosecution of this suit to await the result of the bankruptcy, the filing of which petition, being objected to, was refused.

On November 5, 1917, the circuit court pronounced the decree here complained of on appeal, directing the receivers to sell the property of the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company at private sale on or before December 15, 1917, provided they are able to obtain therefor an offer of $500,000, and if such sale should not be effected by that date they were directed to advertise the property for sale and to sell the same at public auction on or before February 1, 1918, the notice, time, terms, and place thereof to be given by publication in the McDowell Recorder for four successive weeks. The Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company, W. L. Taylor, and others objected to a sale of the property at that time, and moved the court to require the receivers out of the funds in their hands, totaling about $95,000, to pay off the taxes on the property, and the interest then due on the bonds and interest coupons secured by the deeds of trust, which objection and motion were overruled; but the court further decreed that if before the time fixed for said sale the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company, or any one for it, should pay off the amount of the indebtedness of said coal company as set out in the decree, the receivers should not proceed to sell the property.

Of the ten assignments of error, only those deemed material, relevant, and necessary to a just decision will be considered in passing upon the merits of the cause, so far as they are now involved.

[2-4] The failure of the holders of the notes or bonds secured by the deeds executed to the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company and the Equitable Trust Company, respectively, to produce, prove, and file them while the cause was before the commis-sloner, and his reporting and the decree fixing them as liens against the property of the grantor, notwithstanding such failure, is the first error assigned by appellants. The bill alleges the due execution of the trust deeds, notes, and bonds, and the aggregate amount of both, the dates of their issuance, and the property on which they are liens, namely, all real and personal property of the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company, and exhibits copies of both instruments.

The two trust companies file separate answers to the bill, setting forth, briefly, the due execution and objects of the trusts, the dates thereof, the amount of the notes and bonds secured and negotiated. The answer of the former alleges that, of the $300,000 of bonds secured by the deed in which it is named trustee, $3,000 have been retired as paid and discharged, that the residue remain outstanding and subsisting valid liens against the trust subject, and that the interest coupons due and payable thereon January 1 and July 1, 1915, and 1916, and January 1, 1917, were not paid at the time the answer was filed; and further says that the number of the holders of the bonds authorized by the deed so to do have demanded that it, as the trustee, proceed to foreclose the lien by a sale of the trust property. The answer of the latter details the same facts as to the notes secured by the trust executed to it, and alleges the default of the grantor in the payment of interest as of the dates mentioned in the answer of the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company.

Notwithstanding the facts alleged in the bill and in the answers of the respondent trustees as to the bonds and notes and the deeds of trust, the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company does not answer or deny the allegations; it did not appear for any purpose, and the bill was taken as confessed as to it. Nor does the appellant Taylor, though president, creditor, and owner of a large block of the capital stock of the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company, in his answer or in the petition hereinafter referred to, or in any other manner than by exceptions to the reports of Commissioner Counts, directly or indirectly question the allegations of the bill with respect to the integrity or validity of the bond issues; and only by a general replication does he deny the allegations of the answers filed by his codefendants, the trustees.

None of the bonds or notes whose payment the trusts secured were produced before the commissioner, nor was the failure to produce them explained, and they were reported by him and decreed by the court as liens in favor of the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company and Equitable Trust Company; whether properly so or not is a question for solution in the light of the circumstances and of the provisions of the trust deeds. These provisions, it may be said, without reciting them in detail, confer upon the trustees ample power and authority to act as the representatives and agents of the purchasers and holders of the obligations secured, so far as necessary to protect their rights and interests, however affected, whether by litigation or in any other manner. Billmyer Lumber Co. v. Coal Co., 66 W. Va. 696, 66 S. E. 1073, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1101. The power to represent and protect the rights of such holders could not be more complete or effectual. The trusts vested broad and ample authority to act for them and on their behalf in all matters pertaining to them and to the enforcement of their rights arising thereunder.

It is true that as a general rule the notes or bonds secured must be produced, or a sufficient reason given for their nonproduction. Armstrong, C. D. & Co. v. Painter, 75 W. Va. 394, 399, 83 S. E. 1027; 3 Jones on Mortgages (7th Ed.) § 1469a, and cases cited. But where a bill or answer to foreclose mortgage liens against real estate gives a detailed description of the liens, and the mortgagor does not deny the facts alleged and the liens to be as set forth, it will be taken as true, and the bonds treated as valid and outstanding obligations of the debtor; nor in such cases is it necessary to show in whose hands they are or to require their production before the entry of the decree of foreclosure. Dickerman v. Northern Trust Co., 176 U. S. 181, 193, 20 Sup. Ct. 311, 44 L. Ed. 423; Anderson v. Culver, 127 N. Y. 377, 28 N. E. 32; 3 Jones on Mortgages (7th Ed.) § 1469a.

The general replication of W. L. Taylor to the answers of the trustees is the only denial of any of the allegations relating to the bonds and notes, and that cannot avail as a denial by the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company, the mortgagor, who made no denial of either the bill or answers. And, further, it is the general rule in cases involving deeds of trust securing large numbers of outstanding and widely scattered bonds or notes, and providing for a trustee to represent the holders thereof, that—"It is not necessary that each claimant of a bond or of unpaid interest should, at this stage of a foreclosure case, identify himself as the owner of bonds or unpaid coupons. It is not necessary that the bonds with coupons should be produced before a nisi foreclosure decree. It is only necessary that it shall, at this stage of the cause, appear that there has been a default, and the amount of that default. This showing has been made. Should a decree of sale be made absolute, the holders of bonds can then be required to produce their bonds and coupons before a master, and all questions connected with the amount due each, and of ownership, can then be determined. Guaranty Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Green Cove Springs & M.

R. Co., 139 U. S. 150, 151 [11 Sup. Ct. 512, 85 L. Ed. 116]. Such a decree is not to be regarded as final as to the debts entitled to share in the distribution, for any other creditor may challenge the debt when the claims are produced in the master's office for ascertainment and classification. The decree for a foreclosure only establishes that there has been a default in the payment of the three last installments of interest. It does not establish that that interest is due to any particular person." Central Trust Co. v. Cincinnati, H. & D. Ry. Co. (O. C.) 169 Fed. 466, 469; Toler v. East Tenn., etc., Ry. Co. (O. C.) 67 Fed. 168, 180.

Thus it is only on the final decree of distribution that it is necessary for the various holders of the bonds and notes to present and prove them before the receiver or master, as the case may be. The court should not direct the distribution of the proceeds of the sale until it shall be ascertained that the bonds and notes outstanding represent proper and valid liabilities against the debtor, and such as he has authorized to be created.

[6-7] There arises the next question whether before decreeing a sale of the trust property it was the duty of the court to ascertain by reference to a commissioner, or by an express finding of its own based upon the pleadings and the facts disclosed, whether the rents and profits will be sufficient to pay and discharge the lien indebtedness within five years. Such preliminary investigation and report generally are necessary. Section 7, c. 139 (sec. 5099) Code; Westinghouse Co. v. Ingram, 79 W. Va. 220, 223, 224, 90 S. E. 837; Dunfee v. Childs, 45 W. Va. 155, 164, 30 S. E. 102. And when necessary, the burden of proof rests upon the creditor seeking the sale. Newlon v. Wade, 43 W. Va. 283, 286, 27 S. E. 244. But if the bill alleges and the respondents do not deny that the rents and profits to accrue from the property will not in five years discharge the liens, an inquiry need not be had. Section 36, c. 125 (sec. 4790) Code; Newlon v. Wade, cited; Muse v. Friedenwald, 77 Va. 57; Ewart v. Saunders, 25 Grat. (Va.) 203; Horton v. Bond, 28 Grat. (Va.) 815; Barr v. White, 30 Grat. (Va.) 531. Despite the failure to deny the allegations of the bill as to their insufficiency, the court directed the commissioner to ascertain that fact; but this the commissioner failed to do in either his first or second report, nor did the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company or W. L. Taylor except to the reports on that ground, though the latter did except to the first report because of that failure, but immediately withdrew his exception.

While the primary object of the bill in this case is to secure a decree to sell the property of the coal company, and appropriate the fund derived therefrom to the payment and discharge of the lien of a judgment recovered by the plaintiff Abney-Barnes Company, the ultimate object is to enforce the prior trust or mortgage liens created by the judgment debtor, and the plaintiff, to effectuate the attainment of the object he seeks, specifically alleged the probable insufficiency of the rents and profits to discharge all liens within five years. This broad declaration of the pleading is not denied. The statement in the answer of W. L. Taylor that he neither admits nor denies these allegations is not such a denial as section 36, c. 125 (sec. 4790) Code, contemplates. To avail, the denial must be specific and positive. Grant v. Cumberland Valley Cement Co., 58 W. Va. 162, 172, 52 S. E. 36; Shurtleff v. Right, 66 W. Va. 582, 66 S. E. 719, 135 Am. St. Rep. 1041; Ihrig v. Ihrig, 78 W. Va. 360, 88 S. E. 1010. The mere statement in an answer that the respondent neither admits nor denies a material fact alleged in the bill does not amount to a denial of the existence of that fact.

[8, 17, 18] And, further, in a suit to enforce liens created by trust deeds given to secure payment of an indebtedness, which provides for a sale for cash in case of default, it is ordinarily not error to decree a sale of the land without ascertaining its rental value. Lewis, Hubbard & Co. v. Toney, 76 W. Va. 80, 85 S. E. 30; Stafford v. Jones, 73 W. Va. 299, 303, 304, 80 S. E. 825; Neff v. Wooding, 83 Va. 432, 2 S. E. 731; Kyger v. Sipe, 89 Va. 507, 16 S. E. 627. After the institution of a judgment creditors' suit to enforce liens under section 7, c. 139 (sec. 5099) Code, a trust deed creditor who has been made a party to the suit cannot bring an independent suit to foreclose his mortgage, but such mortgage, like any other lien, must be enforced in that proceeding. Stafford v. Jones, 65 W. Va. 567, 64 S. E. 723. But the trustee or mortgagee can obtain in such suit the enforcement of his mortgage according to its terms if his trust deed is prior to the judgment liens, and, if not, its proper order or priority will be determined. A mortgagee does not lose any substantive rights by being compelled to enforce his trust lien in a pending suit, and the time and terms of the sale will be determined by the provisions of the trust deed, not by the rules applicable to the enforcement of judgment creditors' liens. Watterson v. Miller, 42 W. Va. 108, 24 S. E. 578; Stafford v. Jones, 65 W. Va. 567, 64 S. E. 723; Stafford v. Jones, 73 W. Va. 299, 80 S. E. 825; Neff v. Wooding, 83 Va. 432, 2 S. E. 731.

[9, 18] The creditors' suit in the circuit court of McDowell county, it is contended, should have been stayed by the judge of that court until the termination of the bankruptcy proceedings against the Davy-Pocahontas Coal Company instituted January 13, 1916, in the federal court for the Southern district of West Virginia. It must be observed, however, that this proceeding was begun more than six months after the institution of the creditors' suit in the state court, and, under the decisions of the United States Supreme Court and other federal courts, the rule recognized is that the court which first obtains rightful jurisdiction over the subject-matter in a proceeding in rem to enforce prior liens will not be interfered with by any other court, including a court of bankruptcy. Pickens v. Roy, 187 U. S. 177, 23 Sup. Ct. 78, 47 L. Ed. 128; Metcalf v. Barker, 187 U. S. 165, 23 Sup. Ct. 67, 47 L. Ed. 122; In re Pilcher & Son (D. C.) 228 Fed. 189, 142; In re Schmidt (D. C.) 224 Fed. 814; Blair v. Bralley, 221 Fed. 1, 136 C. C. A. 524; Collier on Bankruptcy (11th Ed.) pp. 293, 294, notes 57 and 59; 1 Fed. Stat. Ann. (2d Ed.) pp. 635-6. This holding does nothing more than reaffirm and approve the general, if not the universal, rule that concedes to the court which first regularly and lawfully acquires jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties interested the right to proceed undisturbed to the final determination of the controversy involved. Whan v. Hope Natural Gas Co., 81 W. Va. 338, 94 S. E. 365. It is unnecessary to determine what the result would have been with respect to the granting of a stay, if the bankruptcy proceeding had been instituted within four months after the beginning of the actions which resulted in the judgment liens sued on in the creditors' suit, or what it would have been had the proceeding in McDowell county been one in personam instead of in rem.

[1] The sixth, seventh, and eighth assignments relate to and comprehend the same general subject, namely, the refusal to allow the motion of the defendants, now appellants, to apply the $95,000 under the control of the court to the payment of the overdue and unpaid interest coupons attached to the bonds and notes, and thereby remove the default relied on by the defendant trustees acting for and on behalf of the holders and owners of the bonds and notes. This fund was accumulated through the administration and management of the coal mining operations on the trust estate or property by receivers appointed by the court upon the petition and motion of the appellant Taylor.

The third and final report of the receivers, the only report appearing in the record, shows $95,000 as the net receipts for the first six months of the year 1917 from all sources after deducting disbursements, which include taxes on the property, administration expenses, insurance, repairs, and compensation to the receivers. Except for the intervention of some unusual or extraordinary cause or circumstance, a property from which is produced during six months the net sum realized may not improperly to be assumed to be valuable and profitable, a property likely to produce under the same or an improved management a return upon the investment such as will speedily absolve it from incumbrances, and, when so disincumbered, yield a profit to its owners. But whether the returns be sufficient to pay the indebtedness against the property within five years or not, a proposition affirmed by appellants and denied by appellees, is not controlling or decisive upon the question discussed.

An owner who is about to be deprived of his property to satisfy liens, however created, has the clear right to know within a reasonable degree of certainty its status as to the charges for which it is to be sold. The fund in the treasury of the court and under its control arose out of the trust property and is a part of it, and as such is subject to the payment of the liens binding it. Though predicated upon facts somewhat different, the principle enunciated in Strayer v. Long, 83 Va. 715, pt. 2, syl., 3 S. E. 372, is not inapplicable, though appellees deny its applicability; that is, that all sums in the hands of receivers realized from property of the debtor should, before subjecting it to sale, be applied as credits on his indebtedness, that he may know to what extent it remains a charge against his land. Such a requirement conforms to principles governing courts of equity. To hold this fund in reserve for purposes merely conjectural, and that may not occur, is not consonant with justice and equity. The statement of the proposition shows its harshness. The receivers continue to manage the property; the court refuses to discharge them upon appellees' motion; the fund in their hands when the decree was entered the receivers doubtless have since increased at the same rate, perhaps more than quadrupled it, and to that extent exhausted the property, while interest has proportionately augmented the indebtedness without the equivalent compensatory reduction of the trust liens. Because of the receivership, the debtor does not have access to the property. He cannot control it; cannot deal with it, sell or incumber it, to relieve it from incumbrances; and the court and the receivers are converting it into liquid assets without applying the returns to his relief. His request for their appointment does not meet the situation or prejudice his rights.

Moreover, the application of the fund so produced from the property to the payment of the overdue interest coupons would have partially, perhaps totally, absolved it from that default. Such, it is true, was within the sound discretion of the court; but as the interest was in effect the primary liability of the debtor, and as such, together with the principal, the first charge upon the land, it seems inequitable, under the cir-circumstances, to hold the fund subject to some preconceived situation demanding its expenditure.

This application reasonably falls within the rule requiring certainty in the ascertainment of liens for which the incumbered land is liable before decreeing it to be sold for their satisfaction. Payne v. Webb, 23 W. Va. 558; Carter v. Carter, 98 S. E. 296, contemporaneously decided. Such course is to be commended because of the probability of discouraging bidding by creditors, as they probably would bid if the amounts of the liens were fixed definitely by the decree. The same principle or necessity is recognized and the rule enforced in Golden v. O'Connell, 69 W. Va. 374, 71 S. E. 384, where some of the lienors agreed to a sale of part of the tract subject to their lien to be divided into lots and sold, the proceeds to be applied to discharge the liens; and the court held it necessary to make such an application before decreeing the sale of the other part of the land.

[11-14] The failure to give a day to redeem before sale is the next assignment to be noted. As a general rule, according to many decisions of this court, a decree to sell land for debt without giving the debtor reasonable time for payment before sale is cause for reversal. King v. Burdett, 44 W. Va. 561, 29 S. E. 1010; 8 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Rep. 693. The giving of time for advertising the sale is not the equivalent of a specific day to redeem. Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 122. Though somewhat archaic, the rule is too well established in this state to be disturbed or ignored in some circumstances. However, it is held not to apply to decrees directing a trustee to sell land conveyed to him to secure the payment of the grantor's debts, where the deed fixes the terms and conditions of the sale. Watterson v. Miller, 42 W. Va. 108, 24 S. E. 578. See, also, Stafford v. Jones, 73 W. Va. 299, 303, 304, 80 S. E. 825. In the former case Judge Brannon says:

"That is a technical rule which requires a court to give a day to redeem before sale in addition to the time required for notice of sale. It ought not to be applied to sales under trust deeds, as a trust deed is essentially a contract, * * * and the court has no right to give indulgence when the parties have provided against it."

So in this case, if the court had decreed a sale at public auction upon the notice and in the manner required by the trust deed, it would not have been necessary to fix a day to redeem, as the decree would merely have enforced the provisions of the contract.

[15, 16] But the court went further, and authorized a private sale to be conducted by the receivers, and directed a public sale to be had upon four weeks' published notice only in case a private sale could not be effected in the time allowed. Since the court authorized a sale by private negotiation to be conducted through the receivers, which under the terms of the decree could have been made immediately upon its entry, a reasonable time and opportunity to redeem the land ought to have been accorded the debtor before such sale could be consummated and his rights irretrievably jeopardized.

Finally, appellants complain of the advertisement directed by the court in the decree of sale, in that the direction failed to follow the requirement of the trust deeds, which, we think, should have been done as part of the contract of the parties. For this reason, and because of the failure to apply the funds in the hands of the receivers to the partial relief of the debtors and exoneration of their property from incumbrance, and the lack of a definite ascertainment of the exact amount due on the total indebtedness binding the property, we are of opinion to reverse the decree, award costs to appellants, and remand the cause for further proceedings.

Declarations relating to pedigree or genealogy are restricted to declarations of deceased persons who were related by blood or marriage to the person and therefore interested in the succession in question.

4. EVIDENCE ⇨295 — PEDIGREE — DECLARATIONS.

Declarations relating to pedigree to be admissible must have been made before the beginning of the controversy in which the question of pedigree arises.

5. EVIDENCE ⇨288—RELATIONSHIP—PUBLIC OPINION.

Public opinion in the community is inadmissible to show pedigree or genealogy or the relation of one person to another.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by Joseph Ashe against Nancy Pettiford and others. Verdict and judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. New trial.

The action was brought to recover possession of a tract of land on Welch's creek, containing 60 acres. Plaintiff claimed the land by collateral descent from Martha A. Pettiford, who, he alleged, was his sister, which allegation the defendants denied, so that the sole question was whether the relation of brother and sister existed between the plaintiff and Martha A. Pettiford. In order to show that Martha was not the sister of the plaintiff, the defendants asked Henry Pettiford, one of their witnesses, "What relation, by general reputation in the community, was there between Joe Ashe and Martha A. Pettiford?" The plaintiff entered an objection to the question, which was overruled by the court, and plaintiff excepted and now assigns the ruling as error. The witness answered that they were no kin, nor did they have the same father or mother, Martha's father being a man by the name of Yates, and her mother was Mary Yates, while Joe Ashe's mother was named Sylvania. The testimony of the witnesses in this connection tended to prove that Joe Ashe, the plaintiff, and Martha A. Pettiford, were not brother and sister or so related as to make the plaintiff the heir of Martha and as such entitled by descent to the land, which belonged to her.

There was other testimony of the reputation in the Pettiford family, as to the relation between Joe Ashe and Martha Pettiford, and as to other matters bearing upon the question; but we need not consider it.

There was verdict and judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., and P. H. Bell and Z. V. Norman, both of Plymouth, for appellant.

L. W. Gaylord, of Greenville, and Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] We are of the opinion that error was committed in overruling the objection to testimony of the witness Henry Pettiford, as to the general reputation of the pedigree or genealogy of Joe and Martha, as this must be shown by reputation in the family of the parties concerned, or by declarations of deceased members of such family, and not by general reputation in the community. The error was substantial and prejudicial.

[2] It was held in Kaywood v. Barnett, 20 N. C. 91, that, in order to warrant the admission of declarations relating to pedigree, it is essential: First, that the parties who made the declarations be proved to be dead; secondly, that the declarants were likely to know the facts. The tradition must therefore be derived from persons so connected with the family that it is natural and likely, from their domestic habits and connections, that they are speaking the truth, and that they could not be mistaken, citing 2 Starkie on Ev. 604, 605. A question exactly like the one now being considered, was asked in Erwin v. Bailey, 123 N. C. 628, 634, 31 S. E. 844, 846. To make the analogy between the two perfectly clear, we quote literally from the opinion of the court in that case:

"The defendants proposed to prove that there was a general reputation that plaintiff was not the child of Caesar. This evidence was objected to and ruled out, and defendants excepted. We do not think there was any error in the court's sustaining plaintiff's objection, and in overruling the exceptions of defendants to this evidence. The case of Woodward v. Blue, 107 N. C. 407 [12 S. E. 453, 10 L. R. A. 682, 22 Am. St. Rep. 897], comes nearer sustaining defendant's exceptions than any case called to our attention. And that case does not do so, as we think."

This kind of proof is a well-known exception to the general rule excluding hearsay, and it rests in part on the supposed necessity of receiving such evidence to avoid a failure of justice, and in part on the ground that individuals are generally supposed to know and to be interested in those facts of family history about which they converse, and that they are generally under little temptation to state untruths in respect to such matters which might be readily exposed. 2 Jones on Evidence (Ed. of 1913 by Horwitz) § 312, pp. 704 and 705. Lord Chancellor Eldon once said, in part, that declarations in the family, descriptions in wills, descriptions upon monuments, descriptions in Bibles, and registry books, all are admitted upon the principle that they are the natural effusions of a party who must know the truth and who speaks upon an occasion when his mind stands in an even position, without any temptation to exceed or fall short of the truth. In other words, the law resorts to hearsay evidence in cases of pedigree, upon the ground of the interest in the declarations of the person from whom the descent is made out, and their consequent interest in knowing the connections of the family.

[3] The rule of admission is therefore restricted to the declarations of deceased persons who were related by blood or marriage to the person, and therefore interested in the succession in question. From necessity, in cases of pedigree, hearsay evidence is admissible. But this rule is limited to the members of the family, who may be supposed to have known the relationship which existed in its different branches. The declarations of these individuals, they being dead, may be given in evidence to prove pedigree; and so is tradition in the family, which is the hearsay of those who may be supposed to have known the fact, handed down from one to another, evidence. As evidence of this description must vary by the circumstances of each case, it is difficult, if not impracticable, to deduce from the books any precise and definite rule on the subject. It is not every statement or tradition in the family that can be admitted in evidence. The tradition must be from persons having such a connection with the party to whom it relates that it is natural and likely, from their domestic habits and connections, that they are speaking the truth, and that they could not be mistaken. 2 Jones on Evidence, pp. 705, 706; Whitelock v. Baker, 13 Vesey, 514; Fulkerson v. Holmes, 117 U. S. 389, 6 Sup. Ct. 780, 29 L. Ed. 915; and 16 Cyc. 1225 to 1235, where the subject is fully discussed with a great many authorities in the notes presenting and illustrating manifold features of the question.

It was stated by Justice Woods, in Fulkerson v. Holmes, supra, that—

"The fact to be established is one of pedigree. The proof to show pedigree forms a well-settled exception to the rule which excludes hearsay evidence. This exception has been recognized on the ground of necessity; for, as in inquiries respecting relationship or descent, facts must often be proved which occurred many years before the trial, and were known to but few persons, it is obvious that the strict enforcement in such cases of the rules against hearsay evidence would frequently occasion a failure of justice. Taylor on Evidence, § 635. Traditional evidence is therefore admissible. Jackson v. Cooley, 8 Johns. [N. Y.] 128; Jackson v. Browner, 18 Johns. [N. Y.] 37; Jackson v. King, 5 Cowen [N. Y.] 237 [15 Am. Dec. 468]; Davis v. Wood, 1 Wheat. 6 [4 L. Ed. 22]. The rule is that declarations of deceased persons who were de jure related by blood or marriage to the family in question may be given in evidence in matters of pedigree. Jewell v. Jewell, 1 How. 219 [11 L. Ed. 108]; Blackburn v. Crawford, 3 Wall. 175 [18 L. Ed. 186]; Johnson v. Lawson, 2 Bing. 86; Vowels v. Young, 13 Ves. 147; Monkton v. Atty. Gen., 2 Russ. & Myl. 159; White v. Strother, 11 Ala. 720. A qualification of the rule is that, before a declaration can be admitted in evidence, the relationship of the declarant with the family must be established by some proof independent of the declaration itself. Monkton v. Attorney General, 2 Russ. & Myl. 156; Attorney General v. Kohler, 9 H. L. Cas. 680; Rex v. All-Saints, 7 B. & C. 789. But it is evident that but slight proof of the relationship will be required, since the relationship of the declarant with the family might be as difficult to prove as the very fact in controversy."

McKelvey on Evidence (2d Ed.) p. 271, says that—

"Where the question of pedigree is one of some years back, it is generally the case that there is no living witness who has personal knowledge of the facts, and it therefore becomes necessary, if any proof at all is to be had, to resort to what may be said to be the reputation in the family concerning the facts; that is, what has been handed down from father to son, or to other form of hearsay evidence in the family. The rule is very strict as to the degree of relationship which must exist in order to render the declaration admissible. Formerly it was thought that it should be confined to those connected by blood only with the family to which the pedigree related, but subsequently it became established that declarations of a husband or wife should be admitted"—citing Shrewsbury Peerage Case, 7 H. L. Cases, t, at 26, and Jewell's Lessee v. Jewell, 1 How. 219, 231, 11 L. Ed. 108.

But it has been held that there are qualifications as to the competency of a husband's declarations. Harland v. Eastman, 107 Ill. 535. See, also, Conn., etc., Ins. Co. v. Schwenk, 94 U. S. 593, 24 L. Ed. 294; Eastman v. Martin, 19 N. H. 152; Carnes v. Crandall, 10 Iowa, 377.

[4] A further condition of the admissibility of declarations of this nature is that they must have been made before the beginning of the controversy in which the question of pedigree arises. A common form of expressing this condition is that the declarations must have been made antelitem motam. This does not mean, however, that it is sufficient if they have been made before the commencement of the actual suit. As a matter of fact, they must have been made before the existence of the controversy which has given rise to the suit, in order to be admissible. This is a rule of fairness, and is a necessary precaution against unreliable and prejudiced statements made as the result of sympathy or passion, or other feeling, or with a view to their subsequent use in litigation. McKelvey on Evidence (2d Ed.) pp. 280, 281; Stein v. Bowman, 13 Pet. 209, 220, 10 L. Ed. 129; People v. Fulton Fire Ins. Co., 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 205, 209; Northrop v. Hale, 76 Me. 306, 49 Am. Rep. 615; Barnum v. Barnum, 42 Md. 251, 304.

It was held in Stein v. Bowman, supra, that the testimony of a witness "that he had been in Hanover, Germany, 'last summer,' and there heard, from many old persons of whom he inquired, that the plaintiff was the brother of Nicholas Stone, deceased," was excluded on the ground that the declarations were not of "members of the family, who may be supposed to have known the relationships which existed in its different branches." 2 McKelvey on Ev. (2d Ed.) p. 273, note 37; Chapman v. Chapman, 2 Conn. 347, 7 Am. Dec. 277.

[5] We have thus stated, in a casual way, the reasons underlying this exception, as it is called by some authorities, to the general rule concerning hearsay. It appears from this statement that public opinion in the community to show pedigree or genealogy, or the relation of one person to another, is not admissible. It would violate the fundamental theory upon which the exception is based. Judge Elliott, after stating that only one state has ever approved such evidence, assigns the reasons why it should not be admitted in this language:

"The exception to the general rule of evidence, the admissibility of declarations, is confined, first to the declarations of persons deceased, for the reason that if living they should be called as witnesses; second, it is generally confined to the declarations of relatives, because they are likely to be acquainted with the pedigree of each other; and, if the exception was extended to strangers, before the testimony could be admitted it would be necessary to prove the degree of intimacy, the opportunities for knowledge, the source of the information, etc., which would render the exception uncertain and difficult to apply. But in Tennessee it was held that the declarations are not to be confined to members of the family, and even public repute in the community is admissible." Elliott on Ev. § 2197, p. 688.

The cases in the single state mentioned do not all refer to general reputation in the community, but only one of them, and this is not supported by the only authority cited for the statement, which was based on special facts, and the testimony offered was more than mere general repute. Even this decision was met by a very strong dissent from Judge Spencer, one of the ablest and most distinguished judges in the state where it was rendered, and is contrary to all the authorities.

But, however this may be, we have shown by cases already cited that this court has distinctly rejected it as opposed to the principles which justify the exception itself. It would be unsafe, and too wide a departure from the ordinary rule as to hearsay, to establish pedigree by any such standard of proof. We have designated hearsay as to pedigree an exception to the general rule as to such evidence, but Mr. Greenleaf does not so treat it, but calls it original evidence. It does not follow, he says, because the writing or words in question are those of a third person, not under oath, that therefore they are to be considered as hearsay. On the contrary it happens in many cases that the very fact in controversy is whether such things were written or spoken, and not whether they were true; and, in other cases, such language or statements, whether written or spoken, may be the natural or inseparable concomitants of the principal fact in controversy. In such cases it is obvious that the writings or words are not within the meaning of hearsay, but are original and independent facts, admissible in proof of the issue. 1 Greenleaf on Ev. § 100. The learned author then undertakes to enumerate a number of instances in which what may, in common parlance, be termed hearsay, is original and competent evidence. Among these he includes "evidence of general reputation, reputed ownership, public rumor, general notoriety, and the like, though composed of the speech of third persons not under oath."

1 Greenleaf Ev. 101. "To this head," he adds, "may be referred much of the evidence sometimes termed hearsay, which is admitted in cases of pedigree. * * * And general repute in the family, proved by the testimony of a member of it, has been considered as falling within the rule." Other pertinent statements as to proof of pedigree may be found in the same volume at pages 101, 104.

There are other exceptions to the testimony which raise very serious questions, but we do not deem it necessary to discuss them, as, perhaps, they may be avoided hereafter, or presented in such a different form as to materially change even the substance of them. Besides there is scarcely any evidence that the declarations or reputation originated ante litem motam, and there is grave doubt whether the declarations came from those qualified to speak. We have discussed the rule as to pedigree more fully than we would otherwise have done, for the reason that it does not seem to have received very much consideration before, and because of the great and important interests dependent upon or which may be affected by it.

There must be another trial because of the error indicated.

New trial.

LAMB v. LAMB. (No. 9.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 26, 1919.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES §154(2) — EASEMENTS—DRAINAGE.

Where landowner established artificial system of drainage for benefit of entire property and subsequently separated land into two tracts which passed to different parties, upper owner had easement, giving him right of drainage over lower tract by means of the lead ditches built by their predecessor.

2. EASEMENTS §53—COST OF MAINTENANCE AND REPAIRS.

Generally, in absence of contract stipulation or prescriptive right to the contrary, owner of easement is liable for costs of maintenance and repairs, where easement exists and is used and enjoyed for the benefit of dominant estate alone.

3. EASEMENTS §53—RIGHTS OF OWNER OF DOMINANT ESTATE—ENTRY UPON SERVIENT ESTATE.

Generally, in the absence of contract stipulation or prescriptive right to the contrary, owner of easement existing for the benefit of and used and enjoyed by the dominant estate alone has the right of entry upon servient estate for the purpose of maintaining easement in good repair.

4. EASEMENTS §64—BENEFIT OF OWNER OF DOMINANT ESTATE—FAILURE TO MAINTAIN AND REPAIR.

Generally, in absence of contract stipulation or a prescriptive right to the contrary, owner of easement existing and used for the benefit of the dominant estate alone may be held liable for injuries resulting from his willful or negligent failure to keep easement in good repair.

5. EASEMENTS §53 — DUTY OF OWNER OF DOMINANT ESTATE—MAINTENANCE OF EASEMENT.

Owner of dominant estate is not required to maintain or repair the easement for the benefit of the servient owner.

6. EASEMENTS §30(1) — ABANDONMENT BY DOMINANT OWNER.

Owner of dominant estate may ordinarily abandon easement without infraction of any rights of servient owner.

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES §154(2) — EASEMENT — MAINTENANCE OF LEAD DITCHES.

Where drainage system has been established over land of upper and lower owners by prior owner of both tracts, and where both upper and lower owners are benefited by the ditches, the upper owner, though having easement giving him a right to drainage over land of lower owner, is not required to maintain and keep in repair the ditches extending over lower land, but at most can be required to pay his pro rata part of expense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Camden County; Bond, Judge.

Action by Joseph Lamb against W. J. Lamb. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff excepts and appeals. No error.

The action was instituted by plaintiff, the lower proprietor, against the defendant, adjoining and upper proprietor, to recover damages for flow of water wrongfully diverted upon plaintiff's land and for damages caused by failure on part of defendant to clear off and properly maintain on plaintiff's land certain lead ditches running through both tracts, whereby it was claimed that plaintiff's land was soaked and injured.

On specific issue submitted, there was verdict of the jury negating the charge of wrongful diversion, and, his honor having ruled that, on the facts in evidence, no recovery could be had on the second aspect of the case, there was judgment on the verdict for defendant and plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Aydlett, Simpson & Sawyer, of Elizabeth City, for appellant.

Ehringhaus & Small, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The facts in evidence tended to show that the plaintiff and defendant were adjoining proprietors of two tracts of land, the plaintiff owning the lower tract along certain lead ditches hereinafter referred to; that they had obtained these tracts of land from their respective fathers, and they in turn held them under a devise from the grandfather, Abner Lamb; that Abner Lamb owned the land as one tract, and during his possession had constructed a system of drains and ditches through the same, and at his death he divided the land into two tracts, described in the complaint, the lower of which has become the property of plaintiff and the upper the property of defendant, and at the time of his death and the different transfers these ditches and drains were openly maintained and used for the benefit of the land and its proper tillage; that the lead ditches ran from defendant's land through plaintiff's and on through lands of lower proprietors into a swamp, the ultimate and natural outflow, "and there were tap or side ditches of defendant, running across his lands from lead to lead and draining into the leads and then on through plaintiff's land as stated, and that, on plaintiff's land, the latter, by his side or tap ditches, drained into these leads." There was also allegation, with supporting evidence on the part of plaintiff, tending to show that, some time prior to the institution of the suit, defendant had failed and refused to clear off and keep open the portion of these lead ditches which were on plaintiff's land, and by reason of such failure the same had proved inadequate to the proper drainage of plaintiff's property, causing damage thereto. It was shown, further, "that defendant had offered, in connection with plaintiff and others using the three big drains or lead ditches, to pay his pro rata part of cutting out the ditch from end to end along with plaintiff and others using the same." Upon these, the facts chiefly relevant to the question presented, and under authoritative decisions here and elsewhere, an easement was created, constituting the upper tract the dominant tenement and conferring on the owner the right of drainage over the lower by means of these lead ditches referred to, it appearing that Abner Lamb, the grandfather, when owner of the land as one tract, had established thereon an artificial system of drainage continuous and permanent in its nature and openly used and enjoyed for the benefit of the entire property at the time the same was separated in two tracts and passed by devise to his sons, from whom the present parties acquired their titles, respectively. Hair v. Downing, 98 N. C. 172, 2 S. E. 520; Shaw v. Etheridge, 48 N. C. 301; Mitchell v. Seipel, 53 Md. 251, 36 Am. Rep. 404; Scott v. Moore, 98 Va. 668, 37 S. E. 342, 81 Am. St. Rep. 749; Sanderlin v. Baxter, 76 Va. 299, 44 Am. Rep. 165; Fayter v. North, 30 Utah, 156, 83 Pac. 742, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 410; Elliott v. Rhett, 5 Rich. (S. C.) 405, 57 Am. Dec. 750; 3 Farnham on Waters and Water Rights, p. 2440 et seq. In this last, the South Carolina case, the general principle applicable is well stated as follows:

"Apart from all consideration of time, there is implied, upon the severance of a heritage, a grant of all those continuous and apparent easements which have * * * been used by the owner during the unity, though they have had no legal existence as easements, as well as of all those necessary easements without which the enjoyment of the several portions could not be fully had."

[2-6] We do not understand that the appellant desires to question the correctness of the principle as stated, but it is urged, in his behalf, that when the defendant's property has been constituted the dominant tenement, giving its owner an easement of drainage, as claimed, such owner has thereby become responsible for the costs and charges required for the upkeep of the ditches on the lands of plaintiff, and is liable for damages caused by a breach of duty in this respect. It is undoubtedly the general rule that, in the absence of contract stipulation or prescriptive right to the contrary, the owner of an easement is liable for costs of maintenance and repairs where it exists and is used and enjoyed for the benefit of the dominant estate alone; that he has a right of entry upon the servient estate for the purpose indicated, and may be held liable for injuries arising from his willful or negligent breach of duty in these matters. The position finds support in Hair v. Downing, one of the North Carolina cases heretofore cited, and is very generally approved in the decisions and text-writers on the subject. Bellevue v. Daly, 14 Idaho, 545, 94 Pac. 1036, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 992, 125 Am. St. Rep. 179, 14 Ann. Cas. 1136; Oney v. West Buena Vista Land Co., 104 Va. 580, 52 S. E. 343, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 832, 113 Am. St. Rep. 1066; Dudgeon v. Bronson, 159 Ind. 562; 9 R. C. L. pp. 794, 795; 14 Cyc. p. 1209; Jones on Easements, § 821. But in such case the owner of the dominant estate is not required to maintain or repair the easement for the benefit of the servient tenement. He may ordinarily abandon it altogether without infraction of any rights of the servient owner. 9 R. C. L. p. 795, citing Pomfret v. Ricroft, 1 Saund. 321, 10 Eng. Rul. Cases, p. 16, and Mason v. Shrewsbury, etc., Ry. Co., L. R., 6 Q. B. p. 578, 10 Eng. Rul. Cas. p. 22, and note, a general principle recognized and applied in this state in Canal Co. v. Burnham, 147 N. C. 41, 60 S. E. 650, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 945, 125 Am. St. Rep. 527.

[7] But where, as in this case, a system of drainage has been constructed for the benefit of the two properties and is used and enjoyed by the owners of both, the general rule is or should be, as held by the court below, that each is required to maintain the portion of the system on his own land, unless the conditions and circumstances presented should make such an obligation so unequal and burdensome on one at the expense of the other that a different method of adjustment would be required. While we have found very little authority bearing on the direct question, the rule suggested will usually make for the right of the matter, and seems to be approved in Winslow v. Furhman, 25 Ohio St. 639. On the record, the evidence offered in support of plaintiff's claim is not set out in detail, but from the general statement we conclude that his demand is made to rest, and he so intends it, on the proposition that the defendant is liable to bear the entire burden of keeping these lead ditches open, and he is charged with the full expense of maintenance and repairs, not only for the proper use and enjoyment of his own easement, but for the benefit also of the servient estate.

We are confirmed in this estimate of plaintiff's case by the statement appearing in the record that "defendant had offered, in connection with plaintiff and others using the three big drains or lead ditches, to pay his pro rata part of cutting out the ditch from end to end," etc., and this, in any event, is all that plaintiff could justly require.

We find no error in the ruling of his honor, and the judgment for defendant must be affirmed.

No error.

STATE v. LEWIS. (No. 90.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 26, 1919.)

1. JURY ⇐70(3, 12)—SECURING SPECIAL VENIRE—NUNC PRO TUNC ORDER AND RETURN.

When court had ordered sheriff to summon venire of 40 men, and clerk failed to enter order, but sheriff notified jurors who were named in oral order to appear so far as they could be found, the court in the exercise of its discretion could amend the proceedings and allow the clerk to issue the writ, and the sheriff to make proper return nunc pro tunc.

2. CRIMINAL LAW ⇐1152(2)—MATTERS OF DISCRETION—SPECIAL VENIRE—REVIEW.

Since court had power to amend its record by inserting order for special venire and the issuing of the writ to the sheriff, and the entering of the sheriff's return upon the process nunc pro tunc, the court on appeal will not review the exercise of such power.

3. JURY \Leftrightarrow 82(2)—IRREGULARITY IN PROCURING.

Irregularity in procuring a jury could not, in the absence of fraud or corruption, affect the rights of accused.

4. WITNESSES \Leftrightarrow 406—CONTRADICTORY TESTIMONY—ALIBI—ADMISSIBILITY.

To contradict testimony that accused had been sick for two weeks, including day upon which rape was committed, evidence that within said two weeks he had been seen two or three miles from home, had chased another woman, and had returned three nights afterwards and peeped into the window of her home, was competent.

5. RAPE \Leftrightarrow 51(1)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In prosecution for rape, evidence held sufficient to support verdict of guilty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Daniels, Judge.

Jim Lewis was convicted of rape, and appeals. No error.

The prisoner was charged with rape, committed on the person of Mrs. Sarah King, on January 17, 1918. The prosecutrix testified that she was alone in the field picking cotton, about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, when the defendant approached her from the negro cemetery and asked her what she received for picking cotton, and, then, if the butcher wagon had passed by. He walked along the cotton row behind her, and, when she reached the end of the row, he seized her and threw her down to the ground, and had connection with her, by force and against her will. She cried out, and he choked her. When he left, after being there a half hour, he went towards the branch. She met Mr. Jones on her way to her home and told him about it, and he went back with her to the place. She described minutely how the prisoner was dressed at the time, and stated that he had a gap in his teeth. She identified the prisoner as the man who assaulted her in the field, and expressed herself as being positive and sure that he is the man. She was corroborated by Mr. Jones, who testified that he went to the field with Mrs. King and saw the place where, as she alleged, the act was committed, and it appeared as though there had been a struggle there. He further stated that there were bruises on Mrs. King's throat, and she was crying when he met her in the road. He accompanied her to her home and reported the facts to Mr. Fulghum, the constable, who also went to the place where Mrs. King was assaulted, and testified that there were indications of a struggle on the ground; that he went to the prisoner's home and found him in bed, and he said that he was sick, and was sick and in bed on January 17, 1918, and had been sick ever since.

The defendant's witnesses testified that the prisoner was sick and in bed on January 17, 1918, and for a week before and for a week after that day.

The state, in rebuttal, offered evidence tending to show that the prisoner had been seen by them, not in Goldsboro, where he was found by the constable, when he said that he was sick, and was then in bed, but in the country some two or three miles from Goldsboro, within the week before and the week after January 17, 1918, and that he had chased Mrs. Loftin, and tried to grab her, and returned three nights afterwards and peeped in the window of her house. This evidence was admitted over the prisoner's objection, but was confined by the court strictly to its effect as contradicting the prisoner's declarations, and the testimony of his witnesses as to his whereabouts at the time mentioned, though there was evidence that he ran when he saw one of the witnesses a few days after the alleged assault. None of this evidence was permitted to be used as substantive, but only as tending to contradict the defendant's witnesses and his own statements.

A special venire of 40 jurors was ordered by the court, but the writ was not drawn out in writing and delivered to the sheriff at the time. When the case was again called for trial, only 22 of this panel answered to their names, and 5 of these were excused, leaving 17 for service. This number was exhausted, and another order made for 20 special jurors, and there was a third order made for 10 jurors, and the sheriff summoned the members of a jury, which had just rendered their verdict in another case, and were dismissed until a later day in the term. A jury was finally selected, without the prisoner having exhausted his peremptory challenges, he having made use of only nine of them. When it was discovered that no formal writ had been issued for the 40 jurors, the court, on motion, ordered the writ to issue nunc pro tunc, and the sheriff to make his return thereon, which was done, he stating that he could only find 22 of the 40 summoned after proper search for them. These proceedings of the court were all duly and severally objected to by the prisoner, and his objections were overruled, and they are now assigned as error. He was convicted, sentenced to death, and appealed.

W. F. Taylor and J. Faison Thomson, both of Goldsboro, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Naab, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1,2] We have no doubt as to the power of the court to amend its record, by inserting the order for the summoning of the special venire, and the issuing of the writ to the sheriff, and the entering of his return upon the process nunc pro tunc. The order for these amendments, and the correction of what was overlooked by the officers, that is, the clerk and the sheriff, related back to the time when the order or writ should have been issued by the clerk, and the return made thereon by the sheriff. When the court has the power, we do not review its exercise, as it is within the discretion of the court to decide whether it will exercise it or not. There are a vast number of authorities for this position, and there is nothing better settled by our cases than this rule. Phillipse v. Higdon, 44 N. C. 381; Clark v. Hellen, 23 N. C. 421 (approved in Henderson v. Graham, 84 N. C. 496); Seawell v. Bank, 14 N. C. 279, 22 Am. Dec. 722; Cheatham v. Crews, 81 N. C. 343; State v. Cauble, 70 N. C. 62; Bullard v. Johnson, 65 N. C. 436; Williams v. Weaver, 101 N. C. 1, 7 S. E. 565; Luttrell v. Martin, 112 N. C. 593, 17 S. E. 573; Grady v. Railroad Co., 116 N. C. 952, 21 S. E. 304. There are many other cases more or less analogous to this one.

In State v. Cauble, supra, this court held that the superior court had the power to amend the warrant by striking out the name of the prosecutor, as plaintiff, it then having the form of a civil action, and inserting the name of the state, Justice Bynum saying:

"The power of the court to make any amendment in furtherance of justice is ample. C. C. P. § 132. The change did not affect the defense or take the defendant at a disadvantage, and he therefore has no cause of complaint."

It was held in Clark v. Hellen, supra, and Chief Justice Smith stated in Henderson v. Graham, supra, approving Clark v. Hellen:

"Amendments of process are not admissible when the effect will be to prejudice acquired interests or take away any defense which could be made to an action begun at the time of the amendments. Phillips v. Holland, 78 N. C. 31. The power has been exercised in numerous cases in this state, and precedents established for the present application. Thus it is held that a seal may be affixed to a writ issued to another county, after its return, and the process, void without seal, thus rendered effectual. Clark v. Hellen, 23 N. C. 421. And this may be done to a feri facias under which the defendant's land has been sold, for the purpose of perfecting the purchaser's title. * * * The extent to which the power of amendment has been carried will appear in the numerous cases which have come before this court and to which it is needless to refer in detail. Some of them are cited in Cheatham v. Crews, 81 N. C. 343"—citing Purcell v. McFarland, 23 N. C. 34, 35 Am. Dec. 734; Seawell v. Bank, 14 N. C. 279, 22 Am. Dec. 722.

The power of the court to require the officers to do what it had ordered to be done is fully discussed in the very recent case of Mann v. Mann, 176 N. C. 363, 97 S. E. 175.

[3] We therefore conclude that the court, in the exercise of its discretion, could amend the proceedings and allow the clerk to issue the writ, and the sheriff to make a proper return nunc pro tunc. State v. Whitt, 113 N. C. 716, 18 S. E. 715; Luttrell v. Martin, 112 N. C. 593, 17 S. E. 573; Grady v. Railroad, 116 N. C. 952, 21 S. E. 304. An officer may be allowed to amend his return of process, so as to make it speak the truth, even though the amendment defeats the plaintiff's recovery of a penalty for a false return. Steelman v. Greenwood, 113 N. C. 355, 18 S. E. 503; Swain v. Burden, 124 N. C. 16, 32 S. E. 319; Swain v. Phelps, 125 N. C. 43, 34 S. E. 110. The judge's finding of facts shows that the omission here was purely clerical, and could in no way affect any substantial right, so to cure it was plainly within his discretion. There seems to have been no other irregularity alleged in the further proceeding to secure a jury, and, if there was, it could not, in the absence of fraud or corruption, affect the rights of defendant. State v. Speaks, 94 N. C. 865; State v. Hensley, 94 N. C. 1021; State v. Whitson, 111 N. C. 695, 16 S. E. 332; State v. Brogden, 111 N. C. 656, 16 S. E. 170; State v. Whitt, supra; State v. Parker, 132 N. C. 1014, 43 S. E. 830.

In this record, it appears that the court had ordered the sheriff to summon the venire of 40 men, and it was the plain duty of the clerk to enter this order in the minutes, and of the sheriff to obey it. If the clerk failed to do so, by inadvertence, the court could, at any time, require him to supply the omission, and to issue the writ, so that the sheriff could make his return. The jurors, who were named in the verbal order, were actually notified to appear at the court, so far as they could be found, and it amounted to nothing more than committing to writing that which was ordered to be done. How it could prejudice the prisoner in any way, or in the least degree, we fail to see. This assignment of error, therefore, is unavailing.

[4] The evidence admitted by the court was manifestly competent for the single purpose of contradicting the prisoner's statement and the testimony of his witnesses that he was sick for two weeks, including January 17, 1918, as one of the days, and it was thus restricted by the judge. This assignment also must be disallowed.

The other exceptions are merely formal.

[5] There was sufficient evidence, in law, to support the verdict.

It must therefore be certified that there is no error in the case or record.

No error.

BROWN, J., not sitting.

(177 N. C. 137)

ALEXANDER et al. v. RICHMOND CEDAR WORKS. (No. 10.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 19, 1919.)

1. TENANCY IN COMMON §14—COLOR OF TITLE—DEED TO ENTIRE ESTATE—TENANTS IN COMMON.

A deed of the interest of a tenant in common, executed under a judicial proceeding which purports to sell and convey the whole estate, constitutes color of title, and 7 years' adverse possession thereafter by the grantee bars the cotenants who were not parties to the proceedings where the deed was given.

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION §54—SUFFICIENCY OF POSSESSION—TIME OF POSSESSION.

In order to ripen into title, adverse possession need not have been during the period next preceding the suit; and, if the title ripened by adverse possession at any time prior thereto, it is sufficient, unless, subsequent to its vesting, it has been divested.

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION §57—SUFFICIENCY OF POSSESSION—CONTINUED POSSESSION.

Adverse possession need not be unceasing, but the evidence should be such as to warrant the inference that occupation had extended over the required period.

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION §44—SUFFICIENCY OF POSSESSION—NATURE OF USE OF LAND.

To ripen title by adverse possession, possession is making that use of land of which it is susceptible in its present condition so as to give the public notice of a claim of ownership and to constantly expose the party to suit by the true owner; occasional trespasses not being sufficient.

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION §16(1) — CUTTING AND REMOVING TIMBER—TRESPASS SIGNS.

Cutting and hauling away trees and lumber from swamp land, together with posting notices warning off trespassers, was a sufficient use of the land to support title by adverse possession, when continued for 7 years.

6. ADVERSE POSSESSION §85(2)—EVIDENCE—ABSENCE OF PROTEST.

In a suit to establish title to land by adverse possession, continued for 7 years under color of title derived from a deed of the interest of a tenant in common executed in partition and conveying the entire tract, that his cotenants or those claiming under them made no demand or protest for 7 years was competent evidence on the question of adverse possession and the cotenants' knowledge thereof.

7. TRIAL §29(2)—CONDUCT OF COURT—"EXPRESSION OF OPINION."

A remark of the court in asking the views of counsel made to them alone, though in the presence and hearing of the jury as to the legal phase of the testimony in an adverse possession suit, is not an expression of opinion on the facts, within the statute.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR §216(2) — RESERVATION OF OBJECTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where an instruction covers the case and is otherwise correct, that it is not sufficiently full cannot be complained of, where no request for a more explicit instruction was made.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR §230—RESERVATION OF OBJECTIONS—CONTENTION OF PARTIES.

An objection that the judge did not correctly state the contentions of the parties, when not made at the proper time, is unavailing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tyrrell County; Bond, Judge.

Suit by J. E. Alexander and others against the Richmond Cedar Works. Judgment on the verdict for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. No error.

Plaintiffs alleged, and offered evidence tending to show, that this land lay within the boundaries of the grant to Josiah Collins, and that a chain of title connected said Collins with Solomon Hassell, that Solomon Hassell conveyed this land to Jesse Alexander in 1813, and that Jesse Alexander died leaving five children: (1) Abner Alexander, who died intestate without issue; (2) Joseph Alexander, ancestor in blood of some of the plaintiffs; (3) Martha Sprull, ancestor in blood of the remaining plaintiffs; (4) Geo. Alexander, who conveyed his right in the land in controversy to Thos. Alexander; (5) Thomas Alexander, who conveyed his right and the right acquired from his brother, George, to one William Cahoon, whose title, plaintiffs alleged, had been acquired by defendant.

Plaintiffs further alleged that their interests together equaled one half, and that the defendant owned the other half; that the land could not be actually divided, and that a sale for partition was necessary.

Defendant admitted that it had acquired the title of William Cahoon, but pleaded sole seizin, and averred that it had acquired a good title for the entire tract by adverse possession.

Upon the trial it developed that there lay within the outer boundaries of the tract of land described in the complaint, several other tracts of land, referred to upon the trial and in the first issue and in the judgment rendered as: (1) A. C. Sawyer to F. C. Patrick; (2) Allen Cahoon Nos. 1 and 2; (3) Armstrong tract No. 1; (4) Kemp No. 1; (5) Kemp No. 2; (6) Armstrong No. 2 swamp; (7) Armstrong (3, 4, and 5). These tracts are the ones named in red ink on the blueprints, and the correctness of their location in relation to the boundaries of the tract of land described in the petition was conceded by plaintiffs.

In order to show title in itself for these several tracts, the defendant offered grants prior to the Josiah Collins grant aforesaid, and deeds to itself foreign to the title under which the plaintiffs claimed, and evidence of possession of each of said tracts by it and its ancestors in title.

Plaintiffs finally, at the conclusion of the testimony, in open court, disclaimed title to any of the tracts referred to in the first issue, and admitted that they could not and did not claim title to any of said tracts, and thereupon this phase was eliminated from the case. The court, with the consent of plaintiffs, framed two issues, the first of which involved the tracts of land above described, which the court answered in accordance with plaintiffs' admission that they had no title thereto, the second of which issues involved the title to the remainder of the land described in the petition outside of the boundaries of the above tracts.

For the purpose of showing sole title in itself for the lands referred to in the second issue (that is, that portion of the land described in the petition outside of the tracts referred to in the first issue), the defendant offered: (1) Deed from Geo. H. Alexander to Thos. H. Alexander. (2) Deed from Thos. Alexander to William Cahoon, in 1833, which purported to convey in fee, with warranty, the entire tract of land described in the petition. (3) Deed from Wm. Cahoon to Jas. S. Cahoon, in 1839, which purported to convey in fee, with warranty, a tract of land which included within its boundaries the tract described in the petition. (4) Petition filed by Jordan L. Jones, administrator of Jas. S. Cahoon, in 1849, in court of pleas and quarter sessions, asking for a sale of his intestate's lands to make assets, with evidence of the clerk of the court that a diligent search of his office did not show any other papers in his office relative to said proceeding. (5) Certain entries on the appearance docket for January term, 1849, of court of pleas and quarter sessions of Tyrrell county. (6) An account of the lands of Jordan L. Jones sold by his administrator. (7) Deed from Jordan L. Jones, Adm'r, to Chas. McCleese, which purported to convey in fee the entire tract of land described in the petition. This deed recites that it was made pursuant to a sale by virtue of a petition filed by grantor at January term, 1849. (8) Partition proceeding of Martha Sawyer et al. v. C. E. Tamem et al. The pleadings alleged that the parties to this proceeding were the owners in fee simple of the entire tract of land in controversy, and the court ordered the sale of the said tract, and appointed M. Majette, commissioner. The sale was made and duly confirmed, and Majette, commissioner, was ordered to make deed to C. R. Johnson, the purchaser. (9) Evidence tending to show that the parties to said proceeding were all the heirs at law of Chas. McCleese. (10)

Deed from M. Majette, commissioner, to C. R. Johnson (general manager of the Richmond Cedar Works in North Carolina), in 1893, made pursuant to the last-mentioned special proceeding, and purporting to convey in fee several tracts of land, the second of which included the land now in controversy. (11) Deed from C. R. Johnson and wife to Richmond Cedar Works, in 1905, which purported to convey in fee several tracts of land, the third of which included the land now in controversy. This deed recites that this tract and one other were bought and held by said Johnson for the Richmond Cedar Works. (12) Evidence of adverse possession set out in the record.

The principal contentions of appellants at the trial in the lower court were: (1) That they and defendant, and its ancestors in title, were tenants in common, and that therefore 7 years' adverse possession was not sufficient to bar their rights; and (2) that if 7 years' possession was sufficient, there was no evidence of such possession fit to be considered by the jury.

Defendant, appellee, contends: First, that it is now settled that adverse possession by defendant, or those under whom it claimed, for 7 years is a complete and perfect defense to plaintiffs' action. Assuming, as it further says, for the sake of argument, that some 80 years ago, when Jesse Alexander died, his children became tenants in common of the land in controversy, and that the effect of the conveyance from George H. Alexander to Thomas H. Alexander was only to convey an undivided one-fourth interest in the locus in quo, and that the effect of the conveyance from Thomas Alexander to William Cahoon and from Wm. Cahoon to Jas. S. Cahoon, although they purported to convey the entire interest, was only to convey a one-half interest to James S. Cahoon and to create him a tenant in common with the other heirs of Jesse Alexander, yet when the court, upon the petition of the administrators of Jas. S. Cahoon, ordered the sale of the entire land, and it was sold to Charles McCleese and deed was made to him, and when the court later, in the partition proceeding brought by the heirs at law of Charles McCleese, purported to order the sale of the entire tract, and, upon the sale being reported to it, entered an order of confirmation, and directed deed to be made to the purchaser, who paid the purchase money, either or both of these judicial proceedings and the deeds made under either or both of them were equivalent to an actual ouster of any other tenants in common, constituted color of title to the whole tract, and 7 years' adverse possession thereafter was sufficient to bar the entry of any of the plaintiffs, even admitting them to have been tenants in common.

There were exceptions to the charge of the court which will be noticed hereafter. The verdict was as follows:

"(1) What interest, if any, do the plaintiffs, J. E. Alexander and others, own in that portion of the lands described in the complaint or petition in this cause covered by the various tracts platted on map used in this trial, marked: First, A. C. Sawyer to F. C. Patrick; second, marked Allen Cahoon, Nos. 1 and 2; third, marked Armstrong tract No. 1; fourth, tract marked Kemp No. 1; fifth, tract marked Kemp No. 2; sixth, marked Armstrong No. 2 swamp; seventh, tract marked Armstrong Nos. 3, 4, and 5? Answer: None (by consent of plaintiffs).

"(2) What interest, if any, do the plaintiffs, J. E. Alexander and others, own in that portion of land described in complaint or petition in this cause outside of tracts platted on map used in this trial, and referred to in issue 4 by numbers first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh? Answer: None."

Judgment upon the verdict, and plaintiffs appealed.

W. L. Whitley, of Plymouth, and Aydtlett, Simpson & Sawyer, of Elizabeth City, for appellants.

J. Crawford Biggs, of Raleigh, and Thompson & Wilson, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] We held in Roper Lumber Co. v. Richmond Cedar Works, 165 N. C. 83, 80 S. E. 982, that there is color of title, not where a deed is executed by one tenant in common, which purports to convey the entire interest, the grantor having less than an entirety, but where a deed is executed under a judicial proceeding which purports to sell and convey an entirety, and where some of the tenants in common had been made parties to the proceeding under which the court ordered the sale. Discussing this point, we said:

"This court has held that a deed by one tenant of the entire estate held in common is not sufficient to sever the unity of possession by which they [the tenants] are bound together, and does not constitute color of title, as the grantee of one tenant takes only his share and 'steps into his shoes.' In such case, 20 years of adverse possession, under a claim of sole ownership, is required to bar the entry of the other tenants, under the presumption of an ouster from the beginning raised thereby." Cloud v. Webb, 14 N. C. 317; Hicks v. Bullock, 96 N. C. 164, 1 S. E. 629; Breden v. McLaurin, 96 N. C. 307, 4 S. E. 136; Bullin v. Hancock, 138 N. C. 198, 50 S. E. 621; Dobbins v. Dobbins, 141 N. C. 210, 53 S. E. 870, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 185, 115 Am. St. Rep. 682, and cases cited.

"We are not inadvertent to the fact that this state stands alone in the recognition of this principle, the others holding the contrary, that such a deed is good color of title (1 Cyc. 1078, and notes); but it has too long been the settled doctrine of this court to be disturbed at this late day, as it might seriously impair vested rights to do so. It should not, though, be carried beyond the necessities of the particular class of cases to which it has been applied, but confined strictly within its proper limits; otherwise we may destroy titles by a too close attention to the technical considerations growing out of this particular relation of tenants in common, and more so, we think, than is required to preserve their rights. This view has, within recent years, been thoroughly sanctioned by the court. * * * Where less than the whole number of tenants join in a proceeding to sell the common estate for partition, and the same is sold, a deed made under order of the court to the purchaser is color of title, and 7 years' adverse possession thereafter by him under the deed will bar the cotenants who were not parties." Amis v. Stephens, 111 N. C. 172, 16 S. E. 487; McCulloh v. Daniel, 102 N. C. 529, 9 S. E. 413; Johnson v. Parker, 79 N. C. 475.

"It will be found in the case first cited that there were tenants who were not made parties to the proceeding at law, and yet they were held to be barred by the adverse possession of 7 years; and this was because the court attached importance to the fact that the deed had been made under a decree in a judicial proceeding which closely resembled one made by a stranger to the title held by the cotenants. Only a part of the estate held in common was sold for partition, but the parties to the proceeding claimed the entirety in that part, or purparty, as it is technically called."

In that case the court said:

"In deciding this question, though, the proceeding at law is to be regarded as having the force and effect that a deed of one not connected with the tenancy would have. It purports to sever the relation of all the cotenants, whether it does so in law or not, at the time, as against those tenants not made parties to it."

And further:

"The jury have found that plaintiff has had sufficient adverse possession of the land in dispute for 7 years under color to bar the defendant's right, if they ever had any; and, as the state has parted with the original title, judgment was properly entered in favor of the plaintiff, upon the verdict."

This decision leaves nothing to be said in favor of appellants' contention upon this point.

[2, 3] The second position taken by the plaintiffs is that there was no evidence of adverse possession fit to be considered by the jury. This involves the inquiry as to what is adverse possession necessary to ripen title. The possession need not have been during the period next preceding the commencement of the suit; but, if the title ripened by adverse possession at any time prior thereto, it will be sufficient for a recovery, unless subsequent to its vesting it had, in some way, been divested. Christenbury v. King, 85 N. C. 229. The possession need not be unceasing, but the evidence should be such as to warrant the inference that the actual use and occupation have extended over the required period. Berry v. McPherson, 153 N. C. 6, 68 S. E. 892.

[4] Judge Bond charged the jury that possession is the making that use of land of which it is susceptible in its present condition; for example, cutting timber from timber land, kept up with such frequency and regularity as to give notice to the public that the party cutting or having it cut is claiming the land as his own, and that it is done in such a way as to constantly expose the party to a suit by the true owner, is sufficient, if done for the time required by law to ripen the color into a good title. Occasional trespasses will not do. The acts must be such as at all times to subject the party doing the acts to an action at the instance of the true owner. Seven years' possession under color of title, before suit is begun under known and visible lines and boundaries adversely, notoriously, continuously, and exclusively, will ripen title in the parties having such possession. Plaintiffs certainly could not complain of this instruction, as it is sustained by all the authorities.

In determining the question of adverse possession, Mr. Wood says that the jury may take into consideration the nature and situation of the land, the using of it in the ordinary way by the grantees to whom it was conveyed, and the placing of the deeds on record, passing over the tract, employment of agents living in the neighborhood to look after it, and prevent trespasses upon it, payment of taxes continuously under claim of title, and other such facts and circumstances may be considered by them in connection with other acts denoting a claim to it, and the exercise of dominion and ownership over it. Wood on Limitations, § 268, p. 569. What is sufficient to constitute this actual possession depends upon the character of the land and also the circumstances of the case. It involves, as a general rule, the doing of acts of ownership on the land sufficiently pronounced and continuous in character to charge the owner with notice that an adverse claim to the land is asserted. The question whether, in any particular case, there was an actual and adverse possession of the land is usually one of fact for the jury under the instructions of the court. Tiffany, Real Property, p. 1007. A standard author has said:

"Actual possession of land consists in exercising acts of dominion over it and in making the ordinary use of it, and in taking the profits of which it is susceptible. This dominion may consist in and be shown by a great number and almost endless combination of acts, and where the statute of limitations has not designated certain things as requisites, the law has prescribed no particular manner in which possession shall be maintained and made manifest. Nor, on the other hand, has the law attempted to lay down any precise rules by which the sufficiency of a given set of facts to constitute possession may be determined. It is ordinarily sufficient, if the acts of ownership are of such nature as the claimant would exercise over his own property and would not exercise over another's."

Whether there has been sufficient adverse possession to ripen title is a mixed question of law and fact, and its solution must necessarily depend upon the situation of the parties, the nature of the claimant's title, the character of land, and the purpose for which it is adapted and for which it has been used. All these circumstances must be taken into consideration by the jury, whose peculiar province it is to pass upon the question. The only rule of general applicability is that the acts relied upon to establish such possession must always be as distinct as the character of the land reasonably admits of, and be exercised with sufficient continuity to acquaint the true owner with the fact that a claim of ownership, in denial of his title, is being asserted. 1 Cyc. pp. 983, 984; 2 C. J. pp. 54, 55.

As the question still appears to be misunderstood, and is frequently the subject of contention, it may be well to state the principles settled by this court in former cases. Says Ruffin, J.:

"I think the rule is that, exercising that dominion over the thing, and taking that use and profit which it is capable of yielding in its present state, is a possession. It is all that can be done, until the subject itself shall be changed. It is like the case stated in the books of cutting rushes from the marsh. This is sufficient, though it might appear that dikes and banks would make the marsh arable." Simpson v. Blount, 14 N. C. 36.

And Judge Gaston:

Entering upon, ditching, and making roads in a cypress swamp, and working timber into shingles, was sufficient possession, if continued for the requisite time, to ripen a defective title into a perfect one. Tredwell v. Reddick, 22 N. C. 56.

And again, by Ruffin, C. J., in Bynum v. Carter, 26 N. C. 310:

"The occupation of the pine land by annually making turpentine on it, is such an actual possession as will oust a constructive possession by one, claiming merely under a superior paper title"

—and in this opinion the Chief Justice calls attention to the fact that making turpentine from the trees is notice to the true owner, because it is necessarily visible, and the trees are boxed and the sides of the trees are scraped with a round hack, making the work easily visible to the eye. It was therefore held that occupation of pine land by annually making turpentine on it is such an actual possession which will, in time, mature the title against a constructive possession by one claiming merely under a superior paper title.

The leading idea is that there shall be notice to the world, so that any one claiming adversely may have an opportunity to assert his title. Moore v. Thompson, 69 N. C. 121.

The court held in Brittain v. Daniels, 94 N. C. p. 786, that the erection of a spring house and the use of a spring was sufficient adverse possession of a 50-acre tract of land on which the spring was located. See, also, Staton v. Mullis, 92 N. C. 624, 631. It has further been said that the test of the sufficiency of the possession to fully mature title depends upon the question of whether a right of action had existed for the statutory period, when the suit was instituted, in favor of the parties against whom the benefit of the lapse of time is claimed. Everett v. Newton, 118 N. C. 923, 23 S. E. 961. In Coxe v. Carpenter, 157 N. C. 557, 73 S. E. 113, the evidence tended to show that the land was only fit for use as timber land, and that Col. Coxe did not clear any of the land, but he and his tenants every year cut timber from the land to manufacture into lumber, and also for firewood and house-bote—roads were used and new ones laid out for the purpose of using the land in its then state and condition. In the opinion the court said:

"There is no doubt but that the possession, if adverse, was open, visible, notorious, and continuous, and no owner of land could have failed to take notice of it as an assertion against his title from the very beginning. There was also evidence that the plaintiffs and those under whom they claimed 'had possession of the land' for more than 7 years. * * * We are of the opinion that there was sufficient proof of facts showing adverse possession, and the case was properly submitted to the jury for their consideration."

The court quotes from a former case to the effect that possession was as decided and notorious as the nature of the land would permit, and offered unequivocal indication that plaintiff (and his father) were exercising the dominion of owners and were not pillaging as trespassers. Berry v. McPherson, 153 N. C. 4, 68 S. E. 892.

We held in Locklear v. Savage, 159 N. C. 238, 74 S. E. 348:

"What is adverse possession within the meaning of the law has been well settled by our decisions. It consists in actual possession, with an intent to hold solely for the possessor to the exclusion of others, and is denoted by the exercise of acts of dominion over the land, in making the ordinary use and taking the ordinary profits of which it is susceptible in its present state, such acts to be so repeated as to show that they are done in the character of owner, in opposition to right or claim of any other person, and not merely as an occasional trespasser. It must be decided and notorious as the nature of the land will permit, affording unequivocal indication to all persons that he is exercising thereon the dominion of owner"—citing Loflin v. Cobb, 46 N. C. 406, 62 Am. Dec. 173; Montgomery v. Wynns, 20 N.

C. 667; Williams v. Buchanan, 23 N. C. 535, 35 Am. Dec. 760; Burton v. Carruth, 18 N. C. 2; Glechrist v. McLaughlin, 29 N. C. 310; Bynum v. Carter, 26 N. C. 310; Simpson v. Blount, 14 N. C. 34; Tredwell v. Reddick, 23 N. C. 56.

That decision has been cited and approved in the following cases: Green v. Dunn, 162 N. C. 343, 78 S. E. 211; Locklear v. Paul, 163 N. C. 338, 79 S. E. 617; Christman v. Hilliard, 167 N. E. 442, where Justice Brown thus applies the rule:

"There is evidence of an actual occupancy, possessio pedis, of a very small part of 6317 which defendant undertakes to explain, but that is a question for the jury. The adverse and unexplained possession of so small a part may not give title to the whole tract, but, coupled with all the other evidence in the record, we think, under our decisions, that, taken as a whole, the evidence is sufficient to go to the jury that they may, under a correct charge, draw their own conclusions from it"—citing Locklear v. Savage, 159 N. C. 238, 74 S. E. 347; McLean v. Smith, 106 N. C. 172, 11 S. E. 184; Hamilton v. Icard, 114 N. C. 538, 19 S. E. 607; Bryan v. Spivey, 109 N. C. 67, 13 S. E. 766; Osborne v. Johnston, 65 N. C. 26; Lenoir v. South, 32 N. C. 241; Christman v. Hilliard, 167 N. C. 7, 82 S. E. 949.

The plaintiffs contend, though, that there was not sufficient evidence of adverse possession by the defendant. It would be vain and useless, and would serve no good purpose, to review the testimony upon this question in detail. We have examined it carefully, and have concluded that there is ample evidence to establish all the elements required to show such an adverse possession as will bar the true owners' right of entry and transfer the proprietorship to the dispossessor. The statute of limitations, while it is always destroying titles, is also constantly building them up. It has been well said that where an adverse relation is fixed, and continues for the required period, time covers the transaction as with a mantle of repose. Clarke v. Boorman's Ex'rs, 18 Wall. 493, 21 L. Ed. 904; 25 Cyc. 1168, and note 61. It is truly a statute for the quieting of titles, and warns those who sleep upon their rights that, if their silence is too long continued, they may lose them, for the law favors the active and vigilant. As plaintiffs say that there was no evidence of adverse possession, such as there is must be taken and considered most strongly against them, rejecting all in their favor. We cannot apply this rule without concluding, at once, that this contention must fail.

[5] The locus in quo is swamp land, and could only be used for the purpose of cutting and removing the trees for lumber, they being mostly juniper, which was standing in or near rivers and creeks, such as Alligator river, Northwest fork, and Juniper creek. These trees were cut and hauled away, and generally unloaded at Ballast bank. The premises were, therefore, used and controlled just as would be done by the true owner, and the work was so long continued and so notoriously done as to give fair notice to any claimant of the land, and there is evidence to show that there was actual notice. It was also posted in places to warn trespassers away. There are other facts and circumstances which more or less tend to show possession of the land in the character of owner, and the doing of such things openly and persistently as indicated a clear assertion of title to it. The jury have found upon such testimony that the defendants had acquired the title by color and sufficient adverse possession, following the instructions of the court, which we deem to be free from any error; and, unless there is some sound and valid objection not yet considered, we find no ground for a reversal.

The proceeding, entitled Jordan L. Jones, Adm'r of James S. Cahoon, v. Sarah Ann and Elizabeth Cahoon, his heirs, while not complete, is sufficient to show a record, consisting of the petition, order of sale of the lands to pay debts of the deceased, and confirmation of the sale to Charles McCleese, account of sale, etc., service of process on the guardian of the two defendants, who were infants, and deed to purchaser; and, while some of the essentials must be inferred from the actual existence of others as shown in the roll, all are sufficiently substantiated by the documents themselves and entries on the minutes of the court. There is really more reliable evidence in this case of the pendency of the proceedings in the court of pleas and quarter sessions of Tyrrell county, at January term, 1847, and of their regularity throughout, from the original process to the final decree, than there was in Irvin v. Clark, 98 N. C. 437, 4 S. E. 30, as to the validity of the proceedings there in question, for in other material respects there were more deficiencies there, but the court in that case admitted the mere fragment of the minutes, which was offered by defendants, as evidence of the entire record. Furthermore, the evidence in this case shows that there was a partition proceeding between the heirs at law of Charles McCleese, entitled Martha Sawyer et al. v. C. W. Tatem et al., in which the court decreed a sale of the same lands, and they were sold to C. R. Johnson, the sale confirmed and deed executed by commissioner, Mr. Majette, to C. R. Johnson, who conveyed the lands to the defendant. It would seem that all this record is fully sufficient to bring this case within the operation of the principle settled in Roper Lumber Co. v. Richmond Cedar Works, 165 N. C. 83, 80 S. E. 982, where we held that a purchaser at a judicial sale of land, which was held in common, made for partition or otherwise, and a deed to the purchaser by the commissioner, under the decree of the court, were sufficient to constitute color of title, and that 7 years' adverse possession thereunder would vest the title in the purchaser as against the former tenants so holding the land. We, therefore, find no error in submitting the case to the jury in this respect.

[6] The fact that none of the plaintiffs, as cotenants now claiming the land, made demand upon the defendant, or those under whom it holds, or protested against their acts of trespass during the 7 years and more, was surely competent, it being some evidence upon the question of adverse possession, as the failure to list the land for taxes would have been. Austin v. King, 97 N. C. 339, 2 S. E. 678. It would be strange if the owner of land should permit it to be occupied and used profitably and adversely by another, under a claim of ownership, without making any claim to it for 7 years. This is not the usual conduct in such cases. The fact that the adverse occupancy continued for so long a period of time is some evidence that the plaintiffs knew of it.

[7] The remark of the court to counsel alone, though in the presence and hearing of the jury, as to the legal phase of the testimony, when he asked for the views of counsel, was no expression of opinion, within the meaning and intent of the statute. Observer Co. v. Remedy Corp., 169 N. C. 251, 85 S. E. 33. It was held in Harris v. Greenville Traction Co., 101 S. C. 360, 85 S. E. 899, that a remark by the trial judge in overruling a motion for a directed verdict was not in violation of a constitutional provision as an expression of opinion upon the weight or sufficiency of the evidence to prove a fact. If the court could not call for an argument from counsel upon the law of the case, for example, upon the question of law whether there is any evidence for the jury, trials could not be easily or expeditiously conducted. In a proper case we have no doubt the learned judges would, in the exercise of their discretion, protect the parties by temporarily dismissing the jury, when it appeared that either party might be prejudiced by the discussion of the law. There was no expression of opinion upon the facts, but merely upon the law, and the learned judge did not finally adopt his first impression. There was clearly no prejudice. State v. Jones, 67 N. C. 285; State v. Browning, 78

N. C. 555; Williams v. Lumber Co., 118 N. C. 928, 24 S. E. 800.

[8] If the instructions of the court to the jury were not sufficiently full and explicit, or plaintiffs desired any particular phase of the case to be stated, they should have submitted a special request for what they wanted. Simmons v. Davenport, 140 N. C. 407, 53 S. E. 225; Potato Co. v. Jeanette, 174 N. C. 237, 93 S. E. 795. In the absence of such a request, we must hold the charge to be free from any error, as it covered the case, and was correct in principle, and it was quite responsive to plaintiffs' prayers for instructions.

[9] An objection that the judge did not correctly state the contentions of a party, when not made at the proper time, is unavailing. McMillan v. Railroad Co., 172 N. C. 853, 90 S. E. 683; State v. Foster, 172 N. C. 960, 90 S. E. 785.

The complaint that the judge did not state the law applicable to both sides, but only on defendant's side, is not supported by the record. Other exceptions are clearly without merit.

After a critical examination of the entire record, and upon a motion to nonsuit, or for the direction of a verdict, viewing the evidence most favorably for the defendants, as we should do (Lynch v. Dewey Bros., 175 N. C. 152, 95 S. E. 94), we find no reason to disturb the result.

No error.

BROWN, J., not sitting.

(177 N. C. 153)

BRADLEY et al. v. CAMP MFG. CO.
(No. 103.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 26, 1919.)

1. EVIDENCE ⇨501(7)—BASIS OF OPINION—VALUE.

In an action for damages for destruction of timber on plaintiff's land by fire set out by defendant's locomotive, witness' estimate of value based on that of timber sold from his own and other land in the neighborhood, where he also stated his estimate of the value irrespective of such sales, was admissible.

2. WITNESSES ⇨240(4)—LEADING QUESTION.

Where a witness was asked, "What would that land sell for now—$23 per acre?" it was not error to exclude the answer thereto, since, if otherwise competent, the question was leading.

3. TRIAL ⇨129—MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL—REMARKS.

In a trial involving the amount of damage to plaintiff's land from burning of timber thereon by fire set by defendant's locomotive, counsel's remarks that the defendant had the audacity to say that the damage done to land was only $2 per acre held not such a flagrant abuse of privilege as to warrant new trial, where it is apparent that no harm was done thereby, and the statement was provoked.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨216(3)—TRIAL ⇨193(1)—INSTRUCTIONS—RECITAL OF CONTENTIONS.

A mere recital of the contentions of the parties in instruction is no expression of an opinion upon the facts or weight of the testimony; and, if the court misstated them, his attention should have been called thereto when timely correction could be made, and it is too late to do so after verdict.

5. TRIAL ⇨193(2)—AMOUNT—PLEADING—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction restricting plaintiff's maximum recovery to the amount stated in the complaint was not an expression of opinion that the damages should be in the amount claimed.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1033(5)—FAVORABLE ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction restricting plaintiff's maximum recovery to the amount stated in the complaint is in favor of defendant.

7. TRIAL ⇨256(13)—INSTRUCTIONS—DAMAGES—REQUESTS.

Defendant, desiring a more specific instruction than one restricting plaintiff's recovery to amount stated in the complaint, should have requested it.

8. TRIAL ⇨295(8)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

In an action for damages to plaintiff's land by burning of timber by fire set by defendant's locomotive, a charge upon negligence, which must be construed as a whole, held correct.

9. RAILROADS ⇨484(4)—DAMAGE BY FIRE—EQUIPMENT OF ENGINE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for damages for burning of plaintiff's timber by fire set by defendant's engine, whether the engine was properly equipped and handled was a question for the jury.

10. RAILROADS ⇨480(5)—DAMAGE BY FIRE—EQUIPMENT OF ENGINE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for damages resulting from fire, caused by defendant's locomotive, the proper equipment and handling of the engine were peculiarly within defendant's knowledge, and the burden rested upon it to disprove negligence.

11. TRIAL ⇨281—EXCEPTIONS TO CHARGE GOOD IN PART.

An exception to a charge, embracing two separate propositions, one of which is plainly correct, is too broad.

Appeal from Superior Court, Northampton County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by M. E. Bradley and others against the Camp Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff alleged that the timber, brush, rails, and fences on his land were burned by sparks which came from defendant's locomotive engine, as it passed near plaintiff's premises, and that the fire was caused by the negligence of the defendant.

Chas. Massey testified, on direct examination, as follows:

"I live in this county. I knew the Bradley land before the fire, and have seen it since. I should say the difference in value then and now was $15 to $20 per acre. About 200 to 215 acres were burned over. Yes; the land was studded with young trees and undergrowth. The fire killed most of the little trees, and those it did not kill it burned one side, and that stunts the growth. I arrived at the value of the land according to the timber that I had upon selling off my land and that in the neighborhood. Irrespective of the value of the timber which I had sold and which I had seen sold in the neighborhood, I put the difference in value before and after the fire at $15 to $20 per acre."

There was no objection to the foregoing testimony by the defendant.

Cross-examination:

"I sold my timber about one year ago, and some one or two months ago."

Counsel for defendant moves to strike out this witness' estimate of damages. Motion overruled, and defendant excepts, and this is defendant's exception No. 1.

J. A. Shaw testified:

"I live in this county. I live about 1½ miles from Bradley's land; am a farmer and a merchant, cut some cord and pulp wood, and have for 12 or 15 years. Yes, I went on the Bradley land to estimate the damage, went twice; Cleaton and Vinson were with me. Jno. Bradley showed me the lines. I examined the lines as carefully as I knew how. The damage was $2 per acre; that included all the fence. Yes; I am familiar with the map. On the 80 acres, the timber had been cut off. It was damaged very slightly, except a small place which was burned right bad. The 8 acres were in the burned area. The 29 acres were burned over. The 7 acres were scrub oak and pine."

He was asked:

"What would that land sell for now—$23 per acre?"

Objection; sustained; exception by defendant, and this is exception No. 2.

During the argument, counsel stated that the defendant company had the audacity to come here and say that damage done to the plaintiffs' land was only $2 per acre. To this statement of counsel to the jury defendant excepted.

Court's charge to jury:

"Gentlemen of the jury, this action was brought by Bradley et al. against the Camp Manufacturing Company. (The plaintiff Bradley seeks to recover $2,600 for damages sustained by reason of the fire which he alleges was set out by defendant company on or about April 14, 1916, which said fire Bradley alleges burned over about 200 acres of his land, and which land was damaged as he alleges, at least $12.50 per acre, and he alleges that he was further damaged by destruction of a rail fence and some other fence rails of the value of about $100.)"

To the foregoing part of his honor's charge in parentheses the defendant excepted, and this is defendant's exception No. 4.

"(These plaintiffs, gentlemen of the jury, contend that this fire was negligently set out by the defendant, its agents or employees, and that the same was communicated to their lands, and that these lands were burned over and they were damaged as alleged.)"

To the foregoing part of the charge the defendant excepted, and this is defendant's exception No. 5.

"Now, gentlemen of the jury, the defendant company denies that it or its agents or employees negligently set out the fire which burned over the plaintiffs' lands, and further contend that the fire didn't originate on its right of way, and that it could not have started there, because the right of way was clean, was carefully kept clean, and there was no combustible material thereon, and that the engine which passed over the plaintiffs' land at the time the same was alleged to have been burned over was well equipped with appliances in general use, and that the said engine was in proper condition and operated in a careful manner, by a skillful and competent engineer, and that it is not liable in any aspect of these cases, and should not be compelled to pay the plaintiffs any amount whatsoever.

"Now gentlemen, it is my duty to state to you the contentions of both parties to this action, and I say to the counsel, if I state any of the contentions incorrectly, I'll gladly correct myself, or if I fail to state some that you would like me to do, just call my attention to them and I will be glad to do so.

"Plaintiffs contend that on the 14th day of April, 1916, the defendant's engine passed over that Bradley property; that it was some time in the afternoon; that Ned Johnson was near where the engine passed; that in a few moments after the engine passed, and in about 25 yards from Johnson, he saw a large smoke right at the track, and about where the engine had just passed; that it was a windy day in April; that this fire caught in the combustible matter, which was dry, which was upon the right of way of the company; and they contend that before he could put it out it spread over the right of way and burned over 200 acres of Bradley land. Plaintiffs contend that Bradley sold timber about 15 years ago, and that the small timber was very valuable. They contend that this fire utterly destroyed it, burned over 200 acres, burned over the new growth, and practically destroyed everything on this land. (Bradley says that he was damaged $2,600. The court charges you he is not entitled to recover any more damages than he claims in his complaint.)"

To the foregoing part of charge in parentheses defendant excepted, and this is defendant's exception No. 6.

"These plaintiffs further contend that this right of way was full of dry combustible material; that they have offered evidence that ought to satisfy you that this right of way over which the engine run was a foul right of way; that it was easy for a fire to start, because it was dry. They not only contend that the right of way was foul, but go further and contend that the engine of the defendant company, which was passing and which put out this fire, was not equipped with a proper spark arrester; that the company had two spark arresters on it, and this fact ought to convince you that this engine wasn't safe. They contend that it wasn't safe, and that if it was safe, it wasn't manned by a competent engineer; that it was not run by a skillful engineer. They contend that the defendant company set out this fire; that it caught on the right of way; that the engine wasn't properly equipped with appliances in general and common use; that it wasn't handled by a competent engineer; that this engine which passed at the time Ned Johnson was in the potato patch was the one that put out the fire. They contend that you ought to find from the evidence that they were damaged; that Bradley is a conservative man, and he says he is damaged about $10 per acre, and the other Bradleys about $15. Others have testified that it was $10 to $15 per acre. Contend that it was in the spring, and it was hard to tell how much damage was done, unless you knew the property just before and just after the fire occurred. They contend they have brought men here who know and who ought to know what they say; that these gentlemen saw this land just before and just after the fire, and that it is the best evidence for you to obtain the amount of damages. They contend that you ought not to take what Mr. Williams said about the fire, for he is interested and would put it too low; that he has brought men here who never saw the place till 28 months after the fire; and they say you ought not to take what these men said, for they knew nothing about it until after the new undergrowth had begun. They contend that these men who ought to know say that the damage was $10 per acre, and that Bradley was damaged at least $2,000, and contend that you ought to give them a reasonably fair sum as damages for the rails and fences that were destroyed. (The court charges you that if you answer the first issue, 'Yes,' then the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover a reasonable fair amount as damages for any fence or rails destroyed as you find from the evidence.)"

To the foregoing part of the charge in parentheses, the defendant excepted, and this is the defendant's exception No. 7.

"Now the defendant contends entirely different. They contend that it didn't set out the fire; that it had bought and acquired roads and timber, and had acquired a right of way over or by Bradley's land or property, and that it had been careful, as compelled by law to be, and kept its right of way clean, and it says the section master of the company, whose evidence you ought to believe, has told the truth, and that he was careful in keeping the right of way in good condition; that it was burned over about every two weeks; that it was to their interest to keep it clean, it was their duty to keep its right of way clean. They contend that they have offered witnesses who saw it every day, and they have testified that it was clean, and that it was clean when this fire broke out, that it had no combustible material on it, and that you ought to believe what these men say about it. It contends further that it has not only been careful to keep the right of way clean, but its engines were equipped with all appliances that were in common and general use, that they were kept in good order, and that the only men who knew this were the men who handled them, and it has brought these men here to testify; and it contends that the engines were equipped with the proper spark arrester, in good order, and had every appliance in good order, and they didn't negligently and carelessly let fire escape. They contend that the engines were operated by skillful engineers, and that there is no evidence to the contrary. They contend that the engine which ran by Bradley's property was operated by a competent engineer, and in a skillful manner. They say it could not have put out the fire, and, if it did, they didn't do it negligently, and that, therefore, they ought not to be liable to the plaintiffs in any amount whatsoever. Defendants say if it put out the fire it didn't damage the plaintiffs as much as they claim. They say, if you find that they set out the fire, they didn't damage the Bradley property more than $2 per acre. They contend that they have brought men here like Mr. Vinson, who knew something of the nature of the growth and the value of the land, and he said that the damage would not be more than $250 to Bradley. They contend that they have gotten other men who have gone over the land, and that those men have confirmed what Vinson said about the damage done to the lands, and they say that the damage done to Bradley's land wasn't more than $2 per acre, and that you ought not to find that it has damaged Bradley $2,600. They say they don't know about the damage to the rails and fence; that will be a question for you to find from evidence. (You are to consider that and give the plaintiffs a fair and reasonable compensation for the fence rails, as you may find.)"

To the charge in parentheses above defendant excepted, and this is defendant's exception No. 8.

It contends that Johnson said the fire was late in the evening, about night, and that this fire was not the one that burned over Bradley's land, because other witnesses say it occurred in the middle of the day. Plaintiffs say that Johnson was an old man, and that his recollection about the time of day might be wrong; and plaintiffs say that Johnson said he saw smoke immediately after the engine passed by; and plaintiffs say it was the fire that burned over their land. Defendants say they did all they could to stop the fire, and that you ought to know when it occurred. It contends that the estimate that their witnesses put upon the damage done by reason of the fire included the damage done to the rails and any other property.

Defendant's prayers for instruction:

In apt time the defendant prayed the court in writing to give the following special instructions to the jury:

"If you believe all the evidence, the defendant's right of way was burned and was free from inflammable matter and in good condition."

Not given, and defendants excepted, and this is defendant's exception No. 9.

"2. If you believe all the evidence, you will find that the engines or the defendants were well equipped with spark arresters, ash pans, and all other appliances in general use for the prevention of fire, and that the said appliances were in good condition, and said engines were operated by skillful engineers, and manned by a skillful engineer in a skillful manner, you will answer the first issue, 'No.'"

Not given, and defendant excepted, and this is defendant's exception No. 10.

"3. That if the jury find from the evidence, and by its greater weight, that the right of way of defendant's railroad was scraped, burned, and free from trash and combustible matter, and that its engines were equipped with spark arresters, ash pans, and other appliances in general use for the prevention and escape of fire and sparks from its engines, and that the same were in good condition, then the defendants would not be guilty of setting out the fire as alleged in the complaint, even though the fire was accidentally set by the defendant's engine on the right of way of the defendant, and spread therefrom to the lands of the plaintiffs, and they will answer the first issue, 'No.' (Given.)"

"4. That if the jury find from the evidence, and by its greater weight that the engines of the defendant were equipped with approved spark arresters, ash pans, and other appliances in general use for the prevention and escape of fire and sparks, and that the same were in good condition and manned by a skillful engineer, and operated in a skillful manner, and if they should find further from the evidence, by its greater weight, that the fire originated off the right of way of the defendant, then the defendant would not be guilty of negligently setting out the fire as set out in the complaint, and they will answer the first issue, 'No.' (Given.)"

"5. That if the jury find from the evidence, and its greater weight, that the fire escaped from the defendant's engine in proper condition, having a proper spark arrester, and operated in a careful way, by a skillful and competent engineer, and the fire escapes off the right of way, the defendant is not liable, for there would be no negligence, and they should answer the first issue, 'No.' (Given.)"

"6. If you believe all the evidence, you should answer issue one, 'No.'"

Not given, and defendant excepted, and this is defendant's exception No. 11.

Issues:

"1. Were the lands of the plaintiffs Bradley set fire to and burned by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint?"

"2. What damage, if any, has been done to the lands of the plaintiffs Bradley, by reason of said fire?"

After giving a part and refusing to give a part of defendant's special instructions, as above set out, the court resumed its charge as follows:

"Now, gentlemen of the jury, the question is, Were these lands negligently set fire to? and I will give you a definition of negligence. Negligence in law cannot exist except in cases where there has been a want of ordinary care upon the part of the person charged with the act of omission or commission; it is the omission to do what a reasonable man, guided upon these considerations, which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or it is the doing something which a provident or reasonable man would not have done under the existing circumstances. (Negligence, to be actionable, must be the failure to do, by one responsible exercising ordinary care under all the circumstances, what a reasonably careful man would foresee might be productive of injury; and one is not liable for an injury which he could not foresee.)"

To the foregoing charge in parentheses, defendant excepted, and this is exception No. 12.

"(Now, as to the first issue, the burden is upon the plaintiffs to satisfy you by the evidence, and by its greater weight, and I mean by greater weight that that side upon whom the burden is placed by law and who must establish their contention by the greater weight of the evidence must put on sufficient evidence as to their contentions on their side of the scale to outweigh their adversaries' side; it must be borne down some—ever so slight will be sufficient—but they must satisfy you by the greater weight of evidence: First. That they are the owners of the property alleged to have been burned over, and the court charges you that it is admitted, so you need not consider that. Bradley owned the land. Second. That the fire was set out by defendant company, its agents or employes, from its locomotive engine which passed over or near plaintiffs' land, and if the plaintiffs have failed to satisfy you by the greater weight of the evidence, as I have defined it to you, that the defendant company set out the fire, then you will answer the first issue, 'No,' and if you answer the first issue 'No,' you need not consider the other issue, because the defendant in no event would be liable if it didn't set out the fire; but if the plaintiffs have satisfied you by the evidence, and by its greater weight, that defendant set out fire as alleged, the burden then shifts to the defendant to satisfy you by the evidence and by its greater weight, as I have defined it to you, that it didn't negligently set out the fire, for that its engines were not defective, but were properly equipped with good spark arresters and other appliances in good condition, and which appliances were in common and general use, and that the same were operated in a skillful manner, and by a competent engineer, and notwithstanding that you may find that the defendant set out the fire, if you find these facts from the evidence, the burden being upon the defendant company to establish these facts, then the defendant company would not be liable; the defendant may not be liable for every fire it sets out, and you should answer the first issue, 'No.')"

To the foregoing part of charge in parentheses, defendant excepted, and this is defendant's exception No. 13.

"(If the plaintiffs have satisfied you by the evidence, and by its greater weight, that the fire which burned over their lands on the date alleged was set out by defendant company, and the defendant company has failed to satisfy you by the evidence, and by its greater weight, that it wasn't negligent in that its engine was properly equipped and in good condition and operated by a competent and skillful engineer, then you should answer the first issue, 'Yes.')

To the foregoing part of charge in parentheses, defendant excepted, and this is exception No. 14.

"(If you find from the evidence, and by its greater weight, that the track or right of way of defendant was foul and full of dry and combustible material, and that it was allowed to remain in this condition, and that defendant's engine or train, while passing over this track in such a condition, set fire to this combustible material, and the same caught fire and communicated fire to the plaintiffs' lands and set out the fire which burned over plaintiffs' land as alleged, then the defendant company would be liable, and you should answer the first issue, 'Yes.')

To the foregoing part of charge in parentheses, defendant excepted, and this is exception No. 15.

"It was the duty of the defendant company to keep its right of way clear and clean of combustible material, and in doing this it was required to use the care that an ordinarily prudent man would use under all the circumstances."

Here the court read to the jury in full the rule laid down by the court in Williams v. Railroad, 140 N. C. p. 624, 53 S. E. 449, as follows:

"1. If fire escapes from an engine in proper condition, having a proper spark arrester, and operated in a careful way by a skillful and competent engineer, and the fire catches off the right of way, the defendant is not liable, for there is no negligence.

"(2. If fire escapes from an engine in proper condition, with a proper spark arrester, and operated in a careful way, by a skillful and competent engineer, but the fire catches on the right of way, which is in a foul and negligent condition, and thence spreads to the plaintiffs' premises, the defendant is liable.")

To the foregoing part of charge in parentheses, defendant excepted, and this is exception No. 16.

"3. If fire escapes from a defective engine, or defective spark arrester, or from a good engine not operated in a careful way or not by a skillful engineer, whether the fire catches off or on the right of way, the defendant is liable.

"If you answer the first issue, 'No,' you need not answer the next issue. If you answer the first issue, 'Yes,' then proceed to answer the next issue."

Issue as to damages:

"What damage, if any, has been done to the lands of the plaintiffs, Bradley, by reason of the said fire?

"The burden is upon the plaintiff as to the last issue to satisfy you by the evidence and by its greater weight what damages they have sustained by reason of the fire. You remember the evidence as to this issue. The court charges you that you may reward the plaintiffs fair and reasonable compensation in money for their damages, which would be the difference between the value of the land immediately before same was burned over and after same was burned over; what was the value of the property destroyed at the time and place it was destroyed?

"You are the sole judges of the evidence and how much weight to give to the evidence offered by the plaintiffs and defendant. What was the value of this land before this fire burned it on April 14, 1916; what the value of the timber and other material destroyed; how much was this land worth the next day? It is needless for me to say that you ought to approach this matter fairly and squarely; don't let the fact that some of the parties are citizens in this county and defendant a corporation in another state influence you; when people come into this court they stand upon the same plane; don't let these facts prejudice you either for or against either litigant. The court has no opinion and doesn't intend to convey to you that it has. (You are not compelled to accept what the plaintiffs' counsel have said was the evidence, nor the defendant's counsel's recollection thereof, nor the court's.)"

To the foregoing part of charge in parentheses, defendant excepted, and this is exception No. 17.

"You are the sole judges of the evidence and how much weight to give to the evidence. Take the issues and say how you find them."

The court thereupon submitted the following issues to the jury:

"1. Were the lands of the plaintiffs Bradley set fire to and burned by the negligence of the defendant as alleged in the complaint?

"2. What damage, if any, has been done to the lands of the plaintiffs by reason of said fire?"

And the jury answered the first issue, "Yes," and the second issue, "$1,062.50."

There was ample testimony to show that the fire was set out by defendant's engine, and the jury found that it was negligently done, and assessed the damages. Defendant appealed from the judgment upon the verdict.

W. L. Long, of Roanoke Rapids, W. H. S. Burgwyn, of Woodland, and Geo. C. Green, of Weldon, for appellees.

WALKER, J. [1] As to Massey's testimony concerning the value of the timber, there was no error, because he testified that, irrespective of what he got for his own timber, or its value, he was of the opinion that the difference in value of plaintiff's land before and after the fire was between $15 and $20 per acre. We do not concede, though, that the objection was made in proper time, or that it was not within the discretion of the court whether or not it would consider it.

[2] The question asked the witness J. A. Shaw was leading, and properly excluded on that ground, even if it was otherwise competent, which it seems not to be. G. F. U. Warehouse Co. v. Am. Agr. Chemical Co., 176 N. C. 509, 97 S. E. 472.

[3] The remarks of counsel, to which exception was taken, were not such a flagrant abuse of their privilege as to be ground for a new trial. It is apparent that no real harm was done, and the jury doubtless passed it by, without prejudice, as being merely a too fervid utterance of counsel in the heat of debate. It was intended only to emphasize the absurdity of defendant's very small estimate of the plaintiff's loss. It is one of the inseparable incidents of all trials, and should not be taken too hard, but overlooked upon the principle of "give and take." It was provoked, too, by what the defendant had previously said. The judge's charge as to damages was sufficient to prevent injury to the defendant in this case from the remark.

[4] We do not agree with the learned counsel that there was any intimation of opinion by the court upon the facts. When it is supposed to have occurred, the judge was only stating the allegations, or contentions, of the plaintiff, and the nature of the case, and not expressing any view of his own. If he misstated them, his attention should have been called to it then, when timely correction could be made by him. It is too late after verdict to complain. Jeffress v. Railroad Co., 158 N. C. 215, 73 S. E. 1013; State v. Cox, 153 N. C. 638, 69 S. E. 419; State v. Blackwell, 162 N. C. 672, 78 S. E. 316; State v. Merrick, 172 N. C. 870, 90 S. E. 257; State v. Johnson, 172 N. C. 920, 90 S. E. 426; State v. Earl Neville, 175 N. C. 731, 95 S. E. 55. He who fails to speak when his time comes to be heard will not be heard when he should be silent. He will not be allowed two chances at the verdict. State v. Tyson, 133 N. C. 692, 45 S. E. 838. But a mere recital of contentions, as we have seen, is no expression of an opinion upon the facts or the weight of the testimony. Jarvis v. Swain, 173 N. C. 9, 91 S. E. 358.

[5-7] Restricting plaintiff's maximum recovery to the amount stated in the complaint was in favor of defendant, and surely is no expression of opinion that the damages should be the amount thus claimed. If defendant desired more specific instructions as to damages, it should have asked for them.

[8] The charge upon negligence, when considered as a whole, was in accordance with our decisions upon the subject. Aycock v. Railroad Co., 89 N. C. 321; Williams v. Railroad Co., 140 N. C. 623, 53 S. E. 448; Knott v. Railroad Co., 142 N. C. 242, 55 S. E. 150; Haynes v. Gas Co., 114 N. C. 207, 19 S. E. 344, 26 L. R. A. 810, 41 Am. St. Rep. 786; Cox v. Railroad Co., 149 N. C. 117, 62 S. E. 884; Kornegay v. Railroad Co., 154 N. C. 389, 70 S. E. 731; McRaney v. Railroad Co., 168 N. C. 570, 84 S. E. 851; Aman v. Lumber Co., 160 N. C. 370, 75 S. E. 931; and especially Boney v. Railroad Co., 175 N. C. 354, 95 S. E. 590, where the principal cases are collected, and the doctrine stated. The charge must be construed as a whole. Kornegay v. Railroad Co., supra.

[9,10] There was sufficient evidence to prove that the track was foul, and also the space within 10 feet of it, and that the fire started there and burned the adjoining lands. It was for the jury to say whether the engine was properly equipped and handled, as the cases we have just cited show; and it was for the defendant to satisfy the jury that there was no negligence in this respect, or take the chance of an adverse verdict. The facts were peculiarly within its knowledge, as it had the possession and control of the engine, and could establish them better than could the plaintiff. Haynes v. Gas Co., supra.

[11] We may further say that the exception to the charge is too broad, as it embraces two separate propositions, one of which is plainly correct. Quelch v. Futch, 175 N. C. 694, 94 S. E. 713, and cases cited.

There is no merit in the other exceptions.

No error.

HARWELL v. COLUMBIA MILLS.
(No. 10135.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 27, 1919.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨217(2)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—KNOWLEDGE OF DANGER.

A servant did not assume the risk of slipping upon a floor from the mere fact that he knew it was wet.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨185(7)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—SAFE PLACE TO WORK—FELLOW-SERVANT DOCTRINE.

Where a floor was dangerous by reason of a leaky icebox, and plaintiff slipped and was injured at a time when sand had been swept from floor, mere fact that it was duty of another servant to oversee place and keep sand on floor did not free master from liability on ground that negligence was that of a fellow servant.

3. TRIAL ⇨296(6)—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE OF ERROR.

That instruction eliminated from consideration of jury fact that a servant might assume risk of falling on a wet floor was cured by an instruction almost immediately following, that recovery could not be had if servant knew floor was wet when he stepped on it, or by exercise of ordinary care could have known of such condition.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨201(9)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTS OF FELLOW SERVANT.

If master was negligent in failing to provide a safe place of work, he would be responsible if it caused injuries to servants, notwithstanding that negligent act of a fellow servant might have contributed to injuries also as a proximate cause.

5. TRIAL ⇨255(4)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—EFFECT OF EVIDENCE.

Where injured plaintiff sought to show that he would suffer greater injury because of predisposition, and defendant on cross-examination brought out that such predisposition was to tuberculosis, and court instructed generally that jury could take into consideration greater injury because of some predisposition if shown by evidence, such instruction was not erroneous as allowing speculative damages because of the tuberculosis which might or might not develop, since defendant, if he wished to restrict effect of evidence brought out by him, should have requested an instruction to that effect.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1050(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In action by servant for injuries by slipping on floor, it was harmless to allow a witness for plaintiff to state that defendant put sand on floor after the accident, where defendant's witness stated without objection that sand had been put on the floor before, and that the orders required it.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by E. T. Harwell against the Columbia Mills. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Davis, of Atlanta, Ga., and Barron, McKay, Frierson & Moffatt, of Columbia, for appellant.

B. L. McDowell and Cole L. Blease, both of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The respondent, Harwell, was an employé of the appellant mills. On the 4th day of October, 1916, while Harwell was at work, he went into a closet in the room in which he was working that had been provided for the comfort and convenience of employes. As he came out of the closet he stepped on a wet place on the floor, and fell to the floor and injured himself. This action was brought for damages for the failure of the mills to provide a safe place in which to work. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and from the judgment entered upon the verdict the defendant appealed.

[1] I. The first exception complains of error in refusing to direct a verdict on the ground that no other reasonable conclusion could be drawn from the evidence than that the plaintiff had assumed the risk. The plaintiff admitted that he knew the place was wet, but not that he knew that it was slippery and dangerous. It was another witness who said that the floor was made of maple, and that when a maple floor was wet it was slippery. This exception cannot be sustained.

[2] II. The second exception complains of error in refusing to direct a verdict on the ground that the negligence, if any, was that of a fellow servant. This exception cannot be sustained. It is not necessary to discuss the nonassignable duties of the master. The icebox leaked, and the water that fell on the floor ran across the floor in front of the closet door over which the employes were expected to go. Byer, a witness for the appellant, states that it was his particular business to oversee the conditions of the closets; that Mr. Harwell and a colored man who handled the ice were under him; that he had an instruction, before Mr. Harwell got hurt, to use sand as a precaution. The icebox was on wheels, and could have been repaired or removed to another place where it could have done no harm. The authorities of the mill knew that the floor needed attention and precautionary measures, and did not make the place safe by removing the cause of danger or taking the steps necessary to counteract the danger. There was evidence that the master had been warned of the danger.

[3] III. Exception 3:

"His honor, the presiding judge, charged the jury as follows: 'But if you find that the risk which occasioned an injury, if any, to the plaintiff, was one which arose out of the master's negligence, then it would not be an ordinary risk incident to the work, assumed by the servant. In other words, the servant, when he enters upon the employment of the master, has a right to expect the master to use ordinary care to provide him a safe place for work, and a safe way in going to and from his work; and the master is not allowed, where he fails to use care to provide a safe place and way, to say that his failure was an ordinary risk assumed by the servant.'

"This constituted error (a) in that it eliminated from the consideration of the jury the fact that a servant might assume a risk of which he was fully aware, the danger of which had existed for some time, and was perfectly obvious and apparent, even though the existence of such condition might be due indirectly to negligence of the master."

This exception cannot be sustained. It was followed almost immediately by:

"If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff knew of the wet and slippery condition of the floor over which he had to pass, if he did have to pass, and if the evidence that it was wet and slippery, or that by the exercise of ordinary care the plaintiff could have known of such condition, or that any reasonable man of ordinary care and prudence would have known of such condition, and that any reasonable man of ordinary care and prudence, knowing of such condition of the floor, would have realized the risk and danger in passing over it, and would not have attempted to pass over it, and that the plaintiff, in attempting to pass over the floor, failed to exercise the ordinary care which would have been exercised by a person of ordinary prudence under similar circumstances, and that such failure to exercise ordinary care and prudence contributed, as a proximate cause, to his injuries, why, then, he could not recover."

[4] IV. Exception 4:

"His honor, the presiding judge, charged the jury as follows: 'However, I charge you that with this qualification: The master is not liable for an injury occurring through the act of a fellow servant; but if the act of a fellow servant merely co-operated or contributed, along with some independent act of negligence on the part of the master, such as a failure of the master to use ordinary care to provide a safe place of work, or a safe way for the servant to use in passing from his work to a toilet provided for his use during the hours of employment, and returning from the toilet to the place of work, then the fact that an injury may have been caused by the act of a fellow servant would not be a defense, if it was also caused by the negligence of the master in failing to furnish a safe place or a safe way for the use of the servant, under the circumstances which I have stated to you. As I have said, the mere fact that an injury may have been due to the act of a fellow servant would not be a defense, unless it was the sole cause of the injury, or unless you find there was no negligence on the part of the master. The master is not responsible for the act of a fellow servant, but he would be responsible for his own negligence, if he were guilty of negligence, in failing to provide a safe place for work, or safe means and a safe way for the servant while at work, and for such negligence in failing to provide a safe place or safe way for the use of the servant while at work, he would be responsible, if it caused injuries to the servant, notwithstanding that the negligent act of a fellow servant might have contributed to those injuries also as a proximate cause.'

"This was error, (a) in that it eliminated from the consideration of the jury the fact reasonably inferable from the evidence that the wet spot was caused by the failure of a fellow servant to follow the instructions and use the means furnished him by the master to render the place safe, which fact would exonerate the master from liability, even though such failure did result in rendering the place unsafe; (b) in that it constituted a charge on the facts."

The wet place was caused by the defective condition and location of the icebox and not by the sweeper. The master knew it. He knew it required constant attention. The floor was swept every hour and a quarter. The precaution (the sand) was removed every hour and a quarter. The place was made unsafe by the master and not by the fellow servant.

This was a statement of law, and not a charge on the facts.

[5] V. Exception 5:

"His honor, the presiding judge, charged as follows: 'But you are to take into consideration the extent of the injuries, if any, produced by that fall, upon the plaintiff, and if those injuries are greater in his case because of some predisposition of his constitution, if any such predisposition is shown by the evidence, why that is a circumstance which you could take into consideration.'

"This was error in that (a) it constituted a charge on the facts; (b) it allowed the jury to speculate on a vague and uncertain possibility as an element of damage; (c) violated the true rule of damages, that where one suffering from a disability receives an injury he is only entitled to receive compensation to the extent of the aggravation of his previous condition."

This exception cannot be sustained. The plaintiff brought out the fact that, on account of a predisposition of the plaintiff's constitution, he was likely to suffer more than a man of normal constitution. The appellant brought out the fact on the cross-examination that the defect was a tendency to tuberculosis. There is nothing in the charge to suggest that the jury might give damages for tuberculosis that might or might not develop. His honor specifically told the jury, "You are to ascertain from the evidence on the stand what effect any injuries had on this particular man." If the appellant thought it necessary to guard against the effect of the statement it brought out itself, then appellant should have requested his honor to so charge.

[6] VI. The sixth exception complains of error in allowing a witness for the plaintiff to state that sand had been put on the floor after the accident. This was harmless here, because appellant's witness stated without objection that sand had been put on the floor before and the orders required it. The reason of the rule is that, when it is shown that the master changed conditions after an accident, it may be inferred that the master thereby admits the defective conditions at the time of the accident. The master must therefore admit a defective condition or continue to operate under defective conditions, and thereby endanger other employes. The testimony did not show a change in conditions. The testimony does not violate the reason of the rule, and is therefore harmless.

The judgment is affirmed.

GREENVILLE NURSERY CO. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al. (No. 10160.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 11, 1919.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE \Leftrightarrow 164(6)—APPEAL—RETURN—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where appellant's exceptions to acts of magistrate are predicated upon facts contrary to those stated in return of magistrate to circuit court, they cannot be considered on appeal to Supreme Court.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; T. H. Spain, Judge.

Action by the Greenville Nursery Company against the Southern Railway Company and the Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio Railway Company. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the first-named defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

The exceptions and grounds of appeal referred to in the opinion are:

I. Because the circuit judge erred in not sustaining appellant's first exception from the judgment of the magistrate, which is as follows:

"(1) Because the magistrate erred in overruling defendant's (Southern Railway Company's) motion for a nonsuit and directed verdict, and in rendering judgment for plaintiff in any amount; the testimony clearly showing that the shipment was made on an open bill of lading, and that there is no testimony that title was reserved by plaintiff, or that plaintiff was the real party in interest at time of action."

II. Because the circuit judge erred in not sustaining appellant's second exception from the judgment of the magistrate, which is as follows:

"Because the magistrate erred in not granting motion of defendant Southern Railway Company for a nonsuit and directed verdict, and in rendering judgment against said defendant for any amount; the contract of shipment as set out in the bill of lading required the filing of a claim within a specified time, while all testimony showed no claim was ever filed."

III. Because the circuit judge erred in not sustaining appellant's third exception from the judgment of the magistrate, which is as follows:

"Because the magistrate erred in refusing to grant motion of defendant Southern Railway Company for a nonsuit and directed verdict, and in rendering judgment against said defendant for any amount, in holding that the consignee had the right to abandon the shipment on arrival at its destination, while he should have held that it was the duty of the consignee to accept the shipment and handle to the best advantage of all concerned, and file claim with carrier for the difference, if any, between the value at the time of shipment and its value on arrival at its destination."

IV. Because the circuit judge erred in not sustaining appellant's fourth exception from the judgment of the magistrate, which is as follows:

"Because magistrate erred in rendering judgment against defendant Southern Railway Company for an amount greater than $72.05, it being admitted that the goods were sold at auction in spring of 1917 for $9.00, and plaintiff's counsel announcing that he would only ask for judgment for full amount less $9.00, magistrate finding full amount to be $81.05."

V. Because the circuit judge erred in not sustaining appellant's fifth exception from the judgment of the magistrate, which is as follows:

"Because magistrate erred in holding defendant Southern Railway Company liable for the entire amount of the loss, while he should have, as plaintiff elected to sue both roads, prorated the amount in proportion to delay on each road; the testimony showing the shipment was in hands of defendant Southern Railway Company six days, and in hand of defendant Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio Railway Company four days."

B. L. Abney, of Columbia, and Cothran, Dean & Cothran, T. K. Earle, and R. N. Ward, all of Greenville, for appellant.

C. G. Wyche, of Greenville, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The following statement appears in the record:

This action was instituted in magistrate's court for Greenville county on March 22, 1917, for $80 damages on account of the alleged negligent delay to shipment of fruit trees delivered to defendant Southern Railway Company at Taylors, S. C., on 27th October, 1916, by plaintiff, consigned to J. A. Goode, at Mayo, S. C., a station on C., C. & O. Railway.

The case was tried before Magistrate Daniel, without a jury, on July 30, 1917, and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff and against defendant Southern Railway Company for $81.05. The case was duly appealed to the circuit court, and was heard before his honor, Judge Spain, at the November, 1917, term of court of common pleas for Greenville county, and the judgment of the magistrate affirmed.

The complaint, omitting formal allegations, alleges: That plaintiff delivered to defendant Southern Railway Company, at Taylors, S. C., on October 27, 1916, one box fruit trees and nursery products, marked "Perishable," consigned to J. A. Goode, Mayo, S. C., a station on defendant C. C. & O. Railway, calling attention of defendant's agent at Taylors to perishable nature of goods, and that said nursery products were for delivery to various parties at Mayo on November 1, 1916; that said shipment was negligently delayed, and did not reach Mayo by November 1, 1916, and did not arrive until a long time thereafter, and when same did arrive they were worthless.

The answer of defendant Southern Railway Company was a general denial, and set up a special defense, a clause in bill of lading reading as follows:

"Claims for loss, damage, or delay must be made in writing to the carrier at the point of delivery or at the point of origin within four months after delivery of the property, or, in case of failure to make delivery, then within four months after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed. Unless claims are so made the carrier shall not be liable."

The defendant Southern Railway Company alone appealed from the order of the circuit court upon exceptions that will be reported.

The following is the return made by the magistrate before whom the case was tried:

"The above case was tried before me and decision rendered on August 13, 1917. I found my verdict for the plaintiff because the evidence showed, in my opinion, that by the negligent and careless handling of plaintiff's property by defendant Southern Railway Company, plaintiff was damaged to the value of his said property, $81.05. I think there was some evidence of notice being given of the loss. The trees were shipped to itself at Mayo, and plaintiff's agent called for the property, but could not get them. The testimony shows trees were in charge of Southern Railway from October 27th, when they were received by said road at Taylors, S. C., until at least the 4th of November, and possibly until the 6th of November, and these stations are only about 25 miles apart and no changes. I see no excuse for this delay, which of itself, according to the testimony, would render the trees valueless. As to appellant's fourth exception, the evidence shows that the $9 received by Southern Railway Company for the trees was never delivered to plaintiff; hence there was no reason why I should deduct this amount from the verdict. I had to decide the case according to the evidence, and not according to some understanding between attorneys, when the testimony showed that the amount of the verdict is proper. I did not see that there was any evidence against the C. C. & O. Ry. I thought all the motions made by defendant Southern Railway should be overruled.

"Respectfully,

"Jno. M. Daniel, Magistrate."

Under the head of "Appeal to the Circuit Court from an Inferior Court," section 407 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "Upon hearing the appeal, the appellate court shall give judgment according to the justice of the case, without regard to technical errors and defects which do not affect the merits;" which was done in this case.

Furthermore, the return made by the magistrate to the circuit court shows that the appellant's exceptions are predicated upon facts contrary to those stated in the return.

Appeal dismissed.

RICHMOND GUANO CO. v. KIRKPATRICK.
(No. 10163.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 15, 1919.)

1. AGRICULTURE ⇐7—FERTILIZERS.

In action on note for purchase price of fertilizer, where there was no evidence of fraud by plaintiff, and substantial compliance by plaintiff with its contract was shown, and the only deficiency proved was a slight shortage in the percentage of available ammonia below the guaranteed analysis, the court properly directed verdict for plaintiff, making allowance for the shortage in accordance with Civ. Code 1912, §§ 2315-2330.

2. AGRICULTURE ⇐7—DEFENSE TO NOTE.

Fraud is a defense to action for purchase price of fertilizer, at least where there has been no substantial compliance with the contract; the remedies and measure of damages produced by Civ. Code 1912, §§ 2315-2330, not being, in such case, exclusive.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Fairfield County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by the Richmond Guano Company against Walter L. Kirkpatrick. From a judgment for plaintiff on a directed verdict, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the answer, to which reference is made in the dissenting opinion, are as follows:

(3) Further answering the said first cause of action defendant says: That some time during the month of March, 1914, the plaintiff com-tracted and agreed to sell to defendant 56 tons of a special fertilizer to be used during said year in the cultivation and raising of his crops, and by the said contract plaintiff undertook, agreed, and contracted to manufacture the said fertilizer from and out of certain named, specified, and designated ingredients, substances, and materials, and no others, and to deliver the said fertilizer, when manufactured, to defendant at Rockton, in the state of South Carolina, and defendant to pay therefor $26.55 per ton. Under the contract of plaintiff with defendant the said fertilizer was to be made, compounded, and manufactured from out of the following ingredients, materials, and substances: Acid phosphate, potash, and blood and fish scrap, with sufficient tobacco stem to act as a dryer, and the said fertilizer, when compounded, made, and manufactured out of the ingredients, substances, and materials above mentioned, the same was to contain 8 per cent. of available phosphoric acid, 3 per cent. of potash, and 4 per cent. of ammonia, and by the said contract and agreement the 4 per cent. of ammonia in said fertilizer was to be derived from blood and fish scrap as the source of the same, and from no other material; but plaintiff, unmindful of its said contract, with intent to deceive, overreach, mislead, and defraud the defendant, delivered to him at Rockton 56 tons of cheap and worthless stuff or dirt, which it represented to be the special fertilizers it had contracted and agreed to manufacture and deliver to defendant, and the plaintiff well knew, at the time it delivered the said worthless stuff or dirt, that the same did not contain and was not made and manufactured out of the ingredients, substances, and materials called for by the contract, and that it had knowledge and willfully used, in the manufacture of the same, some other cheap and worthless materials or substance as the source from which the ammonia in said fertilizer was obtained, and defendant, relying upon said contract, and having no knowledge or means of knowledge other than the representation of the plaintiff as contained in said contract, accepted the said worthless fertilizer, believing at the time that the same was what he had contracted for, and gave to the plaintiff the note mentioned in the first cause of action.

(4) That the said fertilizer sold and delivered to defendant was the consideration for the said note mentioned in the first cause of action, but defendant would not have accepted said worthless fertilizer, nor given the said note therefor, had he known at the time that the said fertilizer was not what he had contracted for, and that the plaintiff had falsely, fraudulently, and deceitfully misled him into believing that the same was in every respect what he had contracted for and would come up to the guaranteed analysis, when the same did not come up to the analysis above stated, and was not manufactured or made of the materials and substance contracted for, and the said fertilizer was worthless, and the consideration for the said note has failed, and the same is without consideration, as the defendant has derived no benefit from said fertilizer, but, on the contrary, has been injured by the deceit, false dealing, and deception of the plaintiff in delivering to him a worthless article as a fertilizer, when it well knew defendant was dependent upon said fertilizer to raise a crop during the year 1914, and defendant owes the plaintiff nothing, and there is nothing due and owing on said note, as the consideration for said note has failed, and said note is without consideration to support it, and is null and void.

James W. Hanahan, of Winnsboro, for appellant.

Glenn W. Ragsdale, of Winnsboro, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This case was tried before Judge De Vore and a jury at the February term of court, 1918, for Fairfield county. After all of the testimony was taken, his honor directed a verdict for the plaintiff. After entry of judgment thereon, defendant appealed.

[1] Exception 1 alleges error in his honor directing a verdict, when there was abundant evidence on the question of fraud to carry the case to the jury on this issue, and also, under the statute, the defendant could not prove fraud, either as a defense or by way of counterclaim. His honor ruled out the evidence offered to show the effect the fertilizer had on defendant's crop, holding that the statute law of this state provided an exclusive remedy for the sale of fertilizers deficient in ingredients guaranteed by analysis, or short in commercial value, either one or both, and, having fixed a measure of damages to cover every possible deficiency, or shortage, this remedy must be followed. His honor also held, where there was a deficiency or shortage in the value of commercial fertilizer, the measure of damage was prescribed by statute, and that an allegation of fraud by the purchaser could not have the effect of admitting testimony showing the results on crops by the use of the fertilizer. We see no error in this ruling. There was no evidence of fraud to go to the jury. The proof was plain as to how the fertilizer sold turned out, as to the guaranteed analysis, and its shortage in value made it only a matter of calculation. This disposes of exceptions 1, 2, and 3, which are overruled.

Exceptions 4 and 5 are overruled. We see nothing in his honor's ruling whereby defendant was prejudiced.

Judgment affirmed.

HYDRICK, J. I concur in affirming the judgment on the ground that, under the evidence, the verdict of any fair jury would have been the same as that directed by the court. I agree with Mr. Justice WATTS that the evidence was not sufficient to require the court to submit the issue of fraud to the jury.

[2] But I do not concur in the view that the remedies and measure of damages provided by the statute for deficiencies in the guaranteed analysis or commercial value of fertilizers sold are exclusive of all others, or that the statute covers all possible cases of fraud in contracts for the sale of fertilizers, or all possible deficiencies that may arise in the guaranteed analysis or guaranteed commercial value thereof. The only deficiency proved was a very slight shortage in the percentage of available ammonia below the guaranteed analysis, and for that the proper allowance was made in accordance with the provisions of the statute. There was substantial compliance with the contract, and substantial justice has been done, and therefore I think the judgment should be affirmed.

GAGE, J. I am of opinion there is no evidence of fraud, and for that reason the judgment ought to be affirmed. I express no opinion on the other issue, because the expression of it would avail nothing.

GARY, C. J. (dissenting). The defendant pleaded failure of consideration; also fraud, and a counterclaim for damages. Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the answer, which will be reported, contain the allegations of fraud. There was testimony tending to sustain these allegations, but his honor, the presiding judge, ruled that fraud was not a defense to this action, and could not prevent a recovery upon the notes.

The notes must be construed as if the provisions of chapter 34, article 1, of the Code of Laws of 1912, were embodied in them, as a part of the contract between the parties. Phosphate Co. v. Arthurs, 97 S. C. 358, 81 S. E. 663. In that case it was held that, if fertilizers did not come up to weight and guaranteed analysis and were not actually delivered in kind according to contract, recitals in a note for the purchase price as to the weight, that each sack bore the guaranteed analysis, that it bore inspector's tag, and in all respects complied with the law, and that the seller had neither impliedly nor expressly warranted the effects on the crops, and an agreement therein that the buyer could not hold the seller responsible for practical results, were attempts to dispense with the statutory requirements, and therefore void. That case did not rest upon fraud, but upon the ground that such recitals were against public policy—citing the case of McConnell v. Kitchens, 20 S. C. 430, 47 Am. Rep. 845.

We also have cases directly in point arising under chapter 34, art. 1, of the Code of Laws of 1912, announcing the principle that fraud will render a contract for fertilizers void, to wit: Germofert v. Castles, 97 S. C. 389, 81 S. E. 665; Germofert v. Delleney, 97 S. C. 395, 81 S. E. 667; Germofert v. Scruggs, 97 S. C. 396, 81 S. E. 667. The same principle applies in other cases. Welborn v. Dixon, 70 S. C. 106, 49 S. E. 232, 3 Ann. Cas. 407. Indeed, we cannot recall any case, certainly in this state, in which our courts have held that a party perpetrating a fraud was not liable for the consequences of his wrongful act.

For these reasons I dissent.

STATE v. ROBINSON. (No. 10162.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 14, 1919.)

JURY ~~90~~—DISQUALIFICATIONS—RELATIONSHIP—"ABUSE OF DISCRETION."

It was an abuse of discretion to retain a juror, in a prosecution for forgery of a tax receipt for state and county taxes, who was the nephew of the county treasurer, who had signed the warrant of arrest and upon whose testimony conviction largely rested; "abuse of discretion" being, not a term of reproach, but simply meaning manifest error.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Abuse of Discretion.]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Jasper County; James E. Peurifoy, Judge.

W. J. Robinson was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

J. W. Vincent, of Hampton, for appellant.
George Warren, Sol., of Hampton, for the State.

FRASER, J. The facts are stated in the case, and, as it is short, the entire case is quoted.

"The defendant was tried and convicted of forgery by a jury on July 8, 1913, at Ridgeland, S. C.; the specific charge being the forgery of a tax receipt of state and county taxes.

"The jury were put on their voir dire. J. A. Nettles was called and examined as a venireman by the court as to his relationship, and he stated among other things that he was related to J. S. Berg, the county treasurer and a witness for the state, who signed the warrant for the arrest of defendant and on whose testimony the conviction largely rested; the relationship being nephew. The defendant asked that he be excused by the court for this cause, but the presiding judge refused to do this, and the defendant used one of his peremptory challenges to reject this juror, which peremptory challenges were exhausted before the jury was completed, and the defendant contends that the last three jurors were particularly objectionable to him.

"The defendant, upon conviction, was sentenced by the court to pay a fine of $1 and serve upon the public works for a period of one year.

"The defendant served notice of intention to appeal to this court and was released under bond.

"Exception.

"(1) His honor erred and abused his discretion in not causing the juror J. A. Nettles to stand aside on motion of defendant, it appearing that he was a nephew of the chief prosecutor; it being submitted that the defendant should not have been required to exhaust one of his peremptory challenges to dismiss this juror, in view of the close relationship of the juror to the chief prosecuting witness."

In the case of State v. Malloy, 91 S. C. 429, 74 S. E. 988, it was held that it was sufficient to quash an indictment found by a grand jury that one of the jury commissioners was the father of one of the boys for whose killing the defendant was indicted; that the grand jury so drawn could not even bring in an indictment for the killing of the boy who was not related to the prosecuting witness, both being killed at the same time. It is true that the fitness of a juror is within the discretion of the trial judge, yet abuse of discretion is not a term of reproach, but simply means manifest error.

We think it was manifest error to require the appellant to go to trial with a juror who was so closely related to the prosecuting witness, and that prosecuting witness "on whose testimony the conviction largely rested."

It is also true that this juror did not sit in the case, but, to exclude him, it required the defendant to exhaust his challenges and have his case heard by another objectionable juror.

The judgment is reversed; and a new trial ordered.

SPIGENER et al. v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. et al. (No. 10142.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 28, 1919.)

1. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT ¶26—DISMISSAL OF ONE DEFENDANT.

In an action against a carrier and Pullman Company for leaving a sick passenger at the station after having been notified of her intention to board a Pullman, it was not error, as against the railway, to dismiss as to the Pullman Company, although notice through the Pullman employees of the passenger's intention to board had been given the carrier; plaintiff not relying alone on such notice, but upon actual notice to the railway's agents.

2. CARRIERS ¶278(1)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In an action against a carrier for leaving a sick passenger at the station after having notice that she intended to board the train, whether sufficient notice was given the ticket agent of the sickness of plaintiff so as to require his assistance held for the jury.

3. CARRIERS ¶278(1)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—BOARDING TRAINS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Where a conductor of a passenger train knew he had left behind a passenger who intended to board the train at the station, it was a question for the jury whether it was his duty to go back to the station for such passenger.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ¶333 — VERDICT AND JUDGMENT—CODEFENDANTS—DAMAGES—AMOUNT.

In an action by a passenger against a carrier, its employees, and a Pullman Company for being left at the station when intending to board, it was not improper to return a verdict and to enter judgment for a larger amount against the carrier than against its servants.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT ¶333 — VERDICT AND JUDGMENT—SERVANT AS JOINT DEFENDANT.

Where a servant is united with a master in an action for damages for tort, and the tort was that of the servant alone, a verdict and judgment against the master alone cannot stand, but, if other servants are involved, the jury might find that the tort was committed by them and may find against the master alone.

6. CARRIERS ¶265—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS — NOTICE OF INTENTION TO BOARD TRAIN.

In an action against a carrier for leaving an intending passenger at the station, a verdict for plaintiff was not improper because no notice that the passenger was ill was given the railroad company before the train left the station, when it appeared that it had sufficient notice after the train left and while they might still have gone back.

7. CARRIERS ¶277(5)—PASSENGERS—OPPORTUNITY TO BOARD TRAIN—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

In an action against a carrier for leaving a passenger at the station knowing that she was sick and intended to board the train, a verdict of $5,000 punitive damages was not excessive.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶207—OBJECTIONS BELOW—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

Where no objection to the arguments of counsel is made at trial, the question will not be reviewed on appeal.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Sallie Glass Spigener and another against the Seaboard Air Line Railway and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lyles & Lyles, of Columbia, for appellants. Tompkins, Barnett & McDonald, Barron, McKay, Frierson & Moffatt, and W. H. Cobb, all of Columbia, for respondents.

FRASER, J. It will not be necessary to go into the minute details set out in the case. A general statement is enough in this court.

The plaintiff Mrs. Sallie Glass Spigener lived with her husband near Allendale, in this state. She formerly lived in Columbia, and Dr. Watson, of Columbia, has been her family physician all of her life. Mrs. Spigener was in delicate health and was under the care of Dr. Watson. In the afternoon of the 30th of May, 1916, Mrs. Spigener was taken sick, and, being apprehensive of a serious and dangerous attack, communicated, through her husband, over the phone, with Dr. Watson in Columbia. Dr. Watson advised that Mrs. Spigener be brought to Columbia immediately. The Southern train from Allendale to Columbia had already left, and plaintiffs found that there was a train on the Seaboard Railway that would pass Fairfax, a station on said road, about 8 o'clock p. m. Fairfax was about 18 miles away. Mr. J. Sims Spigener, one of the plaintiffs, Mr. Bryan, a neighbor of the plaintiffs, Mr. J. Victor Spigener, and a trained nurse went with Mrs. Spigener to Fairfax. The party arrived at Fairfax about 20 minutes before the train. Mr. J. Sims Spigener, the husband of Mrs. Spigener, bought three tickets to Columbia—one for Mrs. Spigener, one for the trained nurse, and one for himself. Mr. Spigener also asked for Pullman tickets for the three. The agent who sold the tickets for the railroad said he did not represent the Pullman Company, but the Pullman Company would sell the Pullman tickets on the train.

It seems that it is the rule at Fairfax for motor and other vehicles to stop on one side of the railroad track, while passengers embark and disembark on the other side. Mr. Spigener asked for, and obtained, permission from the railroad agent to run his automobile near to the passenger side of the railroad track. The reason given for this infraction of the ordinary rule was that the automobile contained a sick lady, and it was very desirable to get the car and its sick occupant as near the coach as practicable. When the train came it stopped, before it reached the station, at a water tank, and then moved up to the station; the Pullman, however, being some distance from the station. The agent of the railroad checked the plaintiffs trunk to Columbia. The plaintiffs had two suit cases, containing articles that would be necessary in the emergency. When the train stopped at the station, Mr. Spigener asked a train official about the Pullman. He was told that the Pullman was closed. Mr. Victor Spigener took the two suit cases and went back to the Pullman, which he found open, and put the suit cases on the Pullman. The train started, and the Pullman conductor told Mr. Victor Spigener to get on the Pullman, as the train was probably pulling the cars up further to the station. Finding, however, that the train was not going to stop, Mr. Spigener got off of the train. When the train arrived at the station, the agent, the defendant Brooks, went to the baggage car to superintend the taking off and putting on of the trunks. There is evidence that, when the flagman gave the signal to start the train, he was told that there was a sick lady to go on the train, and that the flagman or brakeman told the train conductor. The Pullman conductor promptly went forward to find the train conductor to inquire about his passengers. He found him and asked for his passengers. The train conductor told the Pullman conductor that there were no Pullman passengers. The Pullman conductor then told him of the two suit cases. There was evidence that the train was then in a "stone's throw" of the Fairfax station. The train conductor, the defendant Rhodes, replied, "If we have left any one, we will hear from it at Denmark." Denmark was an hour's ride away; two hours running backwards or a delay of three hours. There is testimony that Mrs. Spigener suffered great nervous shock when she found that she had been left, and continued to suffer intense bodily pain until she got to Columbia the next morning. Complaint was at once made to the station agent, who took up the matter with the head officials of the road. The only concession that was made was that, if the train could be stopped before it reached Denmark, it would go back to Fairfax for Mrs. Spigener. There is evidence that Mrs. Spigener lost an infant child by premature birth by reason of the delay, and that she received by reason of her sufferings serious injury to her physical and nervous constitution, which would be, in all probability, permanent. There was evidence that the defendant could, at small cost, have sent out an extra engine and coach from Savannah that would have taken Mrs. Spigener to Columbia, with only a reasonable delay. Nothing was done to relieve the situation, and Mrs. Spigener was required to go to a hotel and wait for the next train. This delayed her about six or seven hours.

This suit was brought against the railway, the station agent, the train conductor, and the Pullman Company.

At the close of the testimony, the defendant the Pullman Company moved for a direction of a verdict in its behalf. The plaintiffs consented, and the other defendants stated, "We are not interested in the motion," but stated that their position was that, because of notices given to the Pullman employees, it was claimed as one of the acts of negligence for which the Seaboard Air Line Railway was responsible to plaintiffs and the Seaboard Air Line Railway might be entitled to have the Pullman Company answer over to it.

The verdict was $20,000 for actual damages and $5,000 punitive damages against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company, and $1,250 for punitive damages each against the defendant Brooks and Rhodes.

From the judgment entered on this verdict, the three defendants appealed. Subsequently the defendants Brooks and Rhodes moved to be allowed to abandon their appeals. This motion is granted.

There are 17 exceptions by the Railway Company, but in argument they have been reduced to 7. They will be considered as they are stated in the argument.

[1] Point 1:

"That it was error, after the testimony had been introduced as to the notice given through the employés of the Pullman Company and the arguments had thereon, to dismiss the Pullman Company from the suit and leave the jury to find a verdict for damages against the Seaboard Air Line Railway on account of such notice."

This cannot be sustained. The plaintiffs relied upon notice given to the station agent, the flagman, the railway conductor, while standing between the coaches, and the notice given to the railway conductor by the Pullman conductor, in the thoroughfare coach. It was the actual notice given to the railway conductor, and not the imputed notice to the Pullman conductor.

[2] II. Point 2:

"That the notice given to the ticket agent of the sickness of the plaintiff Mrs. Spigener was not of such a character as to require assistance at his hands."

This cannot be sustained. It may be that the notice did not require manual assistance in getting on the train, but the rule required the conductor to obey the orders of agents or yardmasters while at stations. The station agent could have rendered valuable assistance in requiring the conductor to stop long enough and at a suitable place to enable the sick lady to entrain. It was for the jury to say what kind of assistance was necessary under the circumstances. A mere notice to the railway conductor that there was a sick lady at the station to get on the train might have been very valuable assistance. The record shows that, when the train arrived at the station, the station agent did not tell any official on the train that there was a sick lady there to take the train. The issue was real and properly submitted to the jury.

[3] III. Point 3:

"That it was not the duty of the conductor, under the circumstances proven, to run the train back to Fairfax, after it had left the station, to take up the plaintiff, Mrs. Spigener."

This point cannot be sustained. There was evidence that the conductor knew he had left a passenger while he was within "a stone's throw of the station," and there was no evidence that the conductor would have violated any rule by going back. His honor told the jury that it was sometimes improper to go back. The facts were before the jury, and it was a question for them.

[4] IV. Point 4:

"Our fifth, sixth, seventh, fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth exceptions all make the point that it was error for his honor, the circuit judge, to instruct the jury that they might find a verdict for actual damages against the railway company without finding a verdict for the same amount, or any part thereof, against the servants of the company, parties to the cause before the court, for whose conduct the railway company is held liable, and also that in finding for punitive damages they might find a larger amount against the railway company than against its servants who caused the injury."

[5] Where a servant is united with the master in an action for damages for tort, and the allegation and proof shows that the tort complained of was the tort of this servant alone, then a verdict against the master alone cannot stand, because, if this servant did not commit the tort complained of, then there was no tort, and a verdict against the master alone cannot stand. If, however, other servants are involved, the jury may find that the tort was committed by other servants and find against the master alone, and a verdict against the master alone can stand.

There was evidence that the flagman, who gave the signal to proceed, was told that there was a sick lady to go on that train. There was also evidence that those in charge of the transportation at the head office were notified, and they gave no assistance and held out no effective hope of relief. A larger amount was given against the railway than against the station master and the railway conductor. The latter had only a few minutes consideration to determine what to do. The former had ample time, and the only relief they offered was the one they must have known would prove ineffectual. The transportation department had ample opportunity to learn the exact status and the danger of a delay, yet did nothing to relieve the situation. The jury might have concluded that injury to the plaintiff might have been temporary only, if relief had been given within a reasonable time, but that the long delay produced the injury that, according to some of the testimony, proved to be permanent. It is one spirit that does a wrong and another to refuse to make reasonable effort to avoid the consequences of the wrong already done.

The difference in the amount of the verdicts is not legal ground to set them aside.

[6] V. Point 5:

"That on the motion for a new trial his honor the presiding judge should have held that there was no notice brought home to the railroad company before the train had left Fairfax that the plaintiff Mrs. Spigener was suffering from any special or peculiar condition; and that there was no evidence of any damages suffered from other cause except from her special and peculiar condition, and therefore the verdict should have been set aside."

There was evidence that they had notice enough after the train left, and while they might still have given relief, and did not do so.

[7] VI. Point 6:

"That there was no evidence of willfulness, wantonness, recklessness, or gross negligence on the part of the agents and servants of the Seaboard Air Line Railway, and that the verdict for $5,000 punitive damages should have been set aside, and was, moreover, excessive."

The amount of the verdict was a question for the circuit judge. Enough has been said to show that there was abundant evidence of a willful tort.

[8] VII. Point 7:

"Because, upon the motion for a new trial, his honor, the circuit judge, should have held that the counsel for the Pullman Company so addressed the jury as to unfairly prejudice them against the Seaboard Air Line Railway, and should have set aside the verdict for that reason."

There was no objection made at the hearing, and it was too late afterwards.

The judgment is affirmed.

STATE v. STONE. (No. 10170.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 25, 1919.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE §304 — ABANDONMENT OF WIFE.

Where a husband abandons his wife, destroys his home, and provides no other place for her, his failure to supply her with necessities at the place where circumstances compel her to live constitutes a violation of Cr. Code 1912, § 697, making inexcusable abandonment a misdemeanor.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §108(1)—VENUE OF PROSECUTION—ABANDONMENT OF WIFE.

Where a husband by his conduct compels his wife to leave him, and she, of necessity, seeks a home in another county, his prosecution for failure to support in violation of Cr. Code 1912, § 697, was properly instituted in such other county.

Hydrick, J., dissenting.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Lexington County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Defendant Frank Stone was indicted for abandoning his wife, Eva Stone. Defendant's motion to dismiss was granted, and the State appeals. Judgment reversed.

George B. Timmerman, of Lexington, for the State.

C. B. Sawyer, of Aiken, and C. M. Eflrd, of Lexington, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The respondent, Frank Stone, was indicted under section 697, Criminal Code of South Carolina, for abandoning and failing to supply the actual necessities of life to his wife, Eva Stone. The section is:

"Misdemeanor for Husband to Fail to Support Wife and Children.—Any able-bodied man who shall, without just cause or excuse, abandon or fail to supply the actual necessities of life to his wife or to his minor, unmarried child or children dependent upon him, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year, or be liable to a fine not exceeding two hundred dollars: Provided, that if he, either before or after conviction, shall give bond, with one or more sureties, approved by the clerk of the court, in the sum of not less than $300, conditioned upon his supporting and maintaining his said wife or said minor unmarried child or children, he shall not be imprisoned or the fine imposed until the condition of said bond is broken."

The defendant and his wife lived together for a short time only. Stone lives in Aiken county, near the Lexington county line, and was married there. His wife, before her marriage, lived with her father in Lexington county. On account of the disagreement between them, Stone left his home in Aiken county and told his wife he did not intend to live with her any longer. He sent to the house and had it stripped of everything, even the stove and cooking utensils which she was using at the time to prepare her dinner. Having nowhere else to go, Mrs. Stone went across the county line to live with her father.

The evidence tends to show that Stone has not returned, nor offered to return, to his wife, or to provide a home for her anywhere, and avows his intention not to do so.

The indictment in this case was given out in Lexington county. The defendant moved to dismiss the proceedings, on the ground that the court of general sessions of Lexington county was without jurisdiction to try the case, because the offense, if any, was committed in Aiken county.

The presiding judge held that the court in Lexington county was without jurisdiction and dismissed the case. From this ruling the state appealed.

[1, 2] Abandonment may be one act, or a continuing act, according to circumstances. The offense is made by the statute a continuing offense. While it is ordinarily true that a husband is only required to furnish the necessities of life at his place of residence, yet, if he destroys his home and provides no other place where she can live, then, from the necessity of the case, she must live where she can live, and the place where she can live is the place where he must provide for her. Mrs. Stone found a home in Lexington county and it was his failure to supply the necessities in Lexington that was a violation of the statute.

The judgment is reversed.

CREED v. NATIONAL FIRE INS. CO., OF HARTFORD, CONN. (No. 10165.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 22, 1919.)

INSURANCE §213 — FIRE INSURANCE—ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY—RIGHT OF ASSIGNOR.

Where policy insured plaintiff's house for $800, and his personalty for $700, and plaintiff, after he sold the house, assigned his interest "as owner of property covered," he could not recover for loss of personalty, although he was admittedly still the owner of the personalty.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Kershaw County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by J. E. Creed against the National Fire Insurance Company, of Hartford, Conn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

John M. Robinson, of Charlotte, and Douglas McKay, of Columbia, for appellant.

L. A. Wittkowsky, of Camden, for respondent.

GAGE, J. Action on a policy of insurance against loss by fire; verdict for the plaintiff; appeal by the defendant. There are five exceptions, but if one fundamental issue of law shall be determined for the defendant, that ends the cause.

Creed had a house, and in it personal property. He made a contract with the National Fire Insurance Company, whereby, for a single premium of $36 paid by Creed to the company, the company insured against loss by fire the house for $800, and the personal property for $700. Creed sold the house, and assigned to his vendee the contract of insurance and in these words:

"The interest of J. E. Creed as owner of property covered by this policy is hereby assigned to Camden Wholesale Grocery Company subject to the consent of the National Fire Insurance Company, of Hartford.

"Dated December 17, 1912. J. E. Creed."

The company consented to the assignment and in these words:

"The National Fire Insurance Company, of Hartford, hereby consent that the interest of J. E. Creed, as owner of the property covered by this policy, be assigned to Camden Wholesale Grocery Company.

"Dated Dec. 17, 1912. J. A. McCaskell."

The circuit court was of the opinion that if Creed was owner of the personal property when the fire burnt it, then he ought to recover on the contract.

It is admitted in the case that Creed was owner of the personalty; and his counsel contended before us that no fact was in issue, and that court ought to have directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The issue of law therefore is, does that fact, under the contract he made and under the assignment of the contract, entitle him to recover? It is a question of contract; the parties' rights and liabilities are fixed by the contract.

For $36 the company agreed to pay Creed $800 for the house and $700 for the personalty in the event of loss by fire.

It is true that had Creed not assigned the policy, then, in the event the house had not been burned, but the personalty had been burned, then in that event, Creed might recover for the loss of the personalty; the contract, by necessary construction, so reads. But when Creed assigned the policy he assigned his whole contract; the word of the assignment so expressly run, and there is no pretense that he intended to do otherwise.

The testimony is not that Creed reserved or intended to reserve for himself so much of the contract as related to personalty, but only that he did not sell the personalty when he sold the house. Creed had at the time of the fire no contract with the company, and he therefore has now no right to recover.

A verdict for the defendant ought to have been directed, and must yet be.

SOTILLE v. STOKES. (No. 10166.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 22, 1919.)

1. SALES §348(1)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where defendant purchased a defective automobile on the agreement of the seller to repair same, and the seller sues for the price, the buyer is entitled to a deduction of the cost of repairs which the seller failed to make.

2. DAMAGES §40(1) — LOSS OF PROFITS — SPECULATIVE PROFITS.

There can be no recovery for lost profits for interference with business, where such profits are entirely speculative.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by Santo Sotille, doing business as the Sotille-Cadillac Company, against A. M. Stokes. From a verdict and judgment for the defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Nettles & Tobias, of Columbia, for appellant. James S. Verner, of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action by the plaintiff to recover judgment on three promissory notes, aggregating $500, given for the credit portion of the purchase money of a Cadillac automobile. The defendant set up that the automobile was unfit for use, and asked a rescission of the contract of sale and damages for a breach of warranty. At the trial the defendant was required to elect as to whether he would rely on rescission or breach of warranty, and he elected to rely on breach of warranty. At the close of the testimony, the plaintiff moved for a nonsuit as to breach of warranty. This motion was refused. The jury found the following verdict:

"We find for the defendant five hundred ($500.00) dollars."

Under the instructions of the court, that canceled the notes, gave the automobile to the defendant, and a judgment against the plaintiff for $500. The court reduced the verdict to $150.

There is no dispute as to the cardinal facts of the case. There was a charge of fraud in the answer, but there was no evidence to sustain it. Indeed the defendant said on the witness stand:

"Q. You do not think Mr. Smith [the sales agent] tried to deceive you, do you? A. I do not think so."

The court calls attention of litigants to a too free use of the charges of fraud. Fraud should not be charged, unless there is proof of fraud, and not even then, unless fraud is necessary to a just decision of the cause.

In this case the defendant said:

"I was going to buy a car. I went round, and he had this car. I asked him what he wanted for it, and he said he wanted $1,000 for it, and so we talked it over a little bit and took it out and tried it, and it would not pull. It skipped and was going on; you know how they do. He said the car was not in good shape to sell, and it would have to be overhauled thoroughly; it needed new blocks and pistons. And we brought it back to the shop and left it there. He said he could get it ready in about ten days or two weeks for me. I told him 'All right,' and he required me to put up $100. Smith said the car needed overhauling. The car had been used a lot, and it needed a general overhauling. He said for $1,000 he would put the car in first-class condition."

[1] Smith, the sales agent for the plaintiff, said:

"Stokes and I tested the power of the car. It was very bad. * * * I told him I would put it in good condition. I agreed to get those parts and put them into the car and turn it over to him, running properly and working as it should."

So it seems that the parties, after inspection, agreed upon the purchase and sale of a defective car, and the defendant relied upon a contract to repair the car, and that there was no warranty that it was in good condition. It seems that the car is not yet in good condition.

There are several exceptions, but they need not be discussed separately. The whole case has been tried upon a wrong theory, and in order that justice may be done the case will have to go back for a new trial.

The case of Thompson v. Sexton, 15 S. C. 93, is very similar in principle to this case. The rule, as to the measure of damages, is stated on page 96 as follows:

"The testimony shows that the defendant agreed to give a certain price for the gin, knowing at the time of the defect in it, and relied upon the agreement of the plaintiff to have such defect repaired. If the plaintiff failed to do so, then all that the defendant could require would be to be allowed a discount for so much as such repairs would cost, and the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment for the balance of the price agreed upon, whether that price be larger or smaller than what the jury might believe the article was really worth. Suppose the parties had fixed upon $150 as the value of the gin with the defect repaired, and that the cost of such repairs would be $10, then, according to the contract, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover the difference—$140. But if the jury, as they may have done under the charge of the judge, substituted their own estimate of the value of the gin for that agreed upon by the parties, and, adopting the views of some of the witnesses, had fixed the value at $50, then the plaintiff could only recover $40."

[2] There is no basis for lost profits in this case. The defendant said he would sometimes take in $100 per week, of which about half was profits, and then he said, "Sometimes there is mighty little net profits to me." The profits were speculative entirely.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

CARRIERS \Leftrightarrow 100(3)—DEMURRAGE CHARGES—
REFUSAL TO PAY—SALE OF SHIPMENT.

A shipper held not entitled to recover value of lumber sold by terminal carrier to pay freight and demurrage charges, where new consignee to whom plaintiff shipper directed initial carrier to divert shipments defaulted in giving instructions, and where instructions finally received gave notice that no demurrage charges would be paid after a certain day.

Gary, C. J., and Watts, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Clarendon County; Frank B. Gary, Judge.

Action by F. C. Thomas against the Northwestern Railroad Company of South Carolina and another. Motion for directed verdict denied, and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company appeals. Judgment reversed.

Mordecai & Gadsden & Rutledge, of Charleston, and Purdy & O'Bryan, of Manning, for appellant.

Charlton Durant and W. C. Davis, both of Manning, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action to recover the value of three carloads of lumber delivered to the defendants railroad companies, which were sold by the appellant to pay freight and demurrage charges.

There are several exceptions raising interesting questions of interstate commerce law, yet, in the view the majority of this court takes in regard to this case, they are unnecessary to a decision, and need not be considered.

At the close of the testimony the appellant moved for a direction of a verdict in its favor, on the plaintiff's cause of action, but did not include the counterclaim. A short statement of the facts will show that the motion should have been granted.

On the 13th of May, 1916, the plaintiff shipped three carloads of lumber to Bay Lumber Company, Norfolk, Va. He delivered the cars to the Northwestern Railroad Company at Bloomville, S. C., and the Northwestern delivered the cars to the Atlantic Coast Line at Sumter. The cars went forward promptly to Norfolk. A few days later the plaintiff notified the Northwestern to divert the cars to Barker Bond Lumber Company of Brooklyn, N. Y., "who would furnish directions."

The record contains a letter from the Barker Bond Lumber Company that reads as follows:

Exhibit D—Telegram: "New York 530 pm 26 F. C. Thomas, Manning, S. C.

"We gave forwarding orders on three cars two by ten May thirty first to NYP & N agt Norfolk. If cars still on hand Southern Road you should order forward as we assume you had ordered cars to us NYP&N delivery. You better order forward Flatbush Station, Brooklyn to avoid further delay.

"Barker Bond Lbr. Co. 7pm"

There is nothing in the record to show that the Atlantic Coast Line ever received these instructions. Up to the 29th of June there was no evidence in the record to show that the Northwestern had received any shipping instructions, and when they were received it was accompanied with notice that no demurrage charges would be paid after May 31st. The Coast Line held the cars until some time in the fall of the year, when they were sold for demurrage and freight charges. The plaintiff complains that he was not notified that the cars were being held and he thought they had been delivered. Practically the plaintiff ordered the Coast Line to hold the lumber for instructions. The plaintiff appointed the new consignee his agent to furnish the shipping instructions. The default was the default of the plaintiff through his agent for that purpose, and not the default of either defendant.

It needs no citation of authority to show that the Coast Line could not have remitted any of the freight or demurrage charges without incurring the penalty for discrimination.

The verdict should have been directed, and the judgment is reversed.

HYDRICK and GAGE, JJ., concur.

GARY, C. J. (dissenting). This is an action for damages. The complaint (omitting the formal parts thereof) is as follows:

"III. That on or about the 15th day of May, 1916, the plaintiff delivered to the defendant Northwestern Railroad Company of South Carolina at Bloomville, S. C., three cars of lumber, the property of the plaintiff, and of the aggregate value of four hundred and fifty-two and $\frac{21}{100}$ dollars, consigned to Bay Lumber Company at Norfolk, Va., which the said defendant received and agreed to deliver to the said consignee at Norfolk, Va., in consideration of the payment of its usual freight charges.

"IV. That during the transit of the said three cars of lumber, the plaintiff ordered the defendant Northwestern Railroad Company of South Carolina to divert the said three cars of lumber from the Bay Lumber Company at Norfolk, Va., to Barker-Bond Lumber Company, Brooklyn, N. Y., and the defendant Northwestern Railroad Company of South Carolina agreed to so divert the said three cars of lumber, and to deliver them to their new consignee at Brooklyn, N. Y., in consideration of the additional freight charges for such service, and plaintiff is informed and believes that the defendant

Northwestern Railroad Company of South Carolina diverted the said three cars of lumber as directed while in the possession of the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, the last-mentioned company agreeing to such diversion, and undertaking to perform its duty in that behalf.

"V. That notwithstanding such agreement of diversion and to forward to their new consignee the plaintiff's said lumber, the defendants so negligently conducted themselves in that behalf that the said three cars of lumber were never forwarded to the new agreed consignee, but, according to plaintiff's information and belief, were allowed to remain upon demurrage at Norfolk, Va., without any notice to the plaintiff or his new consignee, until about the 3d of June, 1916, and thereafter plaintiff and his consignee repeatedly endeavored to have the cars forwarded as agreed upon, and plaintiff is informed and believes, permitted the said cars to remain upon demurrage in possession of the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, until the value of the said lumber was exhausted by such charges, and were sold in November, 1916, to satisfy the same, to plaintiff's great damage four hundred and fifty-two and $\frac{1}{100}$ dollars."

The defendant Northwestern Railroad Company admitted that it received for shipment the three cars of lumber set out in the complaint, and denied the other material allegations thereof.

"The appellant, the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, denied that it agreed to divert the shipment of lumber, and alleged that it sold the same in due accordance with law for accumulated freight and demurrage charges, and further alleged that even had it agreed to divert the lumber, such diversion would have been improper and illegal, and in violation of its legal duty under its duly filed tariffs, as filed in accordance with the federal Interstate Commerce Act, and set up and invoked the protection and benefit of such federal acts; and set up as a counterclaim the deficit of the proceeds of the sale of the lumber, and the accumulated charges, and demanded judgment for $202.32."

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $452.31; also a special verdict that, as between the two defendants, it should be paid by the appellant.

There was a motion for the direction of a verdict, but it was properly overruled, as there was testimony tending to prove the allegations of the complaint that the appellant failed to give such notice as was required under the circumstances.

Conceding that a diversion of the shipment, as alleged in the complaint, would have been in violation of the regulations under the federal laws (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 379), this would not, however, be conclusive of the case.

The question upon which the case turns is whether the appellant had the right to keep the cars in its possession for an unreasonable length of time without giving notice to the plaintiff that it refused to divert the cars, and that they were still in its possession, thereby subjecting the plaintiff to a demurrage account, exceeding in amount the total value of the lumber by $202.32.

We do not deem it necessary to cite authorities to sustain a proposition that shows upon its face that it is against justice and equity.

Even if his honor, the circuit judge, was in error in some of his rulings, they were not prejudicial to the rights of the appellant. For these reasons I dissent.

3. JUDGMENT \S 780(3) — LIEN — VENDOR'S EXECUTORY INTEREST.

Judgment rendered against vendor subsequent to parol contract of sale, but prior to actual conveyance, is entitled to be paid out of purchase-money mortgage executed as part of consideration of conveyance.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by J. L. Mimnaugh against Carrie E. Baker and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

The following are the exceptions:

I. His honor, the presiding judge, erred in finding as a matter of fact that the terms of sale between M. A. Evans and Carrie E. Baker was as follows, to wit: "$200 on plaintiff's mortgage, $500 cash on delivery of deed, and balance of $2,800, to be evidenced by her bond payable six months after date, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, payable monthly, and secured by her purchase money mortgage," there being no testimony to support any such terms as "$500 cash on delivery of deed," in particular.

II. His honor erred in deciding that the purchase was not concluded until April 20, 1916, on the payment of $500, when a deed was given by appellant; whereas, as a matter of law, the purchase was concluded February 27, 1916, when M. A. Evans and appellant reached an agreement as to the sale of the property, and under said agreement the purchaser was given immediate possession of the property and made valuable improvements thereon.

III. His honor erred in finding and concluding that Carrie E. Baker was not the head of a family and not entitled to homestead exemption; the error being in finding, contrary to the evidence and law, that appellant's sister and nieces had not become a part of her household, in that appellant had not adopted the nieces, whom she had supported and educated, and because the said nieces had not "severed their relations to the family in which they were born."

N. J. Frederick, of Columbia, for appellant.

Melton & Belser, of Columbia, for respondent.

GAGE, J. Action to foreclose a mortgage for $200 on land. The mortgage was made to Mimnaugh by Baker. Subsequent to the execution of the mortgage Baker conveyed the land to Evans for $3,500, to liquidate which debt:

Evans was to pay the Mimnaugh mortgage	$ 200.00
Cash to Baker	500.00
Bond and mortgage to Baker	2,800.00
	<hr/>
	$3,500.00

The first item was not paid; hence this action. The second item was paid. The bond and mortgage were executed, and on the same day assigned to Washington.

[1] Evans and Baker at the outstart made parol contract to buy and sell, and Evans went into possession, and so became the owner of an equitable title to the land. A few months thereafter the parol contract was performed as before stated. Betwixt these two dates, the day of the parol contract and the day of its performance, Mimnaugh got a judgment against Baker. The judgment debt is the chief matter now in issue; there is no issue about the mortgage debt.

The defendants are Baker, Evans, and Washington. The circuit court held, inter alia, that the bond and mortgage for $2,800 was liable to pay the Mimnaugh judgment debt, and that Baker had no homestead right in the subject-matter of the action. The defendant Baker has appealed; the defendants Evans and Washington have abided the decree of the circuit court.

Let the three exceptions of Baker be reported.

[2] The first and second exceptions are irrelevant; they make inconsequential issues.

[3] Granting that the parol agreement, before referred to, and the entry of Evans on the property thereunder, constituted Evans the holder of the equitable title, and that the Mimnaugh judgment, gotten betwixt the two events, did not operate to effect a lien on the legal title before it passed from Baker to Evans, yet the judgment is entitled to be paid out of the $2,800 purchase-money mortgage. Adicks v. Lowry, 15 S. C. 135. Besides that, Washington does not object; Evans does not object; and Baker cannot object, for she sold all her interest in the bond and mortgage to Washington.

The third exception has to do with an imagined homestead exemption claimed by Baker. But there cannot be an exemption, unless there be a res to be exempted. So far as the record shows, Baker has no property in sight which is the object of the tentacles of the judgment lien.

It is said, though, that she had a right to transfer the judgment to Washington freed from the judgment lien. But she is not interested in that issue, and Washington does not make the question.

Decree affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COURTS \Leftrightarrow 189(1)—CITY COURT OF BOSTON—TRIAL OF DISTRESS WARRANT PROCEEDINGS.

Under the act creating the city court of Boston (Acts 1914, p. 194), a counter affidavit filed to a distress warrant properly returned to that court is triable at the first term thereafter.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. COURTS \Leftrightarrow 189(1)—CITY COURT OF BOSTON—TRIAL OF DISTRESS WARRANT—PROCEDURE.

Acts 1914, p. 194, creating city of Boston and adopting procedure of superior court "except as otherwise provided," silent as to trial of distress warrant proceedings, but by section 7, making all civil cases returnable to first regular term convening 20 days or more after filing of case, and, if a defense is filed, to next term, does not set up a different rule of procedure from that of superior court.

Certified questions from Court of Appeals.

Distress warrant proceedings between F. A. Davis and G. W. Williams, with counter affidavits. Two questions certified by Court of Appeals. First question answered in the affirmative, and second question answered in the negative.

Clifford E. Hay, of Thomasville, for plaintiff in error.

J. U. Merritt and W. I. MacIntyre, both of Thomasville, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. The Court of Appeals desires instructions from the Supreme Court upon the following questions in this case:

"(1) Where a distress warrant is issued and foreclosed, and the defendant files a counter affidavit and bond, all of which are properly returned for the issues thus made to be tried in the city court under the same rules as govern in the superior court, does this issue stand for trial at the term of the city court immediately succeeding the return, irrespective of the length of the period intervening between the date of the return and the commencement of the term?

"(2) The act of the General Assembly creating the city court of Boston adopts the rules and regulations governing the trial of cases in the superior court, 'except as otherwise provided.' It contains nothing relative to the trial of issues made in distress warrant proceedings, but section 7 of the act provides as follows: 'All civil cases shall be returnable for trial to the first regular quarterly term of said court convening twenty days or more, after the filing or docketing of the case. * * * If a defense is filed, * * * then the case shall go to the next regular quarterly term as the trial term.' Does the provision just quoted have the effect of setting up a different rule of procedure in the trial of such an issue than the one obtaining in the superior court?" Laws 1914, p. 198.

[1, 2] As to defenses to distress warrants, the Civil Code, § 5391, provides:

"The party distrained may in all cases replevy the property so distrained, by making oath that the sum, or some part thereof, distrained for is not due, and give security for the eventual condemnation money; and in such case the levying officer shall return the same to the court having cognizance thereof, which shall be tried by a jury as provided for in the trial of claims: Provided, that when the levying officer retains possession of the property of the tenant levied on, it shall not be necessary to give the bond for the eventual condemnation money."

As to statutory claims, section 5167 declares:

"When an execution issued from the superior court shall be levied upon personal property, and claimed by a person not a party to such execution, as provided in this Code, it shall be the duty of the levying officer to return the same, together with the execution, to the next term of the court from which said execution issued; but should such execution be levied upon real property, and the same shall be claimed in the manner aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the officer making the levy to return the same, together with the execution and claim, to the next term of the superior court of the county in which the land so levied upon shall lie."

It appears therefore from the code sections quoted that, where a counter affidavit returnable to the superior court is made to a distress warrant which has been levied, the papers making an issue therein shall be returned to the next term of the superior court, and then tried, unless continued for cause. Under the act creating the city court of Boston, the rules and regulations governing the trial of cases in the superior court are adopted, "except as otherwise provided." The provision in the act to the effect that "all civil cases shall be returnable for trial to the first regular quarterly term of said court convening twenty days or more after the filing or docketing of the case. * * * If a defense is filed, * * * then the case shall go to the next regular quarterly term as the trial term"—the language just quoted is applicable to civil cases brought by ordinary petition, and not to issues made by counter affidavit where a distress warrant has been levied.

Accordingly we hold, without misgiving, that the first question propounded should be answered in the affirmative, and that the second question should be answered in the negative.

Section 20 of the act of the General Assembly approved March 28, 1917 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1917, pp. 7, 16), which provides for the condemnation and sale of "all vehicles and conveyances of every kind and description which are used on any of the public roads or private ways of this state, and all boats and vessels of every kind and description which are used in any of the waters of this state in conveying any liquors or beverages, the sale or possession of which is prohibited by law," is not unconstitutional on the grounds (a) that it is violative of the due process clauses of the state and federal Constitutions (Const. Ga., art. 1, § 1, par. 3 [Civ. Code 1910, § 6359]; Const. U. S. Amend. 14, § 1); (b) that it is violative of the provision of the Constitution of Georgia (article 1, § 2, par. 8 [Civ. Code 1910, § 6384]) which declares that "no conviction shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture of estate"; (c) that it is violative of the Constitution of this state (article 1, § 4, par. 1 [Civ. Code 1910, § 6391]), which declares that no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision is made by an existing general law; (d) that it authorized the taking and damaging of private property for public purpose without just and adequate compensation being first paid (article 1, § 3, par. 1 [Civ. Code 1910, § 6388]); (e) that it is in conflict with the constitutional provision (article 1, § 1, par. 9 [Civ. Code 1910, § 6365]) which prohibits excessive fines and cruel and unusual punishments.

The proceeding authorized by section 20 of the act in question (Acts [Ex. Sess.] 1917, p. 16) is one in rem, "against the offending thing, and not against the offending owner."

(a) It is not decided that the solicitor of the court having jurisdiction had not legal capacity to institute condemnation proceedings in his name as solicitor; but it is suggested that the proceeding, in the nature of an information, should properly be brought in the name of the state.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇨81—POLICE POWER—DISCRETION OF LEGISLATURE.

A large discretion is necessarily vested in the Legislature to determine what the interests of the public require, and what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests.

5. INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⇨17, 18, 21 — PROHIBITION OF MANUFACTURE AND SALE—PENALTIES.

A state has the right to prohibit or restrict the manufacture of intoxicating liquors within its limits, and to prohibit all sale and traffic therein in the state, and to inflict penalties for such manufacture and sale, and provide regulations for the abatement as a common nuisance of property used for such forbidden purposes.

6. INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⇨20—UNLAWFUL TRANSPORTATION.

The state, in the exercise of its police power, may adopt any means reasonably necessary and not unduly oppressive upon the individual to prevent the transportation of liquors, such as the condemnation of a vehicle used in such transportation.

7. ACTION ⇨16—PROCEEDING "IN REM."

A proceeding "in rem" is in effect a proceeding against the owner, as well as a proceeding against the goods, for it is his breach of the law which has to be proven to establish the forfeiture, and it is his property which is sought to be forfeited.

Error from City Court of Albany; Clayton Jones, Judge.

Proceeding by Cruger Westbrook, Solicitor, against Robert Mack, for the condemnation of an automobile used in transporting liquors contrary to the prohibition law. Demurrer to proceeding overruled. From a judgment condemning the automobile, Mack excepts and brings error. Affirmed.

Peacock & Gardner and Pottle & Hofmayer, all of Albany, for plaintiff in error.

Cruger Westbrook, Sol., of Albany, pro se.

GEORGE J. Robert Mack was arrested by the sheriff of Dougherty county while in the act of transporting twelve quarts of whisky, in a certain Ford automobile, along the public streets of the city of Albany. The automobile was also seized by the sheriff. Mack entered a plea of guilty to the accusation preferred against him in the city court of Albany, which in terms charged that he did "have, possess, and transport whisky, in violation of the prohibition laws of said state," in said county of Dougherty. The sheriff reported the seizure of the automobile to the solicitor of the city court of Albany, who in turn filed a proceeding to condemn the automobile under section 20 of the prohibition law of 1917 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1917, pp. 7, 16). After declaring to be contraband all apparatus or appliances used for the purposes of distilling or manufacturing any of the liquors specified in the act, and providing for the summary destruction of the same when found or discovered by any arresting officer, the section reads as follows:

"All vehicles and conveyances of every kind and description which are used on any of the public roads or private ways of this state, and all boats and vessels of every kind and description which are used in any of the waters of this state in conveying any liquors or beverages, the sale or possession of which is prohibited by law, shall be seized by any sheriff or other arresting officer, who shall report the same to the solicitor of the county, city or superior court having jurisdiction in the county where the seizure was made, whose duty it shall be within ten days from the time he receives said notice to institute condemnation proceedings in said court by petition, a copy of which shall be served upon the owner or lessee if known, and if the owner or lessee is unknown notice of such proceedings shall be published once a week for two weeks in the newspaper in which the sheriff's advertisements are published. If no defense is filed within thirty days from the filing of the petition, judgment by default shall be entered by the court at chambers, otherwise the case shall proceed as other civil cases in said court. Should it appear upon the trial of the case that said vehicle, conveyance, boat or vessel was so used with the knowledge of the owner or lessee, the same shall be sold by order of the court, after such advertisement as the court may direct. The proceeds arising from said sale shall be applied as follows: (a) To the payment of the expenses in said cause, including the expenses incurred in the seizure. (b) One-third of the remainder to the officer making the seizure and furnishing the proof. (c) To the payment of the costs of the court, which shall be the same as now allowed by law in cases of forfeiture or recognizance. (d) The remainder, if any, shall be paid into the county treasury to be held as a separate fund to be paid out under order of the court as insolvent costs in other cases arising from the violation of any of the provisions of this article: Provided, that in any county of this state in which any of the officers of either the county, city or superior courts are now on a salary, or hereafter placed on a salary, such remainder of the funds applicable to the payment of insolvent costs of such officer or officers shall be retained in the general fund of, and become the property of such county."

Mack did not answer the proceeding to forfeit, but demurred thereto upon grounds hereinafter indicated. The demurrer was overruled, and judgment was rendered condemning the property as provided in section 20 of the act. Mack excepted.

[1, 3, 4] 1. "The extent and limits of what is known as the police power have been a fruitful subject of discussion in the appellate courts of nearly every state in the Union. It is universally conceded to include everything essential to the public safety, health, and morals, and to justify the destruction or abatement, by summary proceedings, of whatever may be regarded as a public nuisance." Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 136, 14 Sup. Ct. 499, 38 L. Ed. 385. A large discretion is necessarily vested in the Legislature to determine (a) what the interests of the public require, and (b) what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests. Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 9 Sup. Ct. 6, 32 L. Ed. 346. In Lawton v. Steele, supra, it was said:

"To justify the state in thus interposing its authority in behalf of the public, it must appear, first, that the interests of the public generally, as distinguished from those of a particular class, require such interference; and, second, that the means are reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose, and not unduly oppressive upon individuals."

Since the Legislature may not arbitrarily interfere with private business, or impose unusual or unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations, it follows that—

"Its determination as to what is a proper exercise of its police powers is not final or conclusive, but is subject to the supervision of the courts."

[5] Since the decision in the case of Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 8 Sup. Ct. 273, 31 L. Ed. 205, it has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States:

That "a state has the right to prohibit or restrict the manufacture of intoxicating liquors within her limits, to prohibit all sale and traffic in them in said state, to inflict penalties for such manufacture and sale, and to provide regulations for the abatement as a common nuisance of the property used for such forbidden purposes, and that such legislation * * * does not abridge the liberties or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor deprive any person of property without due process of law, nor * * * contravene the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States." Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 9 Sup. Ct. 6, 32 L. Ed. 346; United States v. Knight, 156 U. S. 1, 15 Sup. Ct. 249, 39 L. Ed. 325.

This court has steadily recognized the right of the state, under the police power to regulate, restrict, or forbid the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors. In the opinion in the case of Henderson v. Heyward, 109 Ga. 373, 34 S. E. 590, 47 L. R. A. 366, 77 Am. St. Rep. 384, it was said:

"It would seem to follow that the state might enact any law which would effectually prohibit the traffic" in intoxicating liquors.

In Delaney v. Plunkett, 146 Ga. 547, 91 S. E. 561, L. R. A. 1917D, 926, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 685 (3), this court upheld the right of the state, under its police power, to prohibit the keeping of intoxicating liquors at all in certain places or in excess of certain quantities at any place, as well as their manufacture and sale within the state. It was there ruled:

"The qualities of property theretofore existing in them [intoxicating liquors] were taken away, and it was competent for the Legislature to declare that they should be seized, condemned, and destroyed, upon order of the judge of the court having jurisdiction."

See, in the same connection, Barbour v. State, 146 Ga. 667, 92 S. E. 70; Bunger v. State, 146 Ga. 673, 92 S. E. 72; Howell v. Mathieson, 146 Ga. 838, 92 S. E. 520.

Under section 1 of the act approved March 28, 1917 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1917, p. 7), it is provided that "it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, corporation, firm or individual to transport, ship or carry, by any means, whatsoever, * * * from any point without this state to any point within this state, or from place to place within this state," any intoxicating or prohibited liquors. The demurrer in this case does not call in question the validity of section 1 of the act from which we have quoted. The attack is upon the constitutionality of section 20 of the act.

[6] If the state, in the valid exercise of the police power, may declare it unlawful and illegal for any person to transport, ship, or carry whisky by any means whatsoever from any point without this state to any point within this state, and from place to place within this state, it necessarily follows that the state may, in the exercise of its police power, adopt any means reasonably necessary, and not unduly oppressive upon the individual, to prevent the transportation of such whisky. Crane v. Campbell, 245 U. S. 304, 38 Sup. Ct. 98, 99, 62 L. Ed. 304. Such liquors cannot reasonably be brought from without to a point within this state, nor carried from point to point within the state, without the use of some vehicle or conveyance of some kind or description. The power to prohibit the transportation of liquors is conceded, at least in this case; and it would seem to follow, as a necessary conclusion, that the forfeiture of the vehicles used in the transportation of such liquors upon the public highways, private ways, and waters of this state is a measure reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose; and we are unwilling to say that the means adopted as applied in this case are unduly oppressive. Inanimate property may, without violence to the due process clauses of the state or federal Constitutions, be forfeited to the state when used as an instrument, and a necessary instrument, in the accomplishment of a purpose declared by the state, within the exercise of its undoubted power, to be unlawful. See Smith v. Maryland, 18 How. 71, 15 L. Ed. 269, where it was held that the state of Maryland had a right to protect its fisheries in Chesapeake Bay, by making it unlawful to take or catch oysters with a scoop or drag, and to inflict the penalty of forfeiture upon the vessel employed in this pursuit. It is true that the express purpose of the law considered in Smith v. Maryland was to prevent the destruction of oysters by the use of particular instruments in taking them. We cannot think this point has a controlling bearing upon the question presented in the instant case. Under our statute the transportation of whiskey into the state, or from point to point within the state, is absolutely prohibited, regardless of the means employed. The Legislature, however, recognized the necessity of the employment of some means in the transportation of such liquors, and provided for the condemnation and sale of any vehicle when so used for such purpose upon the public highways, private ways, or waters of this state. In Dobbins Distillery v. United States, 96 U. S. 395, 24 L. Ed. 637, it was held that—

"Where the owner of a distillery and other property connected therewith leased them for the purpose of distilling, the acts or omissions of the lessee in carrying on the business of distilling while he was in possession, and with intent to defraud the revenue, although they are unknown to the owner, subject the distillery and such other property to forfeiture to the United States."

The case of Lawton v. Steele, supra, involved the constitutionality of an act of the Legislature of the state of New York, which in terms declared it unlawful for any person to take from certain waters within the state "any fish of any kind by any device or means whatever otherwise than by hook and line or rod held in hand." The act further provided that "any net, pound, or other means or device for taking or capturing fish, * * * had, found, or maintained in or upon any of the waters of the state," should be summarily destroyed by any person. The Supreme Court of the United States declared that the act was constitutional, and that it did not deprive the citizen of his property without due process of law, in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, although no notice or opportunity to be heard was afforded the owner of the net or device. In the opinion it is pointed out that it is not easy to draw the line between cases "where property illegally used may be destroyed, and where judicial proceedings are necessary for its condemnation." If the article cannot be used for any lawful purpose, or if it is of such character "that the law will not recognize it as property entitled as such to the law's protection under any circumstances," it may be summarily destroyed. If the property, although used for an illegal purpose, is nevertheless capable of being used for lawful and legitimate purposes, notice and an opportunity to be heard would seem to be necessary, at least as a general rule. However, an exception to the general rule was apparently recognized in the case last above referred to, where such property was of trifling value.

In the instant case it is said that the automobile is not within itself a nuisance, but, on the contrary, is ordinarily used for lawful and legitimate purposes. This fact is by no means conclusive upon the power of the state to provide for its condemnation and sale when used as an instrument, and a necessary instrument, in the commission of an act which the Legislature has declared to be illegal; nor is the value of the property to be affected necessarily controlling upon the question. If so, the state may be denied the right to exercise the power if only the citizen be shrewd enough to employ an article of great intrinsic value in the commission of the act which the Legislature has declared to be unlawful. The value of the automobile in this case, however, is not shown; nor does it appear that the car was not regularly used for an illegal purpose. It is not insisted that the statute is violative of the due process clauses of the state or federal Constitution because it fails to provide for notice and hearing. Notice and an opportunity to be heard are, by the terms of the statute, afforded. It is, however, urged that the act cuts off all defenses "save only ignorance of the owner that the liquor was being transported," and that the owner should be given the opportunity to show that the property is intrinsically useful and valuable for some lawful purpose. That there are decisions tending to support this view we do not question. Some of them are noted in Lawton v. Steele, supra.

The statute does not undertake to declare a forfeiture of the entire estate, both real and personal, of the offender. Only the particular property employed in the accomplishment of the illegal act is declared subject to forfeiture. The proceeding provided is one in rem. The statute, therefore, is not in conflict with article 1, § 2, par. 3, of the Constitution of Georgia (Civ. Code 1910, § 6384), which provides:

"No conviction shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture of estate."

The right of one convicted of crime to inherit, hold, and transmit property is guaranteed; but this guaranty imposes no restriction upon the valid exercise by the state of the police power preserved to it in the Constitution. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. State, 135 Ga. 545, 557, 69 S. E. 725, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 20.

"Laws enacted in pursuance of police power to abate nuisances or to benefit the health of the public which may result in the destruction of private property, and which do not provide for any payment therefor to the owner, are not violative of the constitutional inhibition against taking private property for a public use without compensation." Williams v. Rivenburg, 145 App. Div. 98, 94, 129 N. Y. Supp. 473, 478.

See, also, Health Dept. v. Rector, etc., 145 N. Y. 32, 39 N. E. 833, 27 L. R. A. 710, 45 Am. St. Rep. 579; Mugler v. Kansas, supra.

Neither is the act in question violative of article 1, § 4, par. 1, of the Constitution of this state (Civ. Code 1910, § 6391), which provides that no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law; nor is it in conflict with article 1, § 1, par. 9 (Civ. Code 1910, § 6365), of the Constitution of Georgia, which declares that excessive fines shall not be imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted. These grounds of demurrer require no discussion, for reasons that are obvious.

[2, 7] 2. It is further objected in the demurrer that the present action is one in personam, whereas the proceeding authorized by the statute is "one in rem, solely against the offending thing, and not against the offending owner." As indicated above, we agree to the construction placed by the plaintiff in error upon the act; but we do not agree to his conclusion that the present action is one in personam. It is true that the owner is named in the petition, and process is prayed against him. The judgment prayed is, however, one solely in rem, for the condemnation of the automobile.

"A proceeding in rem is in effect a proceeding against the owner as well as a proceeding against the goods; for it is his breach of the law which has to be proven to establish the forfeiture, and it is his property which is sought to be forfeited." 10 Enc. U. S. R. 990; Boyd

v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 6 Sup. Ct. 524, 29 L. Ed. 746; Place v. Norwich, etc., Trans. Co., 118 U. S. 468, 6 Sup. Ct. 1150, 30 L. Ed. 134.

The judgment rendered in the proceeding was one purely in rem, no costs being taxed against the owner. This fact alone would seem to be a sufficient answer to the contention that the action cannot be converted into one in personam, because the owner would thereby be subject to a judgment for costs.

It is also objected that the plaintiff had not legal capacity to sue; that the proceeding should have been in the name of the state against "one Ford automobile." The proceeding was commenced by petition in the name of Mr. Westbrook as solicitor of the city court of Albany. The prayer was for the condemnation of the particular vehicle, as provided by statute. This is a very plain statement of the capacity in which the plaintiff sues, and could not have misled any one of common understanding. This, we think, is sufficient in the case; there being no special demurrer attacking the petition upon the ground indicated, though the point is urged in the brief. We are not called upon, therefore, to decide whether the plaintiff, in his name as solicitor of the court, had legal capacity to sue (see provisions of the act and section 5510); but we suggest that the proceeding, in the nature of an information, should properly be filed in the name of the state.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SWICORD v. CRAWFORD et al. (No. 799.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING ⚡49(4)—INSOLVENCY—SUIT AGAINST STOCKHOLDERS—SET-OFF.

In a suit brought by the receivers of an insolvent bank, chartered under the laws of Georgia since the act of 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 70), against a stockholder thereof upon his statutory individual liability to depositors of the bank (Civil Code 1910, § 2270), the defendant cannot set off the amount of his individual deposits which he had in the bank when it became insolvent and ceased to operate.

2. BANKS AND BANKING ⚡49(4)—INSOLVENCY—SUIT AGAINST STOCKHOLDERS—SET-OFF.

Nor can he set off an amount of money which, subsequently to the insolvency and closing of the bank, but prior to the commencement of such suit against him, he voluntarily paid to other depositors of the bank to reimburse them for the loss of their deposits.

FISH, C. J. The Court of Appeals desires instruction from the Supreme Court upon the following questions:

"(1) In a suit brought by the receivers of an insolvent bank, chartered under the laws of Georgia since the act of 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 70), against a stockholder thereof upon his statutory individual liability to depositors of the bank (Civil Code 1910, § 2270), is the defendant entitled to set off the amount of his own individual deposit which he had in the bank when it became insolvent and ceased to operate?"

"(2) In such a suit as is referred to in the preceding question, can the defendant set off the amount of money which, subsequently to the insolvency and the closing of the bank, but prior to the commencement of the suit against him, he voluntarily paid to other depositors of the bank, to reimburse them for the loss of their deposits?"

[1, 2] The act of the General Assembly, approved December 18, 1894 (Acts 1894, p. 76; Civil Code of 1910, §§ 2247-2250), deals with the individual charter liability of a stockholder in any bank or other corporation. Section 3 of that act (Civil Code of 1910, § 2249) declares such individual liability to be "an asset of such bank or other incorporation, to be enforced by the assignee, receiver, or other officer having the legal right to collect, marshal, and distribute the assets of such failed bank or other corporation." Stockholders in a bank incorporated under the laws of this state since the passage of the act of 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 70) are individually liable equally and ratably (and not one for another as sureties) to depositors of said corporation for all moneys deposited therein in an amount equal to the face value of their respective shares of stock. Section 2270 of the Civil Code of 1910 (codified from the act of 1893, supra) is "an implied provision in the charter of every bank incorporated in this state since the passage of the act of 1893." Crawford v. Swicord, 147 Ga. 548, 554, 94 S. E. 1025. Prior to the passage of the act of 1894, supra, the individual liability of a stockholder in a bank or other corporation, under the charter, was not considered an asset of the corporation, and the earlier decisions of this court are to the effect that an assignee or receiver of the corporation could not enforce such charter liability. Only the creditor of the corporation in whose favor such liability was created was held to have the right to assert the same. Lane v. Morris, 8 Ga. 468 (7). It necessarily followed that where a stockholder, prior to the filing of a suit against him, had voluntarily discharged debts of the corporation equal in amount to his statutory liability, he could not be compelled to pay anything more, at the instance of a creditor whose claim remained unsatisfied. Lane v. Harris, 16 Ga. 217; Robinson v. Bank of Darien, 18 Ga. 65; Jones v. Wiltberger, 42 Ga. 575. It also resulted that "a bona fide judgment debt of a stockholder against the company in which he holds stock may be set off by him in equity against a suit to make him individually liable in proportion to his stock." Boyd v. Hall, 56 Ga. 563 (2). In each of the cases cited the court, upon a construction of the particular statute involved, reached the conclusion that the liability imposed by charter upon the stockholder was not an asset of the corporation; at least this is the basis of the decision in each case. In Lamar v. Taylor, 141 Ga. 227, 235, 80 S. E. 1085, 1089, Mr. Justice Lumpkin, referring to the statutory liability of stockholders as affected by the act of 1894, said:

"We think there can be no doubt that, under the terms of this act, the right to bring suit on such liability was conferred on a receiver, where one was appointed. It did not change the fact that the recovery was for the benefit of depositors, or alter the extent of the liability; but, instead of having numerous suits to enforce the statutory liability which might exist on the part of stockholders, it provided for collecting and disbursing the recovery through one agency of the law."

To the same effect see Moore v. Ripley, 106 Ga. 556, 32 S. E. 647; Harris v. Taylor, 148 Ga. —, 98 S. E. 86. As pointed out, the act of 1894 was remedial in character, and provided for the enforcement of such statutory liability and for the disbursement of the fund thus collected in accordance with equitable principles. In other words, the statutory individual liability of stockholders to depositors in a bank, upon the insolvency of the bank, becomes a trust fund to be administered, it is true, in favor of a particular class of creditors—depositors. It results from the application of this doctrine, which must be applied to such liability in view of the act of 1894, that a stockholder, when sued by the receivers of an insolvent bank chartered under the laws of this state since the act of 1893, upon his statutory liability to depositors, cannot set off the amount of his own individual deposits which he had in the bank when it became insolvent and ceased to operate; nor can he in such suit set off the amount of money which, subsequently to the insolvency and the closing of the bank, but prior to the commencement of the suit against him, he voluntarily paid to other depositors of the bank to reimburse them for the loss of their deposits. At most he is merely subrogated to the rights of such depositors. The effect of the act of 1894, declaring such liability to be an asset of the corporation, is to cut off the right of the stockholder in a "failed" corporation to prefer one depositor above another, and therefore to deny such stockholder, who is also a depositor, the right of set-off in a suit by the receiver of such "failed bank" to enforce the statutory liability. The statutory liability of the stockholder is therefore to be considered as upon the same basis as any other asset belonging to the corporation, and must be enforced and distributed according to the equitable rules discussed above. See 2 Morse on Banks and Banking (5th Ed.) §§ 696 et seq.; 1 Bolles on Law of Banking, § 31.

HAYES v. DICKSON. (No. 968.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE — 460(4)—EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — 347, 397—ORDER OF SALE — DEFINITENESS — EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE — DEED.

The administrator upon the estate of William Walsh filed an application in the court of ordinary for leave to sell "the lands in said county belonging to said estate, which are described as follows: 245 acres, more or less, of lot of land No. 109, also 122 acres, more or less, of lot of land No. 94, in the fourth land district of Irwin county, Ga." Upon this application the ordinary granted an order authorizing the administrator to sell "the following land of said estate, to wit, 245 acres, more or less, of lot of land No. 109, also 122 acres, more or less, of lot No. 94, in the fourth land district of Irwin county, Ga." Held:

On an attack upon the sale based on such order, where it appeared that at the time of the sale the portions of the lots referred to in the order had been staked off, and that the estate was in possession thereof and was not in possession of any other lands in the district, the order of sale was sufficiently definite, and was admissible in evidence as authority to the administrator to make the sale. Civil Code 1910, § 4026; Hall v. Davis, 122 Ga. 252, 255, 50 S. E. 106; Davie v. McDaniel, 47 Ga. 195 (3); Oliver v. Powell, 114 Ga. 592, 40 S. E. 826 (7); Tarver v. Barber, 138 Ga. 607, 75 S. E. 603; Laramore v. Dudley, 145 Ga. 102, 88 S. E. 682; Powell on Actions for Land, 311, § 246.

(a) It was competent by extrinsic evidence to identify the land in dispute as the land contemplated by the administrator's sale.

(b) In a suit by the purchaser at the administrator's sale against a tenant of the heirs at law of the intestate to recover the land, the deed executed by the administrator in pursuance of the sale heretofore mentioned, which described the property as "the south half of lot No. 109 in the fourth district of Irwin county, Ga., containing 245 acres, more or less, also 122 acres, more or less, in the southwest corner of lot of land No. 94, * * * both of said tracts being in the fourth district of Irwin county, Ga.," construed in connection with the order of sale, sufficiently described the land to be conveyed. Yopp v. A. C. L. R. R. Co., 148 Ga. 539, 97 S. E. 534.

(c) Under application of the foregoing principles, there was no merit in any of the assignments of error based on the rulings of the court on the admissibility of evidence.

2. DIRECTED VERDICT.

Under the pleadings and evidence, the only possible verdict that could have been rendered was that which the court directed in favor of the plaintiff.

CITY COUNCIL OF AUGUSTA v. CLEVELAND. (No. 852.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 733(2) — "GOVERNMENTAL FUNCTION" — MAINTENANCE OF SEWERAGE DRAINAGE SYSTEM.

The duty of a city to maintain its sewerage drainage system in a good working and sanitary condition is a governmental function.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Governmental Function.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 733(2) — MAINTENANCE OF SEWERAGE SYSTEM—PUBLIC HEALTH.

Such maintenance of a sewerage system has reference to the preservation of the public health.

3. EVIDENCE — 14 — JUDICIAL NOTICE — MAINTENANCE OF SEWERAGE SYSTEM.

This court will take judicial notice of that fact.

4. EVIDENCE — 14 — JUDICIAL NOTICE — MAINTENANCE OF SEWERAGE SYSTEM.

This court will also take judicial cognizance of the fact that the cleaning out of an essential part of a city's sewerage drainage system for the purpose of keeping it open and unclogged by dirt, sand, or other foreign substances, so that it can properly perform its functions as a part of the system, is a necessary work in a proper maintenance of the system, and is a work connected with the preservation of the public health.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⇨733(2) — NEGLIGENCE OF EMPLOYE — LIABILITY — GOVERNMENTAL DUTY.

Negligence on the part of employes of the board of health of a city, who were paid by the city, in cleaning out a part of the sewer and leaving a heavy iron lid to an opening into the sewer in such a position as to create a dangerous defect or obstruction in the sidewalk, in consequence of which one not chargeable with negligence was injured, would render the city liable to the injured party.

Certified questions from Court of Appeals.

Action by Leroy Cleveland by next friend, against the City Council of Augusta. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error, and the Court of Appeals certifies two questions. Questions answered in the affirmative.

Isaac S. Peebles, Jr., of Augusta, for plaintiff in error.

Alexander & Lee, of Augusta, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. The Court of Appeals has certified the following questions upon which it desires instruction:

"(1) Is the duty of a city to maintain its sewerage drainage system in a good working and sanitary condition, so as to prevent it from becoming or causing a nuisance, a governmental or a ministerial function?

"(a) Is such maintenance connected with, or has it reference to, the preservation of the public health?

"(b) Is the fact that such maintenance is connected with or has reference to the preservation of the public health so well known that this court can take judicial cognizance of it?

"(c) Can this court take judicial cognizance of the well-known fact that the cleaning out of a 'sand trap'—an essential part of a city's sewerage drainage system—for the purpose of keeping it open and unclogged by dirt, sand, or other foreign substances, so that it can properly perform its functions as a part of the system, is a necessary work in the proper maintenance of the system, and is a work connected with the preservation of the public health?

"(2) A 'sand trap' forming a part of the sewerage drainage system of the city of Augusta was being cleaned out by the employes of the board of health of the city by removing therefrom sand and dirt. The powers and duties of the board of health and its employes, and their relations to the city, are fixed by the act of the General Assembly of Georgia creating the board (Acts 1890-91, p. 865). While the men cleaning out this sand trap were employes of the board of health of the city of Augusta, it is inferable from the evidence that they were paid by the city of Augusta. The sand trap was on the edge of a sidewalk near the curbing, and the employes of the board of health, for the purpose of cleaning out the sand trap, removed its iron lid (which was about 3½ or 4 feet square and weighed 200 or 250 pounds, and which, when the trap was closed, formed a part of the surface of the sidewalk used by pedestrians), and propped the lid up at an angle on the edge of the sidewalk by means of a steel bar some 2½ or 3 feet long, while they were engaged in cleaning out the trap. While this work was being done, a boy seven years old, who was upon the sidewalk, walked up to the trap to see what was going on, and accidentally struck with his foot the steel bar which supported the lid, thereby knocking the prop down and causing the lid to fall upon and break his leg. Under these circumstances, was the city in the performance of a governmental or a ministerial function, and was it liable for the negligence of the employes of the board of health (if they were negligent under the facts of the case) in improperly and insecurely propping up the lid, and in failing to warn the boy of his danger when approaching it?"

[1-3] 1-3. We are of the opinion that the duty of a city to maintain its sewerage drainage system in a good working and sanitary condition is a governmental function. That such maintenance is connected with, and has reference to, the preservation of the public health is so well known and so generally recognized that courts will take judicial cognizance thereof. It is unnecessary to cite authorities, either decisions of courts or text-books, to show what facts or classes of facts courts will take judicial notice of, in order to demonstrate that judicial notice will be taken of the fact that the sewerage system has a direct connection with and relation to the health of the inhabitants of the municipality. We will, however, call attention to the case of Townsend v. Smith, 144 Ga. 792, 87 S. E. 1039, in which it appears that this court took judicial cognizance of the fact that—

"The prevention of an infectious malady which, unless checked, would become general among the cattle of a given county, and thereby render the flesh of such cattle and the milk of cows diseased, unwholesome, and unfit for food, was a matter affecting the health of the people of the community where this disease appeared."

The removal of garbage of all kinds, the prevention of the escape of noxious vapors and odors, the cleanliness of the persons residing in a city, are all to a large extent dependent upon the maintenance of a sewerage drainage system. It follows from what is here said, under the authority of several of our decisions, that the maintenance of the sewerage and drainage system of a city in a good working and sanitary condition is a governmental function. This conclusion is in accordance with what was said in the case of Love v. Atlanta, 95 Ga. 129, 22 S. E. 29, 51 Am. St. Rep. 64, and the other cases decided by this court. Watson v. Atlanta, 136 Ga. 370, 71 S. E. 664. See, also, 6 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 2639. In answering the question in regard to the sewers and drainage system of a city, we have assumed that the system referred to is not one operated for profit, and that no substantial charges are made for the ordinary use, enjoyment, and benefits of the system.

[4] 4. It will be seen from what we have said above that an affirmative answer should be given to subdivision (c) of the first question, in the form in which that question is submitted. If the question had been propounded as to whether a court would take judicial cognizance of what a sandtrap is, a different question would have been presented. But, where the sand trap is defined as an essential part of the sewerage system, then it follows from what we have previously stated that the keeping of it open and unclogged by dirt, sand, or other foreign substance, so that it could properly perform its functions as a part of the system, is a necessary part of the proper maintenance of the system, and has therefore a natural connection with the preservation of the public health.

[5] 5. While it is one of the governmental functions and duties of a city to effectively maintain its sewerage system, and while, under the authority of the decision in Love v. Atlanta, supra, and the cases laying down the same doctrine as there stated, it follows that if, in the exercise of such functions and the discharge of the duties devolving upon the department of the city government having charge of the matters relating to the public health, a private citizen is injured by the negligence of one of the city's servants in and about such work, no right of action arises against the city, nevertheless that doctrine must not be allowed to destroy the other equally well-established doctrine that, if a city negligently and tortiously allows obstructions to remain in its streets or sidewalks, or negligently fails to repair defects in a sidewalk or street, and a citizen in the exercise of due care is injured in consequence of such act of negligence upon the part of the city, there can be a recovery therefor against the city. Each of these two doctrines must be given effect, and have been given effect. In the case of Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. Waldner, 49 Ga. 816, it was said:

"It is the duty of a municipal corporation, vested by law with authority over the streets, whilst dangerous works, such as sewers, etc., are being constructed across a street, to have proper precautionary measures taken to prevent accidents to passengers during such construction, whether the same is being done by the corporation through its own servants, or by contract, or by subcontractors under a primary contractor."

The defect in the street which is charged to be negligent and tortious conduct in the case just cited consisted in leaving open "a ditch or sewer across the street." See, also, Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. Spears, 66 Ga. 304. In the case of Kea v. Dublin, 145 Ga. 511, 89 S. E. 484, it was said:

"Although municipal authorities may have plenary power in the matter of collection, removal, and disposition of garbage, yet they cannot lawfully create, in connection therewith, a nuisance dangerous to health or life; and where such a nuisance is created, and its effect is specially injurious to an individual by reason of its proximity to his home, he has a cause of action for damages. Bell v. Mayor, etc., of Savannah, 139 Ga. 298, 77 S. E. 165."

See, also, Mayor, etc., of Waycross v. Houk, 113 Ga. 963, 39 S. E. 577; Williams v. Washington, 142 Ga. 281, 82 S. E. 656, L. R. A. 1915A, 325, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 196; Langley v. Augusta, 118 Ga. 590, 45 S. E. 486, 98 Am. St. Rep. 133; Mayor, etc., of Americus v. Chapman, 94 Ga. 711, 20 S. E. 3; Cornellsen v. Atlanta, 146 Ga. 416, 91 S. E. 415.

Consequently the last question propounded by the Court of Appeals should be answered in the affirmative.

All the Justices concur.

NEWTON COUNTY v. BOYD. (No. 957.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CROPS §5—VENDOR AND PURCHASER—GROWING CROP OF CORN—STATUTE.

A crop of corn, not detached from the soil, whether mature or immature, is a part of the realty, and passes by sale of the land without contractual reservation of the crop. Civ. Code 1910, § 3617; Pitts v. Hendrix, 6 Ga. 452; Frost v. Render, 65 Ga. 15; Bagley v. Columbus Southern Ry. Co., 98 Ga. 626, 25 S. E. 638, 34 L. R. A. 286, 58 Am. St. Rep. 325. See, also, 8 R. C. L. 360, 371, §§ 6, 16; Cobb's Law of the Farm, 13.

George, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Newton County; O. W. Smith, Judge.

Suit by Newton County against William Boyd. Verdict and judgment for defendant, and plaintiff excepts and brings error. Affirmed.

King & Johnson, of Covington, for plaintiff in error.

Rogers & Knox, of Covington, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. In the spring of the year, the county of Newton by parol contract rented certain land to William Boyd, to be planted in corn, the county to pay for one-third of the guano and receive one-third of the crop grown; the rent to become due when the crop matured. On November 7th the county sold and conveyed the land in fee to Boyd, the deed not reserving or otherwise specially mentioning the crop. After the crop was gathered by Boyd, the county brought an equitable suit against him, for an accounting, and to recover the value of one-third of the crop.

On the trial all the evidence showed that the crop was attached to the soil at the date of the conveyance, but there was a conflict of evidence as to whether the crop was mature at the date of the conveyance. The defendant testified that there was a killing frost in that county on October 19th. On November 30th Boyd demanded and received from the county one-third of the cost of the fertilizer used on the corn. The court directed a verdict for the defendant. A motion for new trial was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted.

On application of the principle stated in the headnote to the pleadings and the evidence, there was no error in the direction of the verdict.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except

GEORGE, J. (dissenting). Whether matured, but ungathered, crops pass with a grant of the land without reservation, is entirely immaterial in this case. By all the authorities, rent accrued is a chose in action, and is personalty, and does not pass with a grant of the land without reservation. Under Civil Code (1910) § 3341:

"The special liens of landlords for rent shall date from the maturity of the crops on the lands rented, unless otherwise agreed on."

It is admitted by the defendant in this case that no date was fixed for the payment of the rent. The evidence really demanded a finding that the rent was due upon the maturity of the crop, and the agent of the county testified positively that this was the contract. While the defendant denied that the crops were matured on November 7, 1917, he at the same time admitted that "there was a killing frost in Newton county" on October 19, 1917. Moreover, the county was to furnish one-third of the fertilizer, and 23 days after the execution and delivery of the deed to Boyd he called upon the county for one-third of the cost of the fertilizer used on the corn, and the county paid the same. At that time the agent of the county asked the defendant how much corn the county would get from the land, and the defendant replied that he could not say, but that "the lands did not produce much." Under the decision of Saulsbury v. McKellar, 59 Ga. 302(3), and rulings in other similar cases, the rents had accrued and were due at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed to the tenant. In Autrey v. Autrey, 94 Ga. 579, 20 S. E. 431, it is said that:

"The rent is personalty, and the right to collect and distribute is in the personal representative of the decedent."

In 16 R. C. L. 914, § 421, the general rule, without exception, is stated as follows:

"The claim of a landlord for accrued rents is on the same general basis as any other chose in action; and though upon a transfer of the reversion the landlord expressly assigns to his transferee the claim for accrued rents, the assignee's rights with respect thereto are the same only as those of any other assignee of a chose in action."

Except in those states that recognize the right of an assignee to maintain an action in his own name, he cannot maintain an action for matured rents assigned. The fact must not be overlooked that this was a suit for rent—for the value of the corn which Boyd agreed to pay for the rent of the lands for 1917 for agricultural purposes. Under any view of the evidence it was a jury question whether the rent was due; that is, whether it had accrued at the date of the deed. In 16 R. C. L. 915, § 422, the general rule of law applicable to the facts of this case is stated as follows:

"A transfer of the reversion does not carry with it any right to the accrued rents, and after such transfer the landlord may still recover all rents theretofore accrued."

This rule is supported by all the text-writers on the subject, as, for example, 1 Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, 1103(5). All the decided cases, it is believed, without exception sustain the rule. See notes in 16 R. C. L. and in Tiffany, supra.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WILLS §459, 470—CONSTRUCTION—INTENTION—STATUTE.

In construing a will, the intention of the testator is the controlling consideration, and his intention must be ascertained by taking the will, as it is said, "by the four corners," and giving to all parts of it consideration.

(a) In construing a particular item of a will, or a particular clause of an item, the court will view and consider the whole instrument.

(b) Section 3900 of the Civil Code of 1910, which provides that: "In the construction of all legacies, the court will seek diligently for the intention of the testator, and give effect to the same as far as it may be consistent with the rules of law; and to this end the court may transpose sentences or clauses, and change connecting conjunctions, or even supply omitted words in cases where the clause as it stands is unintelligible or inoperative, and the proof of intention is clear and unquestionable; but if the clause as it stands may have effect, it shall be so construed, however well satisfied the court may be of a different testamentary intention"—does not affect nor is it a limitation upon the application of the general rule stated in the preceding note.

(c) The last clause of the section, to wit, "but if the clause as it stands may have effect, it shall be so construed, however well satisfied the court may be of a different testamentary intention," is to be construed as a limitation upon the power of the court to transpose sentences, change connecting conjunctions, or supply omitted words, if the clause as it stands in relation to the whole instrument is intelligible and operative.

2. WILLS ⇐497(1), 601(1), 610(1)—CONSTRUCTION—TRUST—LIFE INTEREST—FEE.

Applying the foregoing, the court did not err in construing the will in this case.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Petition by Frank H. Peck and Walter R. Brown, executors of John C. Peck, deceased, for the construction of the will, and for directions, opposed by Cora Peck Williams and others, and Pearl Peck Shoup and others. From a judgment construing the will, Pearl Peck Shoup and others except and bring error, and Cora Peck Williams and others take a cross-bill of exceptions. Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed, and cross-bill dismissed.

John C. Peck, on November 30, 1903, made his will as follows:

"Item 1st. I direct that any property which I may own at the time of my death, except such as is specially disposed of hereafter, may be sold as soon as it can reasonably be done, and from the proceeds thereof, together with such funds as may be on hand, that my debts and expenses be paid; and if I have not already done so, I direct that my executors shall erect a suitable monument on my lot in Oakland Cemetery. If the amount realized should not be sufficient to pay the expenses designated, the balance required may be taken from the rental of the trust property. In case there is any money left after paying debts, funeral expenses and monument, as mentioned above, I direct that the same be divided into five equal parts and paid out as follows: One share to my beloved wife, Frances Josephine Peck; one share to my son, Frank H. Peck; one share to my grandchildren, J. C. Peck, Jr., and Arthur J. Peck, sons of my deceased son Arthur J. Peck; one share to my daughter Cora P. Williams, and one share to my daughter Lillie P. Davis.

"Item 2d. I give and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Frances Josephine Peck, the full and free use of the house and lot in which I now reside, and known as No. 97 Ivy street, all taxes, insurance, and ordinary repairs on same to be paid by my executors out of the income from the other property. This use to continue during the full term of her natural life. I also give her absolutely, all the household goods and fixtures in said house, and any horses and carriages which I may own at the time of my death, all to be hers, without restraint or control.

"Item 3d. The property known as No. 15 and 17 North Pryor street, also property at the junction of Peachtree and Pryor streets, also the house and lot No. 97 and 99 Ivy street I place in the hands of my executors as a trust estate (the house and lot No. 97 Ivy street being subject to the life use of my wife, as indicated in Item 2d); and the said executors shall keep the buildings on said lots insured for about three-fourths of their value, and keep same in good repair. The rental from the above trust estate shall first be applied to the payment of taxes, insurance, and repairs, and the sum of one hundred fifty dollars per month shall be paid to my wife named above, for her use as she may deem proper. Payment to be made to her monthly and to continue during the full term of her natural life. As I think this would make her life easy and without care of looking after property, I have given her this in place of dower and years support. After paying as above, the income from the property shall be applied to the payment of the monument mentioned above, or, if not needed, shall be paid over to my heirs as hereinafter provided. To insure the payment of taxes, insurance, and repairs, as specified above, I direct that my executors shall set aside from the rental of the property, and deposit in some good safe bank, the sum of one hundred fifty dollars per month for each and every month, and on the first of January of each year any surplus of this amount left after paying the taxes, insurance and repairs, shall be divided between my heirs as is provided for the balance of income from property. This trust estate I desire to be continued until the youngest grandchild is twenty-one years old.

"Item 4th. The entire balance of the income from the trust estate (after paying fixed charges as above) I desire to be divided into four equal parts, between my children and grandchildren, viz.: Frank H. Peck, one share; John C. Peck and Arthur J. Peck, sons of my deceased son, Arthur J. Peck, one share; to Cora P. Williams, one share; to Lillie P. Davis, one share. This division may be made monthly or quarterly as may be or may seem best to my executors. Should either of my children be dead, then their children should receive the parent's share, that is, the one share going to that parent shall be equally divided between the children of that parent. At the expiration of the trust, all the property may be divided in kind or may be sold, and the proceeds divided between my children and grandchildren, two shares to each child and one to each grandchild. If the grandchild is dead, leaving children, such child or children shall inherit the parent's share.

"Item 5th. In case of the death of either John C. Peck, Jr., or Arthur J. Peck, during the trust, then that portion of the income shall go to the one living; and in case of the death of both of said children before the end of the trust, then the entire share shall revert to the general fund, unless they may have been married, in which case, if there are living children, they shall inherit the father's share; but if no children are living, the amount shall revert as above. The same condition shall apply to any children of my daughters, Cora P. Williams and Lillie P. Davis; that is, in case of the death of the parent, the portion of the property ready for distribution, as well as the portion of the income, should go to such child or children; but in case of the death of such child or children before the final distribution, without leaving living children or grandchildren, then the full share shall revert to the general fund, and be divided between other children; it being my intent and desire that my property shall go to my wife and our children and through them in case of their death to their children according to the terms of this will."

By item 6 executors were appointed.

Upon the death of the testator, which occurred on March 5, 1908, he left surviving him the following persons: His wife, Frances Josephine Peck; one son, Frank H. Peck; two daughters, Cora Peck Williams and Lillie Peck Davis; and eight grandchildren, to wit, Pearl Peck Shoup (formerly Pearl B. Peck), Emerson P. Peck, William Hoyt Peck, George Starr Peck, Eloise Peck Cook (formerly Reba Eloise Peck), children of Frank H. Peck; J. C. Peck and Arthur J. Peck, sons of Arthur J. Peck, a deceased son of the testator; and Josephine Davis Mell (formerly Josephine Davis), daughter of Lillie Peck Davis. All of the above-named persons were in life at the time of the execution of the will. Eloise Peck Cook, the youngest of all the grandchildren of the testator, became of age on February 9, 1917. Frances Josephine Peck, the widow of the testator, died on March 6, 1917. On April 5, 1917, Frank H. Peck and Walter R. Brown, executors of the estate of John C. Peck, filed their petition to the superior court of Fulton county, in which they prayed that the court construe the will and direct them in the following particulars:

(1) "Is each child of testator now entitled to two shares and each grandchild of testator now entitled to one share in said estate absolutely and in fee simple?"

(2) "Or, is each child of testator now entitled to two shares and the two grandchildren of testator, J. C. Peck and Arthur J. Peck, now entitled to one share in said estate, to the exclusion of the other grandchildren of testator, absolutely and in fee simple?"

(3) "Do any of the distributees take a life interest contingent upon their leaving children; and, if so, whom?"

At the time of the filing of the bill for direction all the above-named children and grandchildren of the testator were then in life (no other grandchild having been born since the execution of the will), and were made parties defendant. All the defendants answered, except Josephine Davis Mell, the daughter of Lillie P. Davis, and except Frank H. Peck, who, being in his representative capacity one of the plaintiffs, did not further plead. The five children of Frank H. Peck contended, in substance, that the proper interpretation of the will was that when the so-called trust estate terminated the corpus thereof was to be divided into fourteen shares; two shares to go to each of the three living children of the testator, namely, Frank H. Peck, Cora P. Williams, and Lillie P. Davis, and one share to each of the grandchildren of the testator, namely, the five children of Frank H. Peck, the two children of the deceased son, Arthur J. Peck, and the one child of Lillie P. Davis. Cora P. Williams and Lillie P. Davis, daughters of the testator, and John C. Peck and Arthur J. Peck, the sons of a deceased son of the testator, in their answers contended, in substance, that the property of the testator not included in the so-called trust estate was disposed of under item 1 of the will, and passed partly by the provisions of the will and partly by inheritance from the deceased widow of the testator to the three living children of the testator and two children of testator's deceased son, in the proportion of one-fourth to each living child and one-fourth to the sons of the deceased child, and that as to the corpus of the so-called trust estate the will disposed of it so that it would also be received in equal shares by the living children of the testator and the two sons of the dead son representing their deceased father. The court, to whom the case was submitted without the intervention of a jury, construed the will as follows:

"First. That the property not included in the trust estate, and disposed of in item 1, went, in fee simple, one-fifth to the widow, one-fifth to each of the children of the testator, and one-fifth to the two children of Arthur J. Peck, as set forth in item 1; that the widow having died intestate, her share follows the law of inheritance, going in equal shares to the same persons, so that Frank H. Peck is entitled to one-fourth of said funds or property, Cora P. Williams to one-fourth, Lillie P. Davis to one-fourth, and J. C. Peck, Jr., and Arthur J. Peck together to one-fourth.

"Second. That each child of the testator is now entitled to two shares of the trust estate, and the two grandchildren of the testator, J. C. Peck and Arthur J. Peck, are each entitled to one share in said estate, to the exclusion of the other grandchildren of the testator, absolutely and in fee simple.

"Third. That neither of the distributees take a life interest contingent upon their leaving children."

To the judgment construing the will as indicated in the second and third divisions set forth above, the five grandchildren of the testator (children of Frank H. Peck, son of the testator) excepted. At the hearing the two daughters of the testator and the two sons of the deceased son of the testator moved to strike so much of the answers filed by the plaintiffs in error in the main bill of exceptions as sought to set up an old will of the testator and certain accompanying documents, on the ground that there was no such ambiguity in the will as authorized the introduction of extrinsic evidence. This motion was overruled, and during the progress of the trial the documents were received in evidence over the objection of the defendants in error in the main bill; and the rulings of the court in these particulars are assigned as error in the cross-bill of exceptions.

G. S. Peck and Rosser, Slaton, Phillips & Hopkins, all of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

Anderson, Rountree & Crenshaw and Brewster, Howell & Heyman, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

GEORGE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. In the able brief of counsel for the plaintiffs in error various arguments are used, and sundry rules of law are applied to uphold the construction given by them to the will of John C. Peck, but they mainly rely upon the following provision of item 4 of the will:

"At the expiration of the trust, all the property may be divided in kind or may be sold, and the proceeds divided between my children and grandchildren, two shares to each child and one to each grandchild. If the grandchild is dead, leaving children, such child or children shall inherit the parent's share."

It is insisted that the language of this provision, which manifestly refers to the corpus of the estate, is plain and unambiguous; that the words, "my children," "grandchildren," "each child," and "each grandchild," in the particular clause involved, should have their usual and ordinary meaning. In this connection we are referred to section 3900 of the Civil Code, which is as follows:

"In the construction of all legacies, the court will seek diligently for the intention of the testator, and give effect to the same as far as it may be consistent with the rules of law; and to this end the court may transpose sentences or clauses, and change connecting conjunctions, or even supply omitted words in cases where the clause as it stands is unintelligible or inoperative, and the proof of intention is clear and unquestionable; but if the clause as it stands may have effect, it shall be so construed, however well satisfied the court may be of a different testamentary intention."

And it is said that the last clause of this section, to wit, "if the clause as it stands may have effect, it shall be so construed, however well satisfied the court may be of a different testamentary intention," is controlling in this case. If the provision of the will above quoted stood alone, that is, if nothing went before it or followed after it, it may be conceded that the will should be given the construction placed upon it by plaintiffs in error. But the rule laid down in the section quoted in no wise limits the well-recognized doctrine that the intention of the testator is the controlling consideration, and that this intention must be gathered from the whole will. Choice v. Marshall, 1 Ga. 97, 102; Winn v. Tabernacle Infirmary, 135 Ga. 380, 383, 69 S. E. 557, 82 L. R. A. (N. S.) 512; Tyler v. Theilig, 124 Ga. 204, 52 S. E. 606. The instrument must be taken, as it is sometimes said, by the "four corners," and every part of it given effect so far as sound public policy and the rules of law will admit. In the recent case of Rutland v. Emanuel, 80 South. 107 (5), the Supreme Court of Alabama ruled:

"In construing a particular item of a will, the court will view and consider the whole instrument."

This ruling is in harmony with the well-recognized rule that the intention of the testator, as gathered from the whole will, is the controlling consideration. Miller v. Hurt, 12 Ga. 357, 361; Gaboury v. McGovern, 74 Ga. 133, 140; Ezell v. Head, 99 Ga. 560, 27 S. E. 720. In Randolph v. Bond, 12 Ga. 362, 367, this court, speaking through Judge Warner, said:

"The counsel for the defendants in error insists, that they are to take per capita, share and share alike, and such certainly would be the legal effect of the latter part of the seventh clause of the will, but for the other expressions contained in it denoting a different intention. While we admit the general rule as contended for by the defendants in error, in the absence of any contrary intention, yet, the legatees will take per stirpes, if the testator's intention to that effect appears from other expressions in the will"—citing Roland v. Gorsuch, 2 Cox, 187.

It is proper to say that counsel for plaintiffs in error contended that the clause of the will quoted can be given literal effect without doing violence to any other part of the will, and that the will, taken as a whole, clearly reveals the intention of the testator to divide his estate into fourteen shares, two shares to each of his children and one share to each of his grandchildren. The provision in the latter part of the third item of the will, "This trust estate I desire to be continued until the youngest grandchild is twenty-one years old," and other provisions of the will, are pointed out as sustaining this view. It is, under the facts of this case, immaterial whether the "trust estate" was to terminate absolutely when the youngest grandchild became 21 years of age, without regard to whether the wife of the testator was then in life. If the sentence last above quoted refers to the youngest of all the grandchildren of the testator, it is material only as bearing upon the general intent of the testator in the making of his will. Of course, if the "trust estate" is to be continued until the youngest of all his grandchildren "is twenty-one years old," the presumption would arise that he intended the youngest grandchild to take under the will; but this is not necessarily true. Looking to the whole will, however, we think it clear that as to the property which was included in the so-called trust estate, the testator intended that it should also be received in equal shares by the three living children of the testator and the two sons of the dead son, representing their deceased father. In the first item of the will the testator refers to his grandchildren by name, and includes only the sons of his deceased son, Arthur J. Peck; and this reference is to his grandchildren in connection with his wife and his three living children. In item 4 of the will, in making a bequest of the remainder of the income from the "trust estate," he provides that it be "divided into four equal parts, between my children and grandchildren, viz.: Frank H. Peck, one share; John C. Peck and Arthur J. Peck, sons of my deceased son, Arthur J. Peck, one share; to Cora P. Williams, one share; to Lillie P. Davis, one share." It is in item 4 of the will, and almost immediately following the bequest above quoted, that the clause mainly relied upon by plaintiffs in error appears. At the end of item 5, after the testator has finally disposed of his entire estate, income and corpus, we find this significant statement:

"It being my intent and desire that my property shall go to my wife and our children and through them in case of their death to their children according to the terms of this will."

[2] Upon these and other considerations arising from a careful scrutiny of the whole will, we are satisfied that the testator referred to his two grandchildren, the sons of his deceased son, as coming within the descriptive words employed by him when he devised the corpus of the "trust estate" to "my children and grandchildren, two shares to each child and one to each grandchild."

2. None of the distributees, under a proper construction of the will, took a life interest contingent upon their leaving children. The will created a vested remainder in the corpus of the "trust estate" in Cora P. Williams and Lillie P. Davis, subject to be divested if they did not survive the termination of the "trust estate." Speer v. Roach, 145 Ga. 852, 854, 90 S. E. 57.

As indicated, we are of the opinion that there was no ambiguity apparent upon the face of the will. While the court admitted certain allunde evidence consisting of an old will with certain pencil memoranda said to have been made thereon by the testator, and other documentary evidence, the conclusion finally reached by the court was correct. No other construction would give effect to the wording of the will, considered in its entirety.

Judgment on the main bill of exceptions affirmed. Cross-bill dismissed. All the Justices concur.

MARSHALL v. NEISLER et al. (No. 1021.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

BANKS AND BANKING \S 77(5)—RECEIVERS——SALE—CONFIRMATION—PRICE.

The receivers of the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank were ordered by the court to sell the entire property of the bank held by them, and to make report of the sale to the court for confirmation or rejection. They filed a report reciting that the property had been sold to W. E. Marshall upon his bid of $4,510, and recommended that the sale so reported be confirmed. C. H. Neisler filed objections to the confirmation of the sale to Marshall, upon the ground, among others, that the property had been cried off to him for the sum of $3,850, he being the highest and best bidder. The evidence before the court disclosed that the property was bid off by Neisler at the last-named sum, and that thereafter the receivers again exposed the property for sale, over Neisler's protest, when it was cried off to W. E. Marshall for the sum of $4,510, as reported by the receivers; Neisler also being a bidder when the property was offered a second time. When the matter of confirming the sale was before the court, the judge passed an order reciting that at the sale the property had been knocked off to Neisler at $3,850, and that this was not a fair and adequate price therefor, but that, Neisler having in open court offered to raise his bid to $5,000, and it appearing that this sum was a fair and adequate price for the property sold, it was ordered that the sale to him be confirmed, and that upon payment of the $5,000 in cash the receivers deliver the property to him and make to him an appropriate conveyance. To this order Marshall excepted upon various grounds. Held, that the court committed no error in rendering the decree complained of. See Moore v. Triplett, 96 Va. 603, 32 S. E. 50, 70 Am. THOMPSON v. TENNYSON. (No. 998.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

FISH \S 5(1, 2)—WATERS AND WATER COURSES \S 89, 156(7)—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—OWNERSHIP OF SOIL—RIGHT OF FISHING—"MILL PRIVILEGES."

The owner of land adjoining a nonnavigable stream is the owner of the soil to the center of the thread of the stream, and of the fishing rights to the center of the thread on his side of the stream. If one proprietor owns the land on both sides of the stream, he has the exclusive right of fishing therein.

(a) The right of fishing is not severed from the ownership of the fee by grant which does not by its terms either expressly convey the right, or necessarily include it, as, for instance, an unrestricted grant of all water rights or privileges.

(b) The grant by the owner of the fee of "mill privileges" carries the right to the reasonable use of land and water necessary to the operation of a mill, but does not grant any fishing privileges.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mill Privilege.]

Error from Superior Court, Thomas County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Suit for injunction by Mrs. S. F. Tennyson against J. T. Thompson. Injunction granted in part, and defendant excepts and brings error. Reversed, with direction.

Mrs. S. F. Tennyson brought an equitable petition against J. T. Thompson, alleging, that she was the owner of a gristmill which her husband, J. N. Tennyson, as her agent, conducted for her; that in the operation of the mill for the purpose of grinding corn she had acquired by deed the privilege of maintaining a millpond on certain land described in the deed; that she was in the possession of the same, operating the mill and using the pond through her husband as agent, and her predecessors in title had been in the peaceful possession of the same without interference for 30 years or more; that the defendant and his agents patrolled the pond and forbade those working in plaintiff's employment, and her licensees, from using or going on the pond, and had put up signs forbidding any one from going on the pond; that defendant ordered plaintiff's husband off the pond and made threats intimating that he would shoot any one caught on the pond; that defendant interfered with persons who desired to visit the mill and premises for the purpose of having their corn ground, and he still continues to patrol the pond and premises, interfering with plaintiff's business; that defendant has been notified to stay off the premises and pond, but he willfully and maliciously disregards and violates her rights of private property. Plaintiff prayed that defendant and his agents be enjoined from going on the pond and premises, and from intimidating the customers of plaintiff, etc. The part of plaintiff's deed material here is as follows:

"Plaintiff attached to her petition a deed from Mrs. Siddah Perry, of Thomas county, Ga., dated October 3, 1917 conveying the privilege of having and maintaining a millpond known as the Bullock millpond, situated on lot No. 207 in the seventeenth land district of said state and county; also that portion of lot of land No. 208, containing 107 acres, more or less, and bounded as follows: On the east by original land lot line, on the south by the run of a certain branch, on the west by lands of Mrs. Freeman Carden, and on the north by lands of Mrs. Freeman Carden, being the same land upon which my residence is located, and which is and has been used in connection with the operation of the mill above described; also that portion of lot No. 194 in said district of said state and county as is and has been used for the purpose of backing water thereon in the use, maintenance, and operation of said mill."

The defendant filed an answer, denying the material allegations of the petition, and averring that he held the land on which the pond is located under a warranty deed from T. T. Thompson to himself. He also attached a copy of a deed from James A. Bullock to T. T. Thompson, by which the grantor of defendant acquired title and possession of lot No. 297. Defendant averred that "the plaintiff has no interest or equity in or respecting lot of land No. 207, save the mill privileges defined in the deeds hereto attached"; that the defendant was the owner of that part of lot of land No. 207 covered by and adjacent to the millpond, and is entitled to the hunting and fishing privileges thereon, whereas the plaintiff's agent and husband "has, without authority of law, endeavored to seize and hold the exclusive hunting and fishing privileges on and adjacent to said pond, which hunting and fishing privileges are entirely separate and distinct from the mill and the mill privileges." The defendant prayed that the plaintiff's prayers for relief be denied, and that she be enjoined from hunting or fishing upon the pond, or that part of lot of land No. 207 adjacent to the pond, without first obtaining the written permission of the defendant or his assigns. He also prayed that the deed from Mrs. Perry to the plaintiff be canceled as a cloud upon his title.

Upon the interlocutory hearing the trial judge granted the injunction as prayed for by the plaintiff, "in so far as the water and pond are concerned," and the defendant and his agents were enjoined from going upon the pond or premises described in the petition. To this judgment the defendant excepted.

Clifford E. Hay, of Thomasville, for plaintiff in error.

Titus, Dekle & Hopkins, of Thomasville, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. From the averments of the petition and answer it will be seen that the main question at issue between the parties is: Who is entitled to the exclusive hunting and fishing privileges in the millpond referred to in the petition? It appears that the fee of lot No. 207 was conveyed by James A. Bullock on December 4, 1874, to Tandey Thompson (T. T. Thompson), together with all the privileges except for mill privileges; and on February 20, 1908, T. T. Thompson conveyed to J. T. Thompson, the defendant, lot No. 207 of the seventeenth district, it being recited, "This deed subject to water mill privileges." At the time of the conveyance by Bullock to T. T. Thompson there was a creek on the property, but no mill or millpond had been constructed. Thereafter the grantor built a mill and maintained a millpond for a number of years. On August 17, 1908, James A. Bullock conveyed to Mrs. Siddah Perry "the privilege of having and maintaining a millpond" on lot 207; and on October 3, 1917,

Mrs. Perry conveyed to Mrs. Tennyson, the plaintiff, "the privilege of having and maintaining a millpond, known as the Bullock millpond, situated on lot 207."

We will first deal with the question of who possesses the exclusive right of fishing so far as the right is dependent upon the conveyances of the respective parties. Under the common law the owner of land bordering on a nonnavigable stream owned the soil to the center or thread of the stream, and likewise had the exclusive right of fishing on his side of the stream. If the same person owned the land on both sides of the stream, he was entitled to the exclusive right of fishing. Carter v. Murcot, 4 Burr. 2162; 12 Eng. Rul. Cas. 166. And the doctrine of the common law has been adhered to by the courts of this country. Beckman v. Kreamer, 43 Ill. 447, 92 Am. Dec. 146; Hooker v. Cummings, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 90, 11 Am. Dec. 249; Commonwealth v. Chapin, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 199, 16 Am. Dec. 386; Beach v. Morgan, 67 N. H. 529, 41 Atl. 349, 68 Am. St. Rep. 692; Griffith v. Holman, 23 Wash. 347, 68 Pac. 239, 54 L. R. A. 178, 83 Am. St. Rep. 821.

This is also the law as decided in Georgia. In the case of Joiner v. Wilkes, 148 Ga. 300, 96 S. E. 385, it was held that—

"Under the pleadings and the evidence, the court did not err in granting the interlocutory injunction."

There is no statement of facts and no opinion in the report of that case. Reference to the record, however, discloses that the case there decided was submitted to the judge for decision upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that the plaintiff, Wilkes, whose right to an injunction was maintained by the decision rendered, was the owner in fee of lot of land No. 57, adjoining one side of a millpond; his title coming through a chain of conveyances from one Tharp Spence. Joiner, the defendant, through a chain of conveyances from the same common grantor, had been granted "all the water and mill privileges on lot of land No. 57 in the seventeenth district of Thomas county, Ga., together with their every right and privilege desired, wanted, or required for the purpose of erecting, building, and operating a water mill and gin and such other machinery as may at any time be added or operated by water power." Under this grant the defendant claimed to be entitled to the exclusive fishing privileges in the millpond, notwithstanding the plaintiff's ownership of the soil adjoining a portion of the pond. The effect of that decision, therefore, was to hold that the owner in fee on land on one side of a pond was entitled to fish in that portion of the pond which extended over the soil owned by him, and, further, to rule that a previous grant by the common grantor of all the water and mill privileges on lot of land No. 57 did not have the effect of conveying to the grantee an exclusive right of fishing in the pond. In the case of Lee v. Mallard, 116 Ga. 18, 42 S. E. 372, it was held:

"The owner of water in a stream or pond not navigable, or of all the privileges therein, has the exclusive right of fishing in the same, though the land lying under the water may belong to another. Accordingly a conveyance of land lying upon the natural bank of an unnavigable stream, upon which is located a mill standing on other land of the grantor and across which is a dam, causing a pond a portion of which covers a part of the land conveyed, does not pass to the grantee any right to fish in such pond at any point below the then existing high-water mark thereof, when by the terms of the conveyance an exception is made in the grantor's favor as to 'all water privileges up to high-water mark, and all other privileges in going to his mill.'"

The decision just quoted, on first consideration, might seem to conflict with the ruling in the Joiner Case, supra, but it will be noted that in the Lee Case the exception in the grantor's favor was of "all water privileges up to high-water mark," without any language which would qualify or restrict the water privileges granted, whereas in the Joiner Case the language was so coupled with the right and privilege of erecting, building, and operating a water mill and gin as to make the deed capable of the construction that the words "all water and mill privileges on lot of land No. 57" meant all such water and mill privileges as were reasonably necessary for the purpose of erecting, building, and operating the water mill or gin referred to; and with this construction placed upon the deed there is no real conflict between the decisions in these two cases.

In the case now under review the only exception which the common grantor made in conveying the fee of the land was to reserve to himself the mill privilege. In the case of Gould v. Boston Duck Co., 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 442, 452, it was said that the term "mill privilege" in a conveyance of land embraces the right which the law gives the owner to erect a mill thereon, and to hold up or let out the water, at the will of the occupant, for the purpose of operating the same in a reasonable or beneficial manner. In Moore v. Fletcher, 16 Me. 63, 65, 33 Am. Dec. 633, the term "mill privilege" was defined as meaning the land and water used with the mill, and on which it and its appendages stand. In a decision of this court, Rome Railway & Light Co. v. Loeb, 141 Ga. 202, 80 S. E. 785, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1023, it was said:

"The general rule is that riparian owners are each entitled to the center of the stream. Civil Code 1910, § 3630. But it is insisted that the plaintiff, by the division of the property in kind and the order of the court, had the right to 'mill privileges,' and that this included all the water in the pond. But we cannot agree to that proposition without qualification. The general rule as to the rights of riparian proprietors is that each may use the water for any purpose to which it can be beneficially applied without material injury to the rights of others. Gould on Waters (3d Ed.) § 204. Every riparian owner may make a reasonable use of the stream passing by his land. Id. § 208. Prior to the building of the mill and pond and the grant of the 'mill privileges' to the predecessors in title of the plaintiff, the riparian owners would undoubtedly each have the right to use the water to the middle of the stream, provided the use was reasonable and did not injure other riparian proprietors; and, though she subsequently became the owner in fee, yet in the partition of the property the 'mill privileges' were carried forward. We do not understand that the term 'mill privileges,' as contained in the order of the court, gives the plaintiff the exclusive use of all the water in the pond, whether needed or not for mill purposes, to the exclusion of a reasonable use by other riparian proprietors. The grantee of a mill privilege, without special mention of water rights, takes a right to the actual flow of the stream, subject to its reasonable use by upper riparian owners. Whitney v. Wheeler Cotton Mills, 151 Mass. 396 (24 N. E. 774, 7 L. R. A. 613). * * * The effect of the proceedings to divide the property in kind was to vest in the plaintiff the title to the mill property described in the division, as set aside to her, and also to the 'appurtenant mill privileges,' with the use of so much of the water in the millpond as is necessary for the operation of the mill in a reasonable manner. See Gould v. Boston Duck Co., 18 Gray [Mass.] 442. But we do not understand the law to be that the owner of the mill property, with mill privileges, can deprive riparian owners contiguous to the stream of a reasonable use of the water, where it does not interfere with the operation of the mill in a reasonable manner. It is to be observed that the plaintiff does not own the title to the land under the pond at the point where the defendant takes its water, but the title is in the defendant to the center of the original stream. Under these circumstances, we think the defendant is entitled to a reasonable use of the water in the millpond adjacent to its property, provided it does not materially interfere with the mill privileges of the plaintiff or other riparian proprietors."

In view of the authorities above cited, we conclude that, so far as the respective grants are concerned, the effect of the conveyance by James Bullock to T. T. Thompson in 1874 was to pass to the latter the fee, which would include the hunting and fishing privileges, in the absence of language expressing a contrary intent, and that the language "with all the privileges except for mill privileges" had only the effect to reserve in the grantor such privileges, water or otherwise, as were reasonably necessary for the operation of the mill, and did not reserve to him any hunting or fishing rights, and that under the subsequent conveyance J. T. Thompson is now the owner of the fee, including the fishing and hunting rights, and that Mrs. S. F. Tennyson only has the mill privileges, as above defined.

The case of Mallet v. McCord, 127 Ga. 761, 58 S. E. 1015, seems to have been decided solely with respect to the rights conferred by a reservation of the grantors of "the right to fish in said pond;" this reservation occurring in a conveyance wherein they had conveyed to the grantees the right to "keep and maintain a dam on Yellow River creek in said county," and to keep the water at its present height.

The defendant in error contends, however, that, irrespective of the rights of the parties under the deeds under which they hold, she now has by prescription acquired the exclusive right of fishing in the millpond. If it be conceded that an exclusive right of fishing in private waters can be acquired by prescription, since no such right is purported to be given by the deeds under which the defendant in error claims, it would require twenty years' possession to ripen a title by prescription, and to do this she seeks to tack on the possession and use of the hunting and fishing privileges by James A. Bullock, the common grantor, who we have seen had conveyed these privileges by his deed to T. T. Thompson in 1874. Manifestly any attempt to establish prescription in his behalf would have failed because his possession could not be in good faith, as it would be an attempt to prescribe against his own title which he had conveyed to another, which certainly could not be done without proof that he had ousted his grantee.

In addition to seeking to restrain the defendant from patrolling and going on the pond it was also alleged in the petition that the defendant interfered with the customers of the mill and forbade them from using the pond and mill, and it was sought to enjoin him from intimidating the customers of the plaintiff and from interfering with her agent in the conduct of the mill business, etc. The only support of this allegation found in the evidence is contained in the affidavit of J. M. Tennyson, in the statement "that the defendant, Jim Thompson, does not only attempt to order and keep people off so much of the pond as is located on lot 207, but that he attempts to keep people off of the pond and mill premises entirely."

In so far as the order of injunction restrains the defendant from going upon the pond or premises described, it is reversed; and the court is directed to modify it so as to restrain the defendant only from interfering with the plaintiff's business and customers on the mill premises themselves.

Judgment reversed, with direction. All the Justices concur.

SOUTHERN RY. CO v. RICE. (No. 9727.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2 Feb. 11, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. NEW TRIAL — VERDICT CONTRARY TO EVIDENCE.

The evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, failed to show any negligence on the part of the defendant which contributed to the injuries sued for; moreover, it showed that the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the injuries. It follows that the recovery for the plaintiff was unauthorized, and that the court erred in overruling the general grounds of the defendant's motion for a new trial.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, Feb. 11, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WITNESSES — 258 — TESTIMONY FROM RECORDS — KNOWLEDGE.

In the light of the qualifying note of the trial judge, it does not appear that he erred in excluding the testimony of the witness Montgomery as to the weights of the carload lots of corn shipped. It is not permissible for a witness to testify to facts, the knowledge of which he has obtained from records not personally kept by him.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR — 728(1) — ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR — EXCLUSION OF DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

The assignment of error, based upon the sustaining of the defendant's objections to certain documentary evidence, and the exclusion of the evidence, is too indefinite to raise any question for consideration by this court, as it does not show what were the objections sustained by the court, nor wherein the court erred in sustaining them and in excluding the evidence.

3. EVIDENCE — 73, 208(7) — QUOTATION OF RATES — ADMISSIBILITY — STRICKEN PLEADING.

The court did not err in admitting in evidence, over the objections of the plaintiff, a paragraph of the original petition which had been stricken by amendment. Lydia Pinkham Med. Co. v. Gibbs, 108 Ga. 138, 33 S. E. 945; McElmurray v. Blodgett, 120 Ga. 9, 16, 47 S. E. 531. This paragraph was offered by the defendant, and contained an admission that the plaintiff's agent quoted the particular rate under which the shipment of corn moved. In the absence of proof to the contrary it would be presumed that the agent quoted the correct rate, and the evidence was therefore relevant and admissible.

EVIDENCE — 441(9) — PAROL EVIDENCE — WARRANTY.

This case is controlled by the decision in Cochran v. Jones & Oglesby, 11 Ga. App. 302, 75 S. E. 143, the headnote of which is as follows: "Where, in an instrument in the form of a note and mortgage for the purchase price of a mule, it is stated that the purchaser agrees to pay for the mule if it should die, and that he assumes this risk in consideration of the credit extended, and purchases on his own judgment, he is not, upon the death of the mule, entitled to prove an express warranty of soundness, and defeat the purchase price on account of a breach of such warranty." As in the Cochran Case, the note in the instant case contained the clause, "I or we insure the good condition and safe-keeping of said property, and will pay if it be lost, damaged or destroyed, and, if live stock, will pay though it may die. I or we assume said risk in consideration of the credit extended, and purchase the property on my or our own judgment." This differentiates the Cochran Case and the present case from that of Whigham v. Hall & Co., 8 Ga. App. 509, 70 S. E. 23, relied on by the plaintiff in error. The court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the plea of defendant, or in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Feb. 11, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE §130(7)—OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE.

"Where the proposal to insure comes from the insurer, he must be notified of the acceptance of the offer by the insured." Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, §§ 423, 424, 432.

2. CONTRACTS §15, 26—SALES §22(4)—OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE—VARIANCE.

"While a contract can be made by correspondence through the mails or by telegrams, the offer of the seller must be accepted by the purchaser unequivocally, unconditionally, and without variance of any sort. There must be a mutual assent of the parties, and they must assent to the same thing in the same sense." Robinson v. Weller, 81 Ga. 704, 8 S. E. 447; Stix v. Boulston, 88 Ga. 748, 15 S. E. 826; Harris v. Lumber Co., 97 Ga. 465, 25 S. E. 519; Larned v. Wentworth, 114 Ga. 209, 39 S. E. 855; Harper v. Ginners' Mutual Insurance Co., 6 Ga. App. 139, 142, 64 S. E. 567.

3. INSURANCE §145(1)—CONTRACT—OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE.

Where the holder of a fire insurance policy receives from the insurer a letter notifying him that the policy has expired, but that it has been renewed on certain terms and conditions stated in the letter, and he fails to answer the letter, or to comply with the terms and conditions stated therein, or to notify the insurer that he has unconditionally accepted the policy, before the property has been destroyed by fire, there is no completed contract of insurance, but merely an offer by the insurer to make such a contract, not accepted by the insured. Harper v. Ginners' Mutual Insurance Co., supra.

4. FIRE INSURANCE—ACTION ON POLICY—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

When the principles of law stated above are applied to the facts of the instant case, as disclosed by the plaintiff's petition, it is evident that the alleged contract of insurance sued upon was not a completed one. The court, therefore, erred in overruling the defendant's oral motion to dismiss the petition on the ground that it set forth no cause of action.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. Feb. 12, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

COURTS §189(3)—JURISDICTION OF CITY COURT OF HAZLEHURST—RESIDENCE OF PARTIES.

The petition in this case alleged that "on the 7th day of March, 1916, G. O. Swain was arrested by Henry C. Ellis, who was a constable from Coffee county, and E. H. Ellis, who was a resident of Jeff Davis county. This arrest was made by these parties without any warrant, and without any legal process or authority to make this arrest. At the time of making this arrest B. Morris was the bondsman of Henry C. Ellis, and the said H. C. Ellis stated to G. O. Swain, when called upon for his authority to make the arrest, that he was an officer from Coffee county, and that he (Swain) had escaped from the convict camp in Coffee county, and that he (H. C. Ellis) needed no warrant to make the arrest. After the arrest Swain was brought to Hazlehurst and placed in a dirty little calaboose used by the city of Hazlehurst in confining negroes. * * * He was not allowed to see any one, so that he could identify himself and show to the officers that he was not the man wanted and who had escaped; and later he was taken from the jail and handcuffed to a bed, and in this condition was forced to remain all night long, and * * * next day the officer, H. C. Ellis, and E. H. Ellis discovered they were wrong and liberated the said Swain. H. C. Ellis was acting as an officer and by virtue of his office of constable, and made the arrest as an officer and by reason of his being an officer from Coffee county." Held, the city court of Hazlehurst was without jurisdiction to entertain and try this suit, which was against H. C. Ellis, as constable, and B. Morris, as his bondsman, both residents of Coffee county, and against E. H. Ellis, who resided in Jeff Davis county, since a suit on the bond of the defendant H. C. Ellis—an action ex contractu—could not be brought in Jeff Davis county, the residence of neither the principal nor the surety on the bond, by merely joining in the suit E. H. MYERS v. McLENDON et al. (No. 9834.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 18, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

NEGLIGENCE §110—LIABILITY OF CONTRACTOR—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

The court erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by W. F. McLendon against C. B. Myers and others. General demurrer to the petition filed by defendant Myers overruled, and he excepts and brings error. Reversed.

McLendon sued Myers, Pierce, and Healey Real Estate & Improvement Company for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by falling through a hole in the floor of a building owned by the Healey Real Estate & Improvement Company. The petition alleges that certain repairs were being made on the building by the owner at the instance of Pierce, who was to become a tenant thereof, and that the owner employed Myers "to make certain alterations in said building"; that thereupon Myers "began work upon said building, sending his agents and employes there to work, and himself going there many times each day to superintend the work being done." Paragraph 8 of the petition is as follows:

"That the defendant Healey Real Estate & Improvement Company did not surrender, but retained, possession, custody, and control of said premises and had said premises in its possession, custody, and control at the time plaintiff sustained his injuries as hereinafter set forth, and prior thereto."

Paragraph 12 recites that on or about March 25, 1917, Pierce and Myers—

"each severally requested petitioner to go to said premises and there to make an estimate of the cost of installing therein a complete system of electric lights, fans, etc., through the entire building."

It is further alleged that on or about the 27th of March petitioner went to said building for the purpose of making an estimate of the cost of the work desired; that it was necessary for him to inspect all the parts of the first floor of said building, and to get the measurements of its walls and other parts of the building, and while engaged in these measurements he fell through a hole or trap in the floor, which was obscured by plank, dirt, and rubbish, and of which he was not aware and could not have discovered by the exercise of ordinary care. The allegations of negligence were in substance that the defendants failed to construct around said hole or trap a barrier sufficient to keep a person from falling therein; in failing to place a light that would give a warning of the presence of the hole; in allowing plank, rubbish, and refuse to become accumulated around and over said hole or trap; and in inviting petitioner to go into said building without giving him warning of the presence of said hole or trap. The defendant filed both general and special demurrers to the petition, the general demurrer was overruled, and he excepted.

Dodd & Dodd, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Madison Richardson, F. A. Quillian, and O. T. L. C. & J. L. Hopkins, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). We think the court erred in overruling the demurrer. There is nothing in the petition to show what repairs were being made by Myers, or that the repairs or the making thereof had any connection whatever with the hole through which the plaintiff fell. Paragraph 8 of the petition above quoted distinctly negatives any possession, custody, or control of the premises by Myers at the time of the injury or prior thereto. Before damages for personal injuries, such as are sued for in this case, can be recovered, it must appear that the person against whom damages are sought owed some legal duty to the plaintiff, and that the failure, or negligent performance, of that duty resulted in the damages. Under the pleadings in this case, what duty did Myers owe to McLendon? Certainly not to have the hole through which plaintiff fell protected by placing around same barriers, lights, or other things to warn him of the presence of the hole, for he had no possession, custody, or control of the building.

There is no allegation that Myers was present at the building at the time plaintiff sustained his injury, and no allegation that he knew that the measurements necessary to make the estimates would carry plaintiff to the immediate locality of the hole through which he fell. Surely it cannot be seriously insisted that the mere fact that Myers and Pierce "each severally requested petitioner to go to said premises and there make an estimate of the cost of installing a complete set of electric lights, fans, etc., through the entire building," without more, and, so far as the petition shows, without any suggestion from plaintiff that he would comply with the request, and without any knowledge on the part of Myers that petitioner was complying therewith and making measurements of the building, would impose upon Myers the duty of giving to petitioner any warning as to the hole through which he fell. The petition, failing to show the breach of any duty which defendant Myers owed the plaintiff, does not set out a cause of action against Myers, and the demurrer thereto should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed.

BROYLES, P. J., and STEPHENS, J., concur.

BROYLES, P. J. (specially concurring). I think that the petition failed to set out a cause of action against the defendant Myers. Even if it could be held that the petition showed that Myers was negligent in some of the particulars as charged therein, it clearly appears from the petition as a whole that the proximate and preponderating negligence that caused the plaintiff's injuries was the failure to warn him of the hidden danger—the hole in the floor—after he had entered the building and while he was engaged in measuring the right wall thereof. As to this negligence, the petition shows that Pierce, one of the defendants, was present and saw the plaintiff when he entered the building, and knew for what purpose he had come, and yet, although Pierce was aware of the existence of the partially hidden hole, he failed to warn the plaintiff of his danger, and that while the plaintiff was measuring this wall he fell into the hole and was injured. The petition does not allege that Myers was present on this occasion. On the contrary, construing the petition, as we must, most strongly against the plaintiff, it shows that Myers was not there. The petition further shows that this negligence of Pierce was that of an intervening independent agency. In my opinion, therefore, the petition clearly shows that, even if Myers were guilty of some antecedent negligence, the controlling and proximate cause of the injury sued for was the negligence of Pierce, for which Myers was not accountable. This being true, Myers' general demurrer to the petition should have been sustained.

THOMAS v. GEORGIA RY. & POWER CO.
(No. 9828.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
Feb. 12, 1918.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 853—PLEADING \S 225(3)—LAW OF THE CASE—AMENDMENT.

"The court sustained defendant's * * * demurrer, but allowed plaintiff 20 days in which to amend her petition and meet this demurrer. To this ruling no exception was taken, nor is error assigned thereon in the bill of exceptions. Therefore the ruling that the petition was subject to this * * * demurrer became the law of the case. The plaintiff, within the 20 days allowed, filed a purported amendment to her petition. This amendment, however, * * * clearly failed to meet the objections raised by the demurrer. No further amendment was offered within the 20 days allowed in the court's order. Under these facts the court did not err in dismissing the plaintiff's case." Baker v. City of Atlanta, 22 Ga. App. —, 96 S. E. 332.

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT \S 68—GROUNDS—FAILURE OF AMENDMENT TO COMPLY WITH ORDER.

The amendment to the plaintiff's declaration having been allowed subject to demurrer, it was not error to entertain defendant's motion, made after the call of the case for trial, but before plaintiff's counsel finished reading his declaration to the jury, to dismiss plaintiff's suit upon the ground that the amendment failed to comply with the terms of the original order sustaining defendant's demurrer to the declaration. Marbut v. Southern Railway Co., 22 Ga. App. —, 95 S. E. 1021; Neal v. Moultrie, 12 Ga. 104 (4); Hart v. Henderson, 86 Ga. 568 (1); Cooney v. Sweat, 133 Ga. 511, 66 S. E. 257 (2), 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 758.

3. PLEADING \S 54—DECLARATION—SEPARATE COUNTS—COMPLIANCE.

The original demurrer having been sustained, and the declaration dismissed, with leave to plaintiff to amend by "separating the petition into two counts, each setting up separate causes of action," it was not a compliance with this order "to make paragraphs of one count a part of another count by mere reference to same," and the court did not err in dismissing plaintiff's suit upon defendant's motion. Cooper v. Portner, 112 Ga. 894, 38 S. E. 91 (3); Train v. Emerson, 137 Ga. 730, 74 S. E. 241 (1).

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 18, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. USURY \S 67, 69—USURIOUS TRANSACTION—COLORABLE TRANSACTION.

Where a lender requires as a condition precedent to the making of a loan, upon which the maximum legal rate of interest has been charged, that the borrower discharge and pay off certain obligations due by the borrower to the lender together with usurious interest thereon, the transaction is usurious. If one who owes to another a debt infected with usury obtains from him a loan of money at a lawful rate of interest, and out of the proceeds thereof actually and bona fide pays off the old debt with usurious interest, whether at the time of obtaining the new loan or afterwards, the new loan is not thereby usurious. If, however, the new transaction as a whole be merely colorable and used and designed as a cloak to cover up usury, the new loan is usurious.

2. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY \S 7, 159—DISCHARGE OF SURETY—WAIVER OF HOMESTEAD—BURDEN OF PROOF—USURY.

The surety on a promissory note secretly infected with usury, of which he had no knowledge, is discharged from liability if the note contains a waiver of homestead. In a suit against the surety, the burden is on the plaintiff, after proof of the usury, to show that the surety signed the note with knowledge of the usury.

3. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY \S 162(2)—ACTION AGAINST SURETY—DEFENSE OF USURY—QUESTION FOR JURY.

There was enough in the evidence in the present case to authorize the jury to infer that the notes sued on were infected with usury, and it was therefore error for the trial judge to direct a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

Error from Superior Court, Coffee County; J. I. Summerall, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. Vacey Peterson, as executrix of B. Peterson, deceased, against J. S. Lott. Judgment for plaintiff on a directed verdict, and defendant excepts and brings error. Reversed.

W. C. Lankford, of Douglas, for plaintiff in error.

Dickerson, Kelly & Roberts and F. Willis Dart, all of Douglas, for defendant in error.

STEPHENS, J. Mrs. Vacey Peterson, as executrix of the estate of B. Peterson, deceased, brought suit upon two promissory notes against J. S. Lott, as indorser. The defendant by way of defense set up the plea that the notes sued on were secretly infected with usury, and that thereby the waivers of homestead contained therein were void, thus increasing the liability of the surety and releasing him from his obligation. In support of this plea the maker of the notes, W. C. Lankford, testified, so far as is material to our purpose here, as follows:

"The consideration of this note was made up as follows: $500 cash actually advanced by Mr. Peterson to me; $1,000 was added in to settle a previous item claimed by Mr. Peterson against me. There was $500 of this thousand dollar item that was charged out that I had agreed to pay Mr. Peterson as bonus for a previous loan of $2,500, which I had obtained from him. The other half of this thousand dollar item charged out was for money actually previously advanced. The balance of this small note was money I was due him as interest at 12 per cent. per annum on the $2,500 I had borrowed from him or on another loan; I don't remember which one now. * * * As to the second note for $4,218.24, my best recollection is that the amount I actually got out of that was $2,300; it might have run to $2,500; the balance of that note was for money I was due him, which he claimed against me as interest on $10,000 and other money I had borrowed from him. At least three-fifths of the balance charged out was for interest he had charged against me at the rate of $12 per thousand per month, on money I had previously borrowed from him, and the balance of the amount, or at least two-fifths of the amount charged out was for interest charged against me at the rate of 12 per cent. I don't remember whether he gave me checks for the full amount of these notes and I gave him checks back or not. * * * I know I was only to get and only got $500 cash out of the little note, and not over $2,500 out of the big note. * * * I gave Mr. Peterson back checks for the money. * * * I think Mr. Peterson gave me a check for the whole amount of the smaller note, and of the small note I gave back the amounts I have heretofore mentioned. * * * These checks were given to Mr. Peterson right at the time. * * * I don't know whether Mr. Peterson gave me a check or not for the full amount of the notes. * * * I don't remember whether Mr. Peterson gave me checks for the whole amount, and I gave my checks back to him, or whether he gave me checks for the difference. * * * I do know that there were checks passed back on the larger note. I got the full amount, but in that same transaction it was agreed that that note should cover all the other items. I simply paid part of those other debts to Mr. Peterson at the same time. The balance was paid to me in cash. I got $2,300 in actual cash on the big note, and the balance went on what I owed on interest. I didn't get that amount on the big note or small note so that I could take it and carry it away and do what I pleased with it. I got that amount turned over to me with the distinct understanding that I give those checks back to Mr. Peterson. * * * It was agreed between us that I was to pay it back to him; it was a part and parcel of the same transaction; he gave me the check, and I gave him the check back. I owed him other amounts; he calculated the interest at 12 per cent. on the other amounts. Mr. Lott had nothing to do with what I did with this amount; he didn't know I was paying this excessive interest; that was 12 per cent. on the other indebtedness I paid Mr. Peterson."

It was in evidence that the defendant Lott at the time of the signing of said notes was ignorant of the fact that Lankford, the maker, was paying usurious interest. The defendant Lott knew nothing of the usurious transactions. The notes sued on, each containing a waiver of homestead and drawing interest at 8 per cent. were introduced in evidence. The trial judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff against the defendant for the full amount sued for. This judgment was excepted to and brought here for review.

[1] 1. The sole question to be determined is, Was there enough in the evidence from which the jury could infer that the making of either one of the notes was a part of a usurious contract, or whether the circumstances surrounding the transaction would authorize the inference that it was a scheme or cloak to cover up usury? The Supreme Court of this state held in the case of Bishop v. Exchange Bank, 114 Ga. 962, 41 S. E. 43 (2) that:

"Where a lender requires, as a condition precedent to making a loan upon which the full legal rate of interest is expressly charged, that the borrower shall assume and pay off a promissory note held by the lender against one who is known by the lender to be insolvent, and whose debt the borrower is under no obligation to pay, the transaction is usurious."

Our first headnote is paraphrased from this case and the case of Bates v. Harris, 112 Ga. 32, 37 S. E. 105 (2). In the former case the condition precedent to the making of the loan and a part of the consideration therefor was that the borrower should pay off the debt of another, while in the case here under consideration there is evidence to the effect that as a condition precedent to, and as a consideration for, the making of the loan, was that the borrower should pay off his own usurious debts to the lender. This distinction makes no difference in the principle of law applicable. The principle is the same. The decision in the Bishop Case was based upon the principle that the borrower in making the loan contracted to pay more than the maximum rate of interest which the lender was allowed by law to charge, and thus assumed a burden and obligation to pay in addition to the highest lawful rate of interest, an amount in excess of that which he was legally under obligation to pay. If the borrower contracted and promised, or the lender reserved, charged, or took more than the lender was legally permitted to exact for the use of his money the transaction was usurious. It is immaterial whether the borrower, in order to obtain the loan, agreed to pay to the lender, a debt due the latter by a third person, or whether the borrower agreed to pay the borrower's own usurious debts to the lender with usurious interest thereon. In either case the borrower would obligate himself to pay that which he was under no obligation to pay and thus would increase his obligation to the lender, which, if it amounted to more than the highest rate of interest which the lender was allowed by law to charge for the use of the money, would constitute usury. In the case of Siesel v. Harris, 48 Ga. 652, it was held that where money was loaned at a usurious rate of interest and a mortgage given by the borrower to secure the payment of the principal and usurious interest, and where such mortgage was given up and foreclosure abandoned upon partial payment of the debt with usury by the borrower and the giving of new notes for the balance, the new notes were infected with usury.

The witness Lankford, the maker of the notes, testified:

"It was agreed between us that I was to pay it back to him; it was a part and parcel of the same transaction."

In Archer v. McCray, 59 Ga. 546 (2), it was held that—

"Where the original transaction was usurious, the usury infects all the securities given in renewal for the same debt, however varied in form and amount, and the law applies all payments made on the debt to the principal and legal interest."

This case was cited with approval in Lockwood v. Muhlberg, 124 Ga. 660, 53 S. E. 92 (2), where it was held that—

"A renewal thereof does not divest a usurious contract of its taint, although the illegal interest thereon to the date of renewal be then fully paid."

See, also, Hammond v. Buys, 1 Ga. 416. Webb, in his work on Usury, § 306, says:

"If a transaction is usurious in its inception, it remains usurious until purged by a new contract; and all future transactions connected with or growing out of the original are usurious and without valid consideration. An original taint of usury attaches to the whole family of consecutive obligations and securities growing out of the original vicious transaction; and none of the descendant obligations, however remote, can be free of the taint if the descent can be fairly traced."

Judge Bleckley, in his opinion in the case of McGee v. Long, 83 Ga. 156, 9 S. E. 1107, says:

"If there was usury in the original loan which was not purged out when these notes were given, and if that usury is in them, they are contaminated just as the original contract was."

The original indebtedness which was paid off with usury when the notes sued on were executed was clearly usurious. Was this original taint of usury purged upon the execution of the new notes, or were the new notes given as a part of a transaction that was colorable and designed as a cloak to cover up the usury in the original transaction? These are questions of fact to be determined from all of the circumstances surrounding the execution of the new notes. The new transaction, being confused with the original usurious indebtedness and making provisions for its extinguishment, is at least subject to the inference that it is colorable and tainted with usury. We fully recognize the doctrine that a borrower may obtain money at a legal rate of interest and use it to pay off usurious debts to the lender without thereby rendering the new loan usurious. If, however, the new loan was made with the distinct understanding and condition that the borrower would use the money to pay off the old loan with usury, even though the borrower received the full amount of the principal of the new loan and afterwards repaid the old loan with usury to the lender, the new transaction would be tainted with usury. Bates v. Harris, 112 Ga. 32, 37 S. E. 105 (2).

Whether or not, as a condition precedent to the making of the loans sued upon, the borrower agreed to pay up the original indebtedness with usurious interest, or whether the new transaction was bona fide or free from any usurious taint or a mere cloak to cover up usury, were questions of fact for a jury to determine. The law goes to the substance of the matter and seeks for the real truth. "No disguise of language can avail for covering up usury, or glossing over a usurious contract. The theory that a contract will be usurious or not according to the kind of paper bag it is put up in, or according to the more or less ingenious phrases made use of in negotiating it, is altogether erroneous. The law intends that a search for usury shall penetrate to the substance." Judge Bleckley in Pope v. Marshall, 78 Ga.

640, 4 S. E. 118. "The usury stalks like a pestilence through every form of contract, and poisons all it touches." Judge Bleckley in Tribble v. Anderson, 63 Ga. 56.

[2] 2. It is well settled that where a promissory note is infected with usury of which the surety had no knowledge, the latter is released from liability if the note contains a waiver of homestead. The waiver is void by reason of the usury, and for that reason, if the surety be ignorant of the usury, his risk is increased. The notes sued on were so-called waiver notes drawing interest at the maximum legal rate of 8 per cent. per annum. The evidence is undisputed that the surety, plaintiff in error Lott, was ignorant of the usurious taint, if any, of the transaction surrounding the execution of the notes which he indorsed. Besides, the burden would be on the plaintiff, upon proof of usury to show affirmatively that the surety had knowledge of the usury when he signed the notes. Bank of Omega v. Ford, 20 Ga. App. 496, 93 S. E. 106.

[3] 3. Whether or not the notes sued on were infected with usury was, under all the circumstances in this case, a question of fact to be submitted to the jury, and the court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

Judgment reversed.

Error from Superior Court, Tattnall County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Suit by G. R. Garnett, administrator of J. U. Rowe, deceased, against the Royal Insurance Company, Limited. Judgment for defendant on a directed verdict, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. T. Burkhalter, of Reidsville, for plaintiff in error.

King & Spalding, of Atlanta, and Collins & Stanfield, of Reidsville, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. In order that the first headnote may be better understood, it may not be amiss to briefly state the salient facts of the case, and our reasons for the decision here made. G. R. Garnett, as administrator of the estate of J. U. Rowe, brought suit against the Royal Insurance Company, Limited, on an insurance policy issued by the defendant company in favor of Rowe, and subsequently transferred by him, with the consent and approval of the insurance company, to Mrs. Della Easterling, and after the loss of the property insured the policy was transferred by Mrs. Easterling to the plaintiff for value. The defendant's answer admitted the issuance of the policy, but denied any and all liability, on the ground that at the time of the issuance of the policy the assured had no title to the property insured, save only a life estate, having previously conveyed the property to Mrs. Sallie Easterling by fee-simple warranty deed, reserving only a life interest therein, and that prior to the fire the assured died, thereby terminating his life estate, and all insurable interest which he had in the property ceased, causing the policy to become of no legal effect. When the evidence adduced on the trial was all in, and, after both sides had closed, the trial judge, on motion of counsel, directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, to which the plaintiff excepted.

[1] The record in this case shows that the policy sued on was dated September 1, 1913, and that on this date Rowe was possessed of only a life estate in the property insured, as he had previously conveyed the legal title to Mrs. Sallie Easterling on January 10, 1908, reserving for himself a life interest only. Rowe died on March 13, 1916. After his death, and on April 28, 1916, the property insured was destroyed by fire. Upon the conveyance by Rowe of his interest in the property to Mrs. Della Easterling, she became the possessor of an estate per auter vie; and upon the transfer of the policy—consented to and approved by the insurance company—a new contract was created between Mrs. Easterling and the company, in which she became the assured instead of Rowe. See Hughes v. Hartford, 144 Ga. 740, 741, 87 S. E. 1042. A contract of fire insurance is one of indemnity. It is wholly personal to the assured, and has no connection with the property insured, except to fix the amount of the indemnity. If the insured parts with the property as to which he seeks indemnity, the contract necessarily is at an end; and were he to assign the contract under these circumstances, no right of action whatever could grow out of it to the assignee. However, if the insurer is informed of the cessation of the interest of the assured and its transfer to another, and thereupon accepts the transferee as the assured, this is a new contract to pay, the former insurance being only used to show the terms on which the insurance was effected. See Virginia-Car Chemical Co. v. Insurance Co. (C. C.) 108 Fed. 451, 456.

Rowe having conveyed his life interest in the property insured, he no longer had any insurable interest therein, and in fact ceased to be a party to the contract. The transfer of the policy by Rowe to Mrs. Easterling, and the conveyance of his interest in the property to her, operated to make the insurance cover the interest of Mrs. Easterling, to wit, her estate for the life of Rowe. Therefore the legal effect of his death was to terminate the interest of Mrs. Easterling in the property, and consequently she ceased to have any insurable interest therein. In other words, at the time the property was destroyed by fire, which was subsequent to the death of Rowe, the entire title to the property was in Mrs. Sallie Easterling, since the life estate of Rowe, which he conveyed to Mrs. Della Easterling, terminated upon his death. Mrs. Della Easterling having, therefore, no interest in the property at the time of its destruction by fire, suffered no loss, and her subsequent transfer of the policy to Garnett, administrator of the estate of Rowe, conveyed no rights whatever to him, who is the plaintiff in this suit.

[2] The contention of the plaintiff in error that the insurance company was estopped from setting up the defense that the policy in question was of no legal effect, since the assured at no time had more than a life estate in the property insured, and that this estate was terminated by his death which occurred prior to the loss, is of no consequence, for, regardless of whether or not the company at the time of the issuance of the policy had notice of the true status of the title, this could not in any way operate to change or alter the controlling fact that the assured had only a life estate in the property insured, which terminated with his death, and the loss having occurred subsequently thereto, the policy was of no legal effect. To sum up the whole matter, the assured, at the time of the loss, had no insurable interest in the property insured, and our statute (Civ. Code, § 2472) declares that in order to sustain "any contract of insurance, it must appear that the assured has some interest in the property * * * insured."

Under the facts in this case, the trial judge therefore did not err in directing a verdict for the defendant company.

Judgment affirmed.

The American Slicing Machine Company sold to Y. L. Carter a slicing machine and retained title thereto. The terms of the sale were $10 cash, 12 monthly payments of $10 each, and a final payment of $5 within 13 months. After making three payments of $10 each, Carter refused to pay more, claiming that the machine was "not any good to me at all." The vendor brought an action of bail trover. Carter filed pleas, and, among other things, alleged failure of consideration. On the trial, after all the evidence, including the contract, was in, the trial judge directed a verdict for $105, being the amount of the purchase price, less the payments of $30. The defendant excepted.

"In an action of trover by a vendor against a vendee, in which the former claims title based upon a note reserving to himself title to the property sold until the purchase money is paid, no demand is necessary, where it appears that the defendant was in possession of the property, claiming title thereto, at the time of the action; his defense being that, owing to a partial failure of consideration, he was not due the balance of the purchase money to the plaintiff." Muse v. Wright & Co., 103 Ga. 783, 30 S. E. 662. While the facts in the case under consideration differ somewhat from those in the case of Muse v. Wright, supra, yet the principle involved is the same in both cases. See Civ. Code (1910) § 4483; Grant v. Miller, 107 Ga. 804, 33 S. E. 671 (2); Scarboro v. Goetha, 118 Ga. 543, 45 S. E. 413; Moore v. Ramsey & Legwen, 144 Ga. 118, 36 S. E. 219 (1); Young v. Durham, 15 Ga. App. 679, 84 S. E. 165 (5); Pearson v. Jones, 18 Ga. App. 448, 89 S. E. 536 (4a).

2. SALES ~~479~~(9)—PRICE—AGREEMENT.

"It has been held a number of times by this court that, as between the original seller and the original purchaser, the agreed price as stated in the contract of sale is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of the actual value of the property, and that upon proof of the contract, in the absence of rebutting testimony as to value, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the balance due thereon." Lott v. Banks, 21 Ga. App. 249, 94 S. E. 324. See, also, Elder v. Woodruff Hardware Co., 9 Ga. App. 486, 71 S. E. 806; Young v. Durham, 15 Ga. App. 678, 84 S. E. 165; Elder v. Woodruff Hardware Co., 16 Ga. App. 255, 35 S. E. 268; Jordan v. Jenkins, 17 Ga. App. 58, 36 S. E. 278; Moore v. Furstenwerth-Uhl Jewelry Co., 17 Ga. App. 669, 87 S. E. 1097. The written contract of sale showed an agreed purchase price of $135 for the machine. There was no other testimony as to value. It was admitted that $30 of the purchase price had been paid. Under the pleadings and the evidence, the court properly directed a verdict for $105, being the amount of the purchase price, less the admitted payments.

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES ~~277~~—ACTION TO FORECLOSE—PLEA—RESCISSION OF SALE.

Where a vendor of certain personal property took from the vendees a promissory note, secured in the same instrument by a mortgage on the property sold, in which it was stated that the note was given "for purchase money of one sorrel mare mule four years old, and one black mare mule seven years old, title only guaranteed," and the vendor instituted a proceeding to foreclose the mortgage for the amount of the note, to which the vendee interposed an affidavit of illegality containing the following plea (after stating the consideration of the mortgage and the purchase price of each of the animals): "Affiants say that at the time the sorrel horse mule was delivered to them the said mule was sick, and affiant Dan Vinson called plaintiff's attention to the fact, and was informed by plaintiffs that the mule was not sick and would be all right in a few days. Acting on said statement affiant Dan Vinson took said mule back to his farm. The said mule grew worse, and in two or three days he returned the mule to plaintiffs, with the complaint that he was sick and that he could not use him. Affiants say that the plaintiffs accepted said mule, took possession of him, and in a few days he died in their possession. (Italics ours.) Affiants say, therefore, that they are not liable for the purchase money of said mule, or any part thereof; that there has been a total failure of consideration in so far as the value of said mule is concerned. Such affidavit of illegality was not subject to general demurrer attacking it for legal insufficiency. The plea was a good plea of rescission, and the fact that the pleader denominated his plea as a plea of failure of consideration does not defeat the plea or its effect. See Civil Code 1910, § 5635. Bates v. First National Bank, 111 Ga. 756, 36 S. E. 949; Daniel v. Burson, 18 Ga. App. 39, 84 S. E. 490. 1. CHARGE OF COURT—CRIMINAL CASE.

The various exceptions taken to the charge of the court are without merit, and show no error. The charge fairly presented all the issues and substantially covered all matters contained in the various requests to charge.

2. ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The court committed no error in sustaining the objection to the testimony offered as set out in the nineteenth ground of the amendment to the motion for new trial. Nor was there error in overruling the objections to the admission of the testimony offered for the purpose therein stated, as set out in the twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-second, and twenty-third grounds thereof.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §941(1)—NEW TRIAL — CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE.

The alleged newly discovered evidence set forth in the twenty-sixth ground of the amendment to the motion for new trial was merely cumulative in its nature, and, a counter showing having been made on the hearing of the motion, there was not presented sufficient cause for a new trial.

4. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL OVERRULED.

Feb. 20, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

APPEAL AND ERROR §977(4)—GRANT OF FIRST NEW TRIAL—REVERSAL.

This case comes to this court upon exceptions to the first grant of a new trial. In Weinkle v. Brunswick & Western R. Co., 107 Ga. 367, 33 S. E. 471, the Supreme Court said: "It may be now considered as settled that this court will not, under any circumstances, reverse a judgment granting a first new trial, whether the grant be general upon all the grounds of the motion, or special upon one or more grounds only, or whether it be upon a ground which involves questions of evidence, or upon a ground which involves purely questions of law, unless it is made to appear that no other verdict than the one rendered could possibly have been returned under the law and facts of the case. Unless the case can be brought within the exception just stated, it is useless for parties to bring before this court the judgment of a trial judge granting a first new trial." See, also, Ellis v. Spell, 20 Ga. App. 347, 93 S. E. 49, and Southern Fertilizer & Chemical Co. v. Pea- cock, 19 Ga. App. 592, 91 S. E. 928, and cases cited. The judge of the superior court, in the exercise of his discretion, thought best to send the case back to the municipal court for a new trial, and this court will not interfere.

STEPHENS, J. (concurring). This being the first grant of a new trial, and the verdict not being demanded by the law and the evidence, I concur in the judgment of affirmation. There was evidence from which it might be inferred that the agent of the insurance company, by virtue of his previous dealings in similar transactions, with the company's consent or ratification, had authority to waive a written stipulation in the policy. Western Assurance Co. v. Williams, 94 Ga. 128, 21 S. E. 370.

BROYLES, P. J. (dissenting). In my opinion, the evidence demanded the verdict directed by the trial judge, and the judge of the superior court erred in sustaining the certiorari.

2. OVERRULING OF CERTIORARI.

The court did not err in overruling the certiorari.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. S. McA. Stokes against A. H. Waldon. Judgment in municipal court of Atlanta for plaintiff, motion for new trial overruled, and on appeal to appellate division of municipal court there was a final judgment of affirmance, denying a new trial, and from the overruling of his certiorari, defendant excepts and brings error. Affirmed.

Evins & Moore and Bachman & Simmons, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

W. F. Buchanan, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. In the municipal court of Atlanta Mrs. S. McA. Stokes sued A. H. Waldon, alleging in part that she purchased from him three vacant lots in the city of Atlanta; that he represented to her—

"that Forrest & George Adair had an agreement with the city of Atlanta by which the city of Atlanta was to lay chert paving on Catherine street in front of said lots, without charge whatever against the person or persons owning said three lots, nor against said three lots; that your petitioner relied on the said representations as being true, and, partly because of the value of said representations, did purchase of defendant the said lots at a price of $2,700; that recently petitioner discovered that there was no such agreement between Forrest & George Adair and the city of Atlanta by which the said city was to pave the street without charge against the property owners; that the city of Atlanta has paved the street and levied on the said three lots an assessment of $210.95, which is a legal charge and lien against said property; that the defendant willfully misrepresented to petitioner the alleged agreement between Forrest & George Adair and the city of Atlanta, for the purpose of inducing petitioner to purchase the said land, and that said representation was fraudulently made, with intent to deceive petitioner, and did deceive her into purchasing the said land, and that petitioner has, as a result, been damaged in the sum sued for; that your petitioner has paid the full purchase price of the said property."

Defendant filed a general demurrer and a plea. The plea denied all the paragraphs of the petition, except the one alleging that the defendant lived in Fulton county. The plea further alleged that:

"The promise alleged in said petition was a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another. * * * Said promise was not in writing, signed by the defendant, the party sought to be charged therewith, or by any person by him lawfully authorized."

The case was tried by Judge Rosser, who rendered judgment for the plaintiff. A motion for new trial was overruled, and an appeal was taken to the appellate division of the municipal court, which division "rendered a final judgment in said case, affirming the judgment of the lower court, and denying defendant a new trial." The defendant sued out certiorari; the certiorari was overruled, and he excepted.

[1, 2] The principle announced in the first headnote controls the instant case, and neither headnote needs elaboration.

Judgment affirmed.

CARSWELL v. GREEN. (No. 9798.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 11, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT — 252(5) — LANDLORD'S LIEN—JUDGMENT — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There is no evidence to support the finding and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from City Court of Macon; Du Pont Guerry, Judge.

Suit by B. A. Green against R. E. Carswell. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial overruled, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

John M. Hancock, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Sidney W. Hatcher, of Macon, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. Trammell was indebted to Carswell for supplies, and owed Green as landlord for rent. Green sued Carswell, alleging that Carswell had purchased from Trammell produce raised on Green's land, to wit: Fodder worth $11.75; hay, $3.50; one bale of cotton, $69; one bale, $61; cotton seed, $11; total, $156.25—and that at the time of purchasing this produce Carswell knew that the rent had not been paid, that Trammell had no other property, and that the only way the plaintiff had of collecting his rent was by enforcing his lien as landlord against the property purchased, which was removed beyond his reach by the defendant and converted to the defendant's own use. The defendant's plea denied every allegation of the petition. The judge passed upon the case without the intervention of a jury, and rendered a finding and judgment for the plaintiff for $90. A motion for new trial was made and overruled, and the movant excepted. The record does not show that a demurrer to the petition was filed. The special grounds of the motion for a new trial were but amplifications of the general grounds, so we have for determination the one question of whether or not the judgment should be reversed on the general grounds.

There is no evidence to show that the "property was removed out of the reach of petitioner by defendant," except it be some of the fodder; nor is there any evidence to show that the defendant ever bought from the tenant of the plaintiff any of the produce named above, except some of the fodder ($3 worth), the total value of all of which is alleged in the petition to be $11.75, and yet the finding and judgment are for $90. The greatest amount shown by the testimony to have been received by the defendant from Trammell was $97.50, and this was in cash, and not in the value of produce purchased. Deducting from this sum $32.50, which the undisputed evidence shows was paid to Carswell from the sale of a cow, it appears that the total cash received by Carswell from the tenant was $65, which might have been the proceeds from produce sold to others. However, as stated above, the evidence fails to show that this amount resulted from produce sold by Trammell to Carswell. Even granting that all this came from the sale of produce raised on the plaintiff's farm, and that all of it was purchased by Carswell from Trammell (which is not true according to the evidence in the record), and adding thereto the alleged value of the fodder, $11.75, the total amount would be only $76.75. The record clearly shows that there is no proof to support the finding and judgment, and the court erred in overruling the motion for new trial.

Judgment reversed.

HOLT v. OVAL OAK MFG. CO. (No. 101.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 5, 1919.)

1. TRIAL \S 127 — REMARKS OF COUNSEL — PERSONAL INJURY ACTION—REFERENCE TO INSURANCE COMPANY.

In employe's personal injury action, it was improper for employe's counsel to refer to insurance company by which employer was indemnified, such remarks being calculated to prejudice jury and divert minds of jurors from material issues.

2. TRIAL \S 133(2)—REMARKS OF COUNSEL—CORRECTION BY COURT.

In action for injuries to employe, where employe's counsel made improper allusions to insurance company indemnifying employer, court by immediately cautioning jury as to the only issues, removed the prejudice that such allusion was calculated to produce.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 1060(4)—HARMLESS ERROR—IMPROPER REMARKS BY COUNSEL—VERDICT SUSTAINED BY EVIDENCE.

In employe's action for injuries, reference by his counsel to insurance company by which employer was indemnified was not prejudicial, where verdict upon issue of negligence was well warranted by evidence, and damages allowed were very small in view of serious injury inflicted.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT \S 278(20)—INSTRUCTIONS BY EMPLOYER—UNGUARDED RIPSAP.

In action by 17 year old employe for injuries sustained while operating groover with unguarded ripsaw, without experience in so doing, and without instructions from employer, evidence held to warrant verdict finding employer negligent.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT \S 281(4)—INJURIES TO EMPLOYE — UNGUARDED RIPSAP — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In action for injuries to 17 year old employe resulting from employer's negligence in directing employe to operate unguarded ripsaw without first instructing him in so doing, evidence held to warrant verdict finding employe not guilty of contributory negligence.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT \S 91 — DUTY OF MASTER—YOUTHFUL EMPLOYEES.

Employer of young persons is required to take notice of their apparent age and ability, and to use ordinary care to protect them from risks which they cannot properly appreciate, and to which they ought not to be exposed.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT \S 93—PROTECTION OF YOUNG EMPLOYEES — DELEGATION OF DUTY.

Master's duty to protect young employes from risks they cannot appreciate, and to which they should not be exposed, cannot be delegated.

9. MASTER AND SERVANT \S 153(5) — YOUNG EMPLOYEES—MASTER'S DUTY TO INSTRUCT.

Master must instruct young servants in their work, and warn them against damages to which it exposes them, and in so doing must use such plain language as to be reasonably sure that they understand it and appreciate the danger.

9. MASTER AND SERVANT \S 286(2) — INJURY TO YOUNG EMPLOYE—UNGUARDED RIPSAP—JURY QUESTION.

In action for injuries to 17 year old employe while operating ripsaw, where there was conflicting evidence of whether machine was unguarded and in defective condition at time of injury, the case was one for the jury under proper instructions.

10. MASTER AND SERVANT \S 270(7)—ACTION FOR INJURIES—EVIDENCE—SUBSEQUENT REPAIRS TO MACHINE.

In employe's action for injuries while operating ripsaw in groover, employe's evidence that employer placed guards on machine after the accident was admissible to show machine was unguarded at time of injury, but was not admissible as an admission, by employer, of negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lee County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by Bruce Holt against the Oval Oak Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendant to fire the boiler in its mill, and was ordered, on the day he was injured, to take the place of the man who operated the ripsaw at the bench, or grooving machine, in which it was placed. This saw revolved with great rapidity, 5,000 revolutions to the minute, and there was evidence tending to show that there was no guard, or other appliance, to keep the boards from falling on the saw while it was in motion, and that the machine, in this respect, was not constructed like those of the same kind which were approved and in general use in other mills, and which had protective guards to prevent such accidents as the one in question. The plaintiff was 17 years old when he was injured, and, according to his testimony, had objected to working at the machine, as he was afraid of being cut by the saw, but he was told it was safe, and to go on with the work. There also was evidence, on defendant's part, that there were guards on the machine to hold the boards in their proper position, but plaintiff disputed this, and stated that they were put there after he was injured. He had worked at the groover only half a day when he was hurt. He testified, in part, as follows:

"I am the plaintiff in this action, 19 years old, and live at Broadway, N. C. About a year and a half ago I worked at Siler City, and was there about a year and a half. I worked about two months with the Oval Oak Manufacturing Company, being hired by Mr. Stone, the superintendent. Mr. Stone looked after the plant and hired and discharged the men. I was firing the boiler, and the man who operated the grooving machine was out, and Mr. Stone put me to work on it. I was scared I'd get my fingers cut, and told him so. He told me there was no danger in the machine. He did not tell me any of the dangers of the machine. He gave me no instructions, but in his presence the fellow that had operated the machine told me to pile up the blank pieces, or work, between the standards and the saw four wide and four deep, and when he finished Mr. Stone said, "That will be right; it will make it out on the truck even." The machine was a flat table with a saw coming up through the top of the table, with two pieces on each side of the saw to run the timber up between, to hit the piece exactly in the center, to groove the sides of the washboard. The pieces were about an inch by half an inch, and about a foot long. There were no rollers on the table to draw the pieces on the saw. You pushed the piece with your hands, pushing the piece with your thumb and holding it down with your left hand. There were standards between which I was told to put the finished pieces, but no standards between the blank pieces to be worked and the saw. I was instructed to put the blank pieces between the standard and the saw. There were no standards to protect the work on the side of the saw. I stacked the blanks up as I was instructed to do. I stacked a pile of the pieces up, and turned to get my position, and as I did so, some of the pieces rolled over on the saw and hit it, and that is the last I know. Just at that time the machine speeded up. I heard it shaking and rattling, and I know of my own knowledge that this was caused by the throwing of a belt on some part of the machinery. The engine caught up slack and shook the machine. I saw the pile as it started to fall, and saw the piece as it started toward me from the saw. The machine was pretty shakily."

Plaintiff here described his wound, which was very severe and caused him great suffering and permanent injury.

He then further testified:

"I had worked at wood-working plants about 2 years, but had never operated a machine like this before; never operated a groover. You had to push the blank with your right hand, between little wooden guides, onto the saw, and hold them down with your left hand. There was a piece at the end to stop the blank at the right place, and it was grooved only to about six inches of the end. There were four little wire standards on the machine; on the back side you put the timber you had finished, and on the far side your raw timber. The finished product was laid over on the other side of the raw material between the little standards. In operating you picked up an unfinished piece next the saw, put it through, and placed it over between the standards. I do not know whether or not a piece dropped diagonally across the guides would touch the saw; I did not mess with it long enough to find out. Mr. Stone showed me how to push the blanks through and to pick them up. I had operated the machine only a half day before, and returned to its operation that morning. I did not whistle to Mr. Coggins after I was hurt, or have any conversation with him. I do not remember anything that happened until I regained consciousness in the hospital at Greensboro about four weeks afterwards. After the second operation was performed in Greensboro, about September 10th, I was able to go to the moving picture show, and on the 23d I left the hospital. On January 9th I returned to the hospital. I was not fat, and weighed only about 120 pounds. I had a piece of gauze in the wound, because the doctor had advised me to do so. In May, after this suit was started, I went to the hospital for another operation, when the wound was closed, and remained there nine days. I then came home. At the time I was hurt I wasn't operating the stick. I was piling stuff, and went to turn around. I had used all the timber up and was putting up some more. (Stick is shown witness.) Do you know whether or not this is the stick which hit you? No, sir. The stick looks like the ones I handled. Mr. Coggins was working a good ways off. The pieces went into the machine the wide, or flat way. I have seen the machine since then. They were not using it when I went to Siler City again. They were using a molder for this work, through which the piece passed entirely, coming out at the other end. Mr. Stone did not instruct me where to stand. The pieces were stacked at the right-hand side, and it was necessary for me to get into the position I was in when hurt in order to get the material and stack it there. The piece which fell on the saw and was thrown back was one of 16 pieces which were stacked up at the right of the saw."

The allegations of the plaintiff, as to the construction of the groover and other material matters, were denied by the defendant, and testimony introduced to show that there was no negligence, either in the construction of the machine or in the failure to give proper instructions as to its operation, and, further, that the injury was caused by the plaintiff's own negligence.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff upon all the issues, negligence and contributory negligence, and assessed his damages at $5,000. Judgment was entered thereon, and an appeal taken by the defendant.

Wilson & Frazier, of Greensboro, for appellant.

Seawell & Milliken, of Sanford, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] The remarks of counsel, with reference to the insurance company, by which the defendant was indemnified, were not proper, as there was no legal basis for the suggestion, because they were irrelevant to the issues, and were calculated to prejudice the jury and to divert the minds of the jurors from the material issues. If the judge had not removed any such prejudice by his clear instructions to the jury, as to what were the only issues, we would be authorized to grant a new trial, but we are satisfied that the caution of the judge to the jury, which came immediately after the allusion to the insurance company was made, had the desired effect, and placed the parties at arm's length in the very beginning of the trial.

[3-5] We are also convinced that no actual prejudice resulted from the remark, as the verdict upon the issues of negligence was well warranted by the evidence, and the damages allowed were very moderate and small, in view of the serious, if not horrible, injury inflicted, and the racking pain suffered by the plaintiff, which may continue and perhaps will be permanent. To be deprived of the comfort resulting from the normal operation of his physical and bodily functions is a dreadful affliction. Deducting the medical and hospital bills, which were very large, from the amount of damages, the balance was an exceedingly small compensation for the damage done, the painful operations undergone, and the long period of confinement and loss of earnings.

With reference to the remarks of counsel, this case is not altogether like Featherstone v. Cotton Mills, 159 N. C. 429, 74 S. E. 918, and Norris v. Cotton Mills, 154 N. C. 480, 70 S. E. 912, for the inquiries there were not necessarily foreign to the case. In the former case, which may, in one aspect, apply here, the court held that on the facts, as presented, both the questions asked of the jurors the same being as a rule competent, and that addressed to defendant's counsel, were matters which must be left largely to the discretion of the court below, and it must be presumed that the character and good sense of the jurors selected, when they are properly cautioned, have protected them from improper bias, or that any tendency in that direction has been effectually checked and corrected by the learned and impartial judge who presides at the trial. In Lytton v. Manufacturing Co., 157 N. C. 331, 72 S. E. 1055, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 358, the evidence of the insurance was admitted and the ruling was reversed by this court, and, therefore, it does not apply, as in our case the judge intervened, and is supposed to have neutralized the prejudice, if any had resulted. The penalty for such remarks, when not properly and fully corrected by the court, and all prejudice removed, is a new trial, as was held in Starr v. Oil Co., 165 N. C. 587, 81 S. E. 776, where we said:

"Courts should be very careful to safeguard the rights of litigants and to be as nearly sure as possible that each party shall stand before the jury on equal terms with his adversary, and not be hampered in the prosecution or defense of his cause, by extraneous considerations, which militate against a fair hearing."

And again, to the same effect, in Deligny v. Furniture Co., 170 N. C. 189, 86 S. E. 980, we held that whenever such questions are asked, if they are irrelevant to the controversy and have a tendency only to prejudice one side or the other, the presiding judge should act promptly in preventing any such result and take drastic measures to do so, if necessary. When it is clear that either of the parties resorts to such questions to gain an unfair advantage, it is done at the sacrifice of the verdict, if he succeeds in securing one, on account of the very dangerous character of the questions. Lytton v. Manufacturing Co., supra. The subject is fully discussed in the cases we have cited, and needs no further elaboration. In this case, we see no reason for such a course. Counsel here may not have intended any wrong, and we can draw no inference, that they did, from what was said. They may have asked the question for a legitimate purpose to obtain information in the proper conduct of their case. But for the objection, the answer might have been that defendant had no indemnity insurance. The defendant felt aggrieved by the question, and prayed for the intervention of the court, and relief was speedily granted by the learned presiding judge. Parties should act promptly, as was done here, in the assertion of their rights. This being an appellate tribunal, with jurisdiction merely for the correction of errors in law, it will not grant the relief, which can the more readily be given by the court below, in the exercise of its sound discretion, unless in very exceptional cases, of which this is not one. We caution the judges, though, to guard carefully the rights of the parties, when such questions arise, and to be prompt in eliminating from the trial anything tending to prevent an impartial hearing and verdict. It may be that, in some cases, where the reference to insurance is clearly irrelevant, and can only have the effect to prejudice the opponent, the judge should be even drastic, and order a continuance, at plaintiff's cost, as it may do incalculable damage. Lytton v. Mfg. Co., supra.

The other exceptions relate mainly to the charge of the court upon the question of negligence. We have examined the latter with the utmost scrutiny, and have been unable to find any departure from the principles which have been settled by this court as applicable to cases of this kind. It covered the entire inquiry, and presented to the jury in clear and vigorous language every question raised by the pleadings and evidence, and explained the law and the testimony of the witnesses in perfectly correct manner, as required by the statute.

The case, in all of its essential features, is like Ensley v. Lumber Co., 165 N. C. 687, 81 S. E. 1010, and Dunn v. Lumber Co., 172 N. C. 136, 90 S. E. 18. It resembles the former case very much, and sufficiently so to be controlled by it. The plaintiff in that case, who was injured, was 17 years of age, and was hurt in a way and under circumstances somewhat similar to those set forth in this record. We held in the Ensley Case:

"It is the duty of the master to exercise due care in furnishing his servant with a reasonably safe place to work and reasonably safe and proper machines, tools, and appliances with which to do the work, and, in the case of youthful or inexperienced employes, this further duty rests upon him: Where the master knows, or ought to know, the dangers of the employment, and knows, or ought to know, that the servant, by reason of his immature years or inexperience, is ignorant of or unable to appreciate such dangers, it is his duty to give him such instruction and warning of the dangerous character of the employment as may reasonably enable him to understand his perils. But the mere fact of the servant's minority does not charge the master with the duty to warn and instruct him, if he in fact knows and appreciates the dangers of the employment; and generally it is for the jury to determine whether, under all the circumstances, it was incumbent upon the master to give the minor, at the time of his employment, or at some time previous to the injury, instructions regarding the dangers of the work, and how he could safely perform it. It is the duty of a master who employs a servant in a place of danger to give him such warning and instruction as is reasonably required by his youth, inexperience, or want of capacity, and as will enable him, with the exercise of reasonable care, to perform the duties of his employment with reasonable safety to himself. 26 Cyc. 1174-1178; Turner v. Lumber Co., 119 N. C. 387 [26 S. E. 23]; Marcus v. Loan, 133 N. C. 54 [45 S. E. 354]; Walters v. Sash & Blind Co., 154 N. C. 323 [70 S. E. 635]; Fitzgerald v. Furniture Co., 131 N. C. 636 [42 S. E. 946]; Rolin v. Tobacco Co., 141 N. C. 300 [53 S. E. 891, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 335, 8 Ann. Cas. 638]; Leathers v. Tobacco Co., 144 N. C. 350 [57 S. E. 11, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 349]. Those cases fairly illustrate the rule as it has been applied by this court, and the Fitzgerald Case would seem to be essentially the same in its salient facts as this one, and, if not entirely so, there is a sufficient likeness between them to make it a controlling authority. The authorities elsewhere are in harmony with our decisions."

The following additional authorities, which state the law as held and applied in other jurisdictions, will be found applicable to our case:

"The master may also be guilty of actionable negligence in exposing persons to perils in his service which, though open to observation, they, by reason of their youth or inexperience, do not fully understand and appreciate, and in consequence of which they are injured. Such cases occur most frequently in the employment of infants. The duty of the employer to take special cautions in such cases has sometimes been emphatically asserted by the courts.' Cooley on Torts, p. 652. 'The law puts upon a master, when he takes an infant into his service, the duty of explaining to him fully the hazards and dangers connected with the business, and of instructing him how to avoid them. Nor is this all: The master will not have discharged his duty in this regard unless the instructions and precautions given are so graduated to the youth, ignorance, and inexperience of the servant as to make him fully aware of the danger to him, and to place him, with reference to it, in substantially the same state as if he were an adult.' Thompson on Negligence, 978. 'When the negligent act of the defendant naturally induced or offered opportunity for the subsequent act of a child, being of a character common to youthful indiscretion, and which, concurring with the defendant's earlier wrongful act, produced the injuries complained of, the defendant will in general be held liable. Children, wherever they go, must be expected to act upon childish instincts and impulses—a fact which all persons who are sui juris must consider, and take precautions accordingly. A person who places in the hands of a child an article of a dangerous character and one likely to do an injury to the child itself or to others is liable in damages for injury resulting which is a natural result of the original wrong, though there may be an intervening agency (of the child) between the defendant's act and the injury.' Bailey on Personal Injuries, 1291. It was said in R. R. v. Fort, 84 U. S. [17 Wall.] 553 [21 L. Ed. 739], in which a parent was suing for injuries to his son, who was 16 years old: 'This boy occupied a very different position (from an adult). How could he be expected to know the peril of the undertaking? He was a mere youth without experience, not familiar with machinery. Not being able to judge for himself, he had a right to rely on the judgment of Collett, and doubtless entered upon the execution of the order without apprehension of danger. Be this as it may, it was a wrongful act on the part of Collett to order a boy of his age and inexperience to do a thing which, in its very nature, was perilous, and which any man of ordinary sagacity would know to be so.'"

[6-8] It is the duty of one who employs young persons in his service to take notice of their apparent age and ability, and to use ordinary care to protect them from risks which they cannot properly appreciate, and to which they ought not to be exposed. This is a duty which cannot be delegated; and any failure to perform it leaves the master subject to the same liability, with respect to such risks, as if the child were not a servant. For this purpose the master must instruct such young servants in their work and warn them against the dangers to which it exposes them, and he must put this warning in such plain language as to be reasonably sure that they understand it and appreciate the danger. The principles governing the employment of minors are, to a large degree, also applicable to the employment of inexperienced, ignorant, feeble, or incompetent servants. A master having notice of any such defect in a servant, no matter what his age may be, is bound to use ordinary care to instruct the inexperienced or ignorant and to avoid putting the feeble to work too heavy for their strength, and generally to refrain from exposing them to risks which they are not fit to encounter. When the master has notice of such ignorance or inexperience on the part of the servant as would make the ordinary risks of the business especially perilous to that servant, he must give the servant explicit warning of the danger, and not allow him to undertake the work without a full explanation of its perils.

[9] And this may also be said upon another branch of the case, viz., whether the groover was constructed after the pattern of those which have been approved and are in general use. There was evidence that it was not similar in the very respect which, if it had been, the boards could not have jostled onto the saw. There also was testimony that the machine was old, out of style, and shaky or rickety, and not fit to be placed in the hands of a comparative novice, with only one-half day's experience, and working too under an express order to go ahead, after making objection because of the risk, and being assured of safety. Atkins v. Madry, 174 N. C. 187, 93 S. E. 744. The defendant must have known of the dangerous character of the groover. It had been in use for a long time, and was out of date—evidently an antiquated model, and a trap for the inexperienced and unwary. It was also cranky from constant wear and tear. Besides, it was rendered more unsteady by the slipping of a belt from an adjoining pulley, which was operated by the same engine, which accelerated its speed and violently agitated the groover, or, at least, helped to cause the boards to lose their balance and fall upon the saw. There was full evidence of these and other facts, more or less showing negligence of the defendant, and disproving contributory negligence. In this conflict, the case was evidently one for the jury to settle under the correct instructions of the court.

One witness, Mr. Gregson, testified that, within a 30 years' experience in such mills, he had seen many such machines, and practically every one had the groover saw protected, so that the boards could not drop down and upon the saw.
